All these things have been true and have been sometimes melodramatically overemphasized; yet the colleges have prospered, I think, because there has been a residual feeling on the part of the interested public that at college young men and women have been able to acquire some sensitive responsiveness to the best that has been thought and said in the world, some realization of their human situation and of their place in history, and some intellectual discipline. Thomas Wolfe may have railed in his novels against his state university, but his gifts and his very words reveal his debt to it. And he is one example out of many. To take a miscellaneous set of examples, Princeton had not a little to do with the making of F. Scott Fitzgerald, Columbia with the molding of Cardozo, and Harvard with the formation of Justice Holmes and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Out of the discussion and experiment of the last quarter of a century, the colleges were gradually evolving a kind of training that was well calculated to produce educated men and women, persons with a sense of the best and a trained capacity for enjoying and judging it; citizens aware, too, of the social consequences and responsibilities of intellectual training. American colleges were not turning out philosopher-kings, but they were learning to turn out men who knew what the ideal of educated citizenship meant. And as one who has had occasion professionally to see young men and women in at least fifty colleges and universities in this country in the last fifteen years and for twenty-five years at Columbia, I can testify to the growing intellectual maturity of American undergraduates.

It would be calamitous if the colleges at their best were to be so much out of the picture by the time the war was over, if the whole ideal of liberal education were at such a discount, that state legislatures, boards of trustees, and students themselves were committed to the robot education of purely technical studies. It would be shocking if a habit of public unconcern for liberal studies should become prevalent. And it is not inconceivable that the brushing aside of the liberal studies now would be the beginning of their permanent exile. We should then have a generation that would have no use for political freedom because it had lost a care for and a discipline in those arts and interests which constitute the free mind. Out of the colleges have come some of the great scholars of our period, and men of affairs have acquired from courses in Greek tragedy or Greek philosophy or other "irrelevancies" a temper, a vision, and a method that have saved them from being merely experts—"men who draw a straight and precise line from a false assumption to a foregone conclusion"—and kept them, in the best sense, humanists.

The colleges have done these things for a number sufficient to justify their existence, and for a much larger number they have kept alive a humane temper in American society. But it may still be argued that even if the colleges were closed for three or four years or were for that period turned over completely to purely technical training, and to house and service the military, no harm would be done. Clearly a great deal of harm would be done. For one thing, many small colleges, including some of the very best of them, could not survive. Whatever the limitations of some of these smaller institutions—their provincialism, the limitations of their libraries and scholarship, of their faculties—they fulfil a function in American life that is unique and excellent. Few universities can provide the peculiar quality of intimate individual education for a small and picked group that some of the best of the small colleges, such as Haverford (if instances are not invidious), afford. During this war faculties may disintegrate—this is no less true because it is a cliché to say that men make a college—and a faculty is not to be reassembled overnight, nor is its Gestalt remarkable. Meanwhile there will have grown up in this country what is always nascent, a public temper that will tend to dismiss a purely intellectual and imaginative education as trivial. A college generation is only four years, and four years is time enough to impose a philistine barbarism on a society; Hitler did it in less.

There are some redeeming elements in the picture. Much of the dead wood of college life and teaching has up to now been kept through habit. All over the country university administrators and leaders in different fields will be forced during this interim—they may soon have little else to do—to reconsider what the college can do. Such reconsiderations have always gone on verbally. Now they have suddenly become practical and central. The large-scale government endowment of young soldiers and sailors to go to the campuses to learn what is necessary for war suggests that the government may send young men and women to the colleges to learn what is necessary for peace. The campus population may not be so much determined by middle-class pocket-books in the future. It may come to seem a public obligation to send the intellectually best-prepared to college, and only those.

During this period of convulsive dislocation teachers of the liberal arts will engage in heart-searching and, what is more important, re-searchings of the fundamentals and functions of the teaching of these liberal arts. At this moment many teachers of the "useless" subjects are wringing their hands and wishing they had majored in mathematics or physics. Or they are semi-content to await the end of the war, when courses in the True, the Good, and the Beautiful will presumably once more be possible. The old defenders of the liberal studies are being trotted out, and the humanities are set over against technique much as religion, in its desperate nineteenth-century corner, used to defend itself against science. But the wiser teachers of the humanities know well that philosophy and literature were often dying in our colleges before the war. They were dying of anemia, of routine, of archaeological hardening of the arteries. English literature was taught in a compartment separated from all other literature, a corpse handled conscientiously by solemn morticians. Philosophy was frequently a hand-me-down of dialectical double-talk. The origins and consequences of thought and feeling, expression and beauty, in the life out of which they grew and the contemporary life in which their values must function were quite ignored. This tragic interval may have this much of educational good: all over the country the serious uses of the "useless" subjects are being explored.

Meanwhile the liberal arts continue to be taught in the women's colleges and in the large state universities. Learning and the spirit of learning survived the Civil War. They will survive this one, and be possibly more living for the shock they have received. It may be that when the war is over, some of the shakier small institutions, shaky intellectually as well as financially, will have gone for good. Some of them will be no loss. It may be that the two-year junior college, epidemic in the West, will spread all over the country as feeder to the big universities, where in the last two undergraduate years really advanced intellectual work will be done by college students. These changes will be far-reaching, but they will be in the interest of a changeless tradition older far than this Republic (as old as Plato's)—the training of young minds to timeless values and to public responsibility.

Hamlet on Ruml

Soliloquy in the Ways and Means Committee Room

BY J. W. ABELS

TO SKIP, or not to skip—that is the question
Whether 'tis better for the purse to suffer
The bite made double, with the two years' taxes
Paid in this twelvemonth—and then to be current,
Or to make laws against these last year's taxes
And by forgiving end them? To skip—to owe
No more; and by this skip to say we end
The heartache and the strange unnatural shocks
Our purse seems heir to—'tis a consummation Devoutly to be wished. To skip—to owe—

To owe perchance still more! Ay, there's the rub,
For with our this year's tax, what rates must come,
Once we have skipped out on our last year's tax,
Should give us pause! There is the fact
That last year's tax will not suffice to bring More than one-half the revenues required
This year. If that be skipped—if only this Year's tax be paid this year—then doubled rates
Must bring the doubled revenue we need!

But think! Since some already bear a tax
That's more than half their massive income's weight,
And since we cannot double up their rate
Beyond their whole year's take, our coffers lose
From them all excess of the doubled rate.
For such a doubled rate would mean for them
A fine on income earned, and not a tax.
So we must lose on those whose doubled rate
Approaches or exceeds their whole year's gains,
That's certain loss. And how make good to yield
The doubled revenues we need? By building up our levies
Where we may, to more than doubled rates!
The lower groups that now do bear a tax
One-fifth their annual wage, must mend that loss
By paying henceforth more than doubled rates.

Then wherefore skip? Who two years' tax would bear
In one, and sweat in such a pinched life,
But that the dread of tax rates after skip,
That undiscovered country from whose bourn
No taxpayer returns, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those rates we have Than fly to taxes that we know not of?
Thus figures will make cowards of near all;
And enterprises of great pith and moment
With this regard their currents turn awry
And lose the name of action.

Houses for Millions

BY RICHARD M. BENNETT

ALL plans for a post-war America take for granted an inevitable boom in home building. In speeches, advertisements, and articles one interested group after another stakes out its claim in this shimmering bonanza with predictions of the wonders of houses built of its materials or by its methods, houses with all the comforts and astonishingly low in price.

The building industry may be the last frontier for mass production, and it is natural that manufacturers should be interested in the prefabrication of houses as a peace-time function for their great war plants. The makers of materials are grimly earnest about markets for their new products—and for their old ones, too, which can be used in many new ways, thanks to an ingenuity stimulated by war-time scarcities. Labor, immersed in new tasks, must sometimes catch its breath and wonder if it will ever be allowed to go back to its old ways. Real-estate interests, looking forward to selling land for these new houses, must be asking themselves what cheaper and better houses will do to the market for old, overpriced, overtaxed ones. Most architects realize that they will have to function either as designers for industry or—a more delightful thought—as master-planners for a new society. The "home" magazines continue to discuss period art and the antique market even while machine production is advancing as remorselessly as a Russian tank. Town planners try to gauge the forces at work and are torn between visions of the world we could have and the pressure of the real-estate dealers frantic to save existing values. The great money lenders—banks, insurance companies, and the government—balance their holdings in the existing order against the profit they might make from the machinery of change.

In the same press release in which Henry Kaiser promised America a prefabricated three-room house, completely furnished, insulated, equipped with all sanitary and disposal facilities, he said, "We've got millions of new homes to build after the war. What kind of homes? What will they look like? How will they be built? We've got to sit down and figure that out, and start doing it now."

Mr. Kaiser implied that we can build anything we want to—we have the men, materials, and techniques. That is, we can if enough of us want the same things. Prefabrication of houses is no new thing, but our war-time experience gives it greater certainty of success. For instance, there are more than a hundred prefabricators in business because the Division of Defense Housing back in 1940 believed in prefabrication and brought an industry into existence. Probably many of these companies were formed just to compete for government work. They were successful because hundreds of units all alike were ordered—just as Mr. Kaiser's ships are alike, and Fords, and Packards. It is an axiom that mass production is based on mass consumption of standard products.

Meeting post-war standards of a buying public, however, will be somewhat more difficult than supplying rented quarters for war workers desperate for any sort of shelter. In the first stages of the post-war market, of course, the prefabricator need only reproduce the pre-war type of house more cheaply than it could be built singly. Later we can hope that competition among the prefabricators in a narrowing market will bring basic improvements in living qualities. Anyone going into the building of prefabricated houses at present would study his market and discover that early manufacturers who tried to raise standards and at the same time obtain mass acceptance failed; he would therefore seek the least common denominator in the housing field. He would find that 69 per cent of American families want to own their own separate home. He would find that the symbol of home and security, as established by millions of advertisements and magazine illustrations, is a Cape Cod cottage. The desire for individuality, it appears, can be assuaged by as little as a change in door trim, a trellis, or a colored roof, and presents no technical difficulty.

However, he would be a little put out with the people who had told him that there was no difference between making an automobile by mass production and making a house. The automobile is built for a standard foundation supplied by the government—our great road system—and is driven up to a service station for fuel, water, and air; but a house is expected to blend with a varying terrain, and water, electricity, and a sewer connection must be brought to it. These improvements obviously are not so susceptible of discipline and prefabrication.

The future American community will forever owe a debt to those Washington site planners who have demonstrated that the revered practical engineers were wrong when they laid out a subdivision by first cutting down the trees and then dividing the land into rectangular lots and a gridiron pattern of streets. For years good designers have fought against this practice; the higher-priced developments, the green-belt towns, have been laid out in harmony with the land and nature. Now, in many spots scattered over the country, defense and war-housing projects have shown how charming planned housing can be on irregular wooded land where the site gives individuality to the repeated forms of houses that would be monotonous in the usual geometric pattern. The first costs of such planning are probably higher, but there is a saving of the money that would be subsequently spent by the hapless buyer in replanting a desecrated site.

Another lesson learned from war housing is the value of the community idea. War workers have needed planned community services, such as nurseries, clinics, schools, facilities for shopping and recreation, and it has been found that these crystallize a feeling of neighborliness and reestablish community responsibility in the most elementary unit of democracy. Incidentally, one great task of those who are to replan our cities will be to regroup and develop the services that form the nucleus of neighborhoods. The arrangement of these today is completely chaotic in most cities: the school is in one area, recreation in another, and the shopping district in still another.

Most current plans for prefabrication are concerned primarily with the structure or shell of the house, but the greatest advances in housing since the beginning of the century have been connected with the mechanical plant—the heating, plumbing, lighting, and other conveniences symbolic of our culture. These are the items which have been raising the cost of our homes; indeed, it has been said that we could still build an 1880 house for about its original cost if we did not include contemporary necessities. Manufacturers are probably planning more and fancier accessories for our post-war houses, but this trend should be checked, and perhaps the big prefabricating companies will have means to do so. In recent years the manufacturers of parts and fittings for houses have had almost exclusive access to national advertising and have disposed of vastly more capital for promotion than architects and builders. This has caused prospective home owners to view a house as a collection of glamorous details rather than as an organic whole.

An interesting example of the integration of what have in recent years been thought of as separate mechanisms is a compact new kitchen unit developed for war housing which heats the house and provides heat for cooking and hot water as well. It is new, but it is simply the logical development of the old-fashioned kitchen range. Undoubtedly, successful operators will pay increasing attention to the simplification of the heating, plumbing, and lighting systems and bring pressure on the parts manufacturers to comply with this trend. At the same time new inventions will create new demands. It is safe to predict that radiant heat will to some extent supplant air conditioning as an ideal in the popular mind, fluorescent lighting will require a fresh approach to the design of fixtures, and the television screen will demand changes in the lay-out of rooms.

A recurrent subject in any discussion of post-war building is the use of plastics. The Architectural Forum, probably the most progressive of the professional magazines, devoted its September, 1942, issue to stimulating interest in the possibilities of the post-war house. An expert engaged in promoting plastics in the domestic market was gratified to note the number of times plastics were specified for the house of the future but was dismayed to find the extremely low percentage of cases in which its use was valid. Plastics can be used in an amazing variety of ways, but they cannot be expected to substitute for everything, any more than cargo planes can be expected to supplant coal cars. The advertisers have sold America the idea of new materials; now industry faces the harder task of seeing that the materials are used intelligently. Unfortunately, most manufacturers follow the lead of a certain typical vice-president who listed a number of newly discovered synthetics and boasted that his company would be equally successful in creating needs for them. For consumers the real benefit of the great development of plastics will be its effect on the manufacturers of other materials. While the Forest Products Laboratory is developing a plastic ply-paper as strong as steel, the steel industry brings out alloys which enable it to produce an airplane only a few pounds heavier than an aluminum one; the forced expansion of aluminum production is going to bring the price of aluminum windows down to where they will compete with wooden ones. And so we come to the delightful prospect of choosing materials not on a basis of cost but on that of how well they perform a specific task.

No one can tell today what material any object will be made of in the future. The only safe prediction about the materials industry is that the struggle for the post-war market will exhaust the ideas of the advertising agencies and bring prosperity to the professional and trade building magazines.

The aristocratic craft unions—masons, carpenters, plasterers, electricians, and plumbers—have long been blamed for the high cost of building, and it is true that they have fought the use of power tools and new techniques. But by the end of this year it is predicted that only 400,000 men will be left at work on buildings, and on many of these projects mass-production methods are in full sway. On some defense-housing jobs carpenters are forbidden to have a saw with them—pre-cut parts must fit, and all that is needed is a hammer. The proportion of unskilled men on a job has greatly increased. It is interesting to speculate what effect the regular hours, industrial methods, and lower hourly rates of war jobs will have on men accustomed to high hourly pay but resigned to long lay-offs between jobs and to job stoppages caused by bad weather. Will the unions perhaps make a separate rate for large-scale projects and prefabrications when given reasonable assurance of continuous work, while maintaining the higher rates for jobs put up in the old craft way? On what ground can the unions reestablish their bans against the labor-saving techniques they have had to use during the war?

Many persons consider a revision of our various building codes a fundamental condition of post-war building activity. Certainly most codes are outworn, capable of diverse interpretations which result in graft for many building inspectors, and so drawn as to hold back the use of new materials and techniques. Here again wartime practice has caused the suspension of many laws and may open the way for reasonable changes. With revision of the law should come greater power for some of our planning commissions, which often have only advisory status. Unless there is some intelligent control over the growth of our communities, our new building boom will result in more slums and blighted areas.

If we continue to solve the exciting problem of using our myriad materials and titanic productive forces by cramming gadgets into structures considered beautiful because they simulate inherited forms, we shall fail in our purpose. Our designers must join forces with the sociologist, the physician, and scientists in many other fields to discover the physical and psychological needs of men in communities. Then they must be free to evolve new forms based on use, and these will be the beauty of our time. Organized research of this type is virtually nonexistent compared to the study of historical and abstract art carried on in our subsidized foundations. Architecture is said to be the true picture of the social and economic forces of an era. In the century of the common man architecture should culminate in the common man's dwelling.

In the Wind

GENERAL MILLS and eight or ten other corporations have pulled out of the National Association of Manufacturers because of Chairman William P. Witherow's recent speech in which he spoke sneeringly of a "TVA on the Danube" and "a quart of milk for every Hottentot."

THE SPANISH Library of Information, official Phalangist propaganda bureau, has closed its New York office, but Gaytan y Ayala, its director, carries on as press attaché of the Spanish embassy. The Phalangist newspaper Nueva España, published in New York, informs its readers that for 30 cents per half-ounce they can communicate by air mail with Germany, Italy, and occupied France as well as Spain, with the Spanish embassy playing post office.

MONTGOMERY, WARD is advertising in the Chicago Tribune for "active, strong girls," aged seventeen to twenty-eight. "When you work at Ward's," it adds as an inducement, "you may or may not join a union, as you prefer."

A MICHIGAN school superintendent recently protested to the legislature about the small appropriations for education, but John P. Espie, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, put him in his place. "The old people of the state are receiving $22 per month pension, which is ridiculous," Mr. Espie wrote. "Please compare that with the salary received by the school teachers of Michigan. The trouble with you school people, you can only see your problem."

IN A NAZI BROADCAST aimed at America, Robert Best has announced his intention to run for the Presidency of the United States in 1944. "Best for President" clubs, says Best, are already springing up all over the country. The only American newspaperman who chose to stay in Germany after war was declared, Best suggested in a recent broadcast that one Jew be killed for every German soldier who falls on the Russian front.

A COAL DEALER in Atlanta displays in his main office a plaque bearing the names of employees in the armed forces. There are two separate lists. One is marked "Colored."

STANDARD RADIO, a Chicago corporation, now offers radio stations a collection of transcriptions carrying "authentic battle sounds of World War II."

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE committee on publications is fighting a proposed California law which would permit public-health officials to treat venereal diseases in children more than fourteen years old without consent of their parents. The committee holds that such a law would invalidate that section of the state Venereal Disease Act which permits treatment of such diseases by prayer.

E. J. GARNER, now under indictment for conspiracy to undermine the morale of the armed forces, is still publishing leaflets. His latest states, "If Jews do go daffy and murder somebody who is opposing communism, like is being talked about these days, then pogroms will break out in this country of ours overnight."

CANDOR: The Syracuse, New York, Herald-Journal, a staunchly Republican paper, reports that Republican leaders in Albany are disappointed at the number of Democrats "frozen into lucrative state civil-service jobs," and suggests—in a news item, not an editorial—a way to get around the difficulty. "If the Republicans really want to go gunning for jobs now supposedly beyond the patronage veil," it says with a fine Republican flair for metaphor, "they could do so by having legislation enacted changing titles and duties. This would oust the incumbents, and the jobs could be restored under new titles."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Report Out of Spain

I. Politics and War

THE departure from Spain of José Rodríguez Vega, secretary of the General Workers' Union (U. G. T.), has thrown new light on the situation of the country under the Franco regime. Vega's escape from the fascist terror is one of the most amazing in recent years. Because of his position he was probably the most important trade-union leader left in Spain at the end of the war. He was of course thrown into prison by Franco's police, and would undoubtedly have been executed had it not been for the extraordinary coincidence that another anti-fascist with an identical name had been shot almost immediately after the entrance of Franco into Madrid. Through that confusion of names Vega ultimately succeeded in obtaining his release and then disappeared into obscurity. Toward the end of November, 1942, he crossed the frontier into Portugal. Eventually he came to the United States on his way to Mexico, where he has just arrived.

Of course this whole experience implies a series of collaborations about which I shall give no information but which prove how deeply the Franco regime is undermined.

"The whole thing is falling to pieces," Rodríguez Vega told me. "If this afternoon," he continued, looking at one of the newspapers I carried, "a big headline were to appear announcing that Franco had fallen, I should not be at all surprised." (By profession Vega is a printer, and what astonished him most about the American press was the huge headlines in the evening papers.)

"But even with Hitler backing him up?"

"Others back him up as much as Hitler," replied Rodríguez Vega. "The men who are his best support today are Ambassadors Hoare and Hayes."

The Republican opposition in Spain cannot understand the American Ambassador. Some people seek an explanation in the fact that he is a Catholic. He is considered one of the pawns in the great maneuver initiated by the visit of Myron Taylor to Rome—undoubtedly one of the most fascinating and well-kept secrets in the diplomacy of World War II. But even viewed from this angle, the activities of Mr. Hayes astonish them. Why, they ask, should he be allowed to go so far merely to please the Catholic church, which after three years of beatific neutrality has suddenly come forward to promote peace and plan the post-war world?

"Certainly the people most surprised by the assiduous courtship of Franco by the great democratic powers," said Vega, "are the group who surround him. They know how weak they are inside their own country. They go on from day to day, uncertain of their survival. But when they hear Ambassador Hayes speak, they must say to themselves: 'Heaven knows we count for little here in Spain, but in London and Washington we are really somebody!' What else can they think when they hear the American Ambassador say that political refugees will have no voice in the political future of Spain? Everyone knows that the refugees and the people fighting against Franco in Spain are an unbreakable unity, that the political parties and the trade unions are largely in exile. There was a time when every film coming from Mexico—no matter how bad it might be—was furiously applauded in Spain. The reason was that Mexico is the country which has accepted more Spanish refugees than any other." (Even from the pan-American point of view, the attitude of Ambassador Hayes is a little hard to understand.)

Dozens of precise details reported by Vega confirm the deterioration of the Franco regime on which The Nation has insisted for three years. We have felt it from a distance, but Rodríguez Vega has followed it on the spot day by day. He tells, for instance, of the effect produced by a sensational document about Franco which appeared not long ago. The publication of anti-Franco literature is in itself nothing sensational. The underground, which operates with surprising regularity in Spain, has its periodicals and its pamphlets. The Socialists publish a small news bulletin three times a week. Mundo Obrero, organ of the Communists, and other publications make up a comparatively large illegal literature. But the novelty in the document on Franco was the fact that it came from the inner circles of the regime. Even names were mentioned. One of them was that of Pedro Sainz Rodríguez, a Monarchist professor and banker who was in Franco's Cabinet during the war.

In the document Franco is directly accused of several things: of having collaborated with the Republic (he had held one of the highest military posts under the reactionary government of Lerroux-Gil Robles in 1934); of not having supported the Sanjurjo plot against the Republic in 1932; of having hesitated to participate in the revolt of 1936, presenting himself in Africa only after the movement had triumphed there—a rather strange accusation since Franco, in collaboration with the Germans and Italians, was undoubtedly one of the chief organizers of the revolt. Even on purely military grounds he is denied credit for the defeat of the Republic. Franco, says the document, is a good "division general" but nothing more. The success of the rebellion is largely attributed to General Vigón, a former officer of the General Staff and at present Minister of Air, a man close to the Bourbons. This "build-up" of Vigón is not without interest, since he, together with Varela and Yagüe, has been suggested as chief of the cabinet of generals which might eventually replace Franco.

According to Vega there are certain informed persons in Spain who foresee a development of the situation along these lines: first, a junta of generals which would succeed Franco and definitely eliminate the Falanx from the political direction of the country. Later, a slow return to normality. Finally, and inevitably, a restoration of the Republic. The monarchists' hour has passed. If a monarchy continues to seem the ideal solution to Sir Samuel Hoare, it commands less and less support within the country—despite the fact that an emissary, recently arrived from Switzerland, circulated in underground groups a message from Don Juan saying that the first thing he would do when he assumed power would be to grant a complete amnesty and invite all refugees to return to Spain. (On this point he goes a little farther than Ambassador Hayes!)

In this as in all projects of political change the chief object is the elimination of the Falanx. All the currents of discontent converge against the Falanx. It is the only enemy that counts. Vega confirms the interpretation given in these columns to the latest changes in the Council of the Falanx. The Falanx was strengthened, not weakened, by those changes. Its position now is more solid than it was before the crisis in which Serrano Suñer was dropped as Foreign Minister. And it is the growing opposition to the Falanx which has recently led certain military elements to make contact with the underground—opposition both to the Falanx and to the prospect of being plunged into war on the side of Hitler.

During Vega's period of hiding there were several occasions when involvement in the war seemed imminent. The last was on November 10 just after the American troops had landed in North Africa. The underground was one of the first to perceive the danger of a Nazi move and the first to take steps to meet it.

This is what the people who fight illegally in Spain, and who are always on guard against a Nazi coup, cannot understand. They cannot understand why the Allies, who could easily have established an unequivocal political situation in Spain, preferred to perpetuate a regime which Hitler may well use to jeopardize their position in the Mediterranean. It would have been so easy to avoid that risk by withdrawing support from Franco and allowing their allies, the Spanish people, to reestablish the Republic. On one point Vega is absolutely positive: Hitler can never march through Spain without the complicity of the Spanish administration. If one day the Nazis should enter Spain and Franco should feign surprise and adopt a pose of opposition, his attitude would be as farcical as that of Pétain when he gave the order to Frenchmen to resist the total occupation of France.

Hitler's Three Favorite War Horses Start a Peace Drive

Drawing by A. Hoffmeister

The reasons for the rapid decline of the Franco regime are manifold. Vega confirms many of the points made by Thomas J. Hamilton in his recent book, "Appeasement's Child: The Franco Regime in Spain." In speaking of the repression Vega gives a much higher estimate of the number of victims than we had previously heard. Nearly two and a half million persons, he says, in one way or another—through executions, prisons, concentration camps, disciplinary battalions, temporary arrests—have experienced "Franco justice."

Industrialists and business men who supported and financed Franco now blame the Phalanx for the stagnation of certain industries. That some of these industries are paralyzed as a consequence of the repression is admitted in Franco's own press. In one issue of Arriba which Vega brought with him this comment was made: "The relative paralysis of mining is partly due to the number of miners who are in prison." The industrialists also begin to blame the foreign policy of the Phalanx for the scarcity of raw materials that keeps many of their factories closed. "Of course," they say, "as long as Spain stands with the Germans, England and the United States will not send raw materials and food here—and they are the only countries which have them." (Perhaps when Vega left Spain the flood of oil and other materials had not arrived in the quantities recently reported by Ambassador Hayes; or, more likely, they had arrived and gone directly to Franco's army and to Nazi Germany.)

Farmers, too, suffer. Apart from the general crisis, the demoralization of the regime has transformed the agrarian reforms into a comedy. When a landowner gets beyond his depth in debt and has no idea how to pay off his mortgage, he uses his influence with the Ministry of Agriculture, which buys his farm at a handsome price with public funds. The farm is then distributed among the peasants with the blessing of the priest and speeches praising the virtues of the new "Catholic socialism."

Those who still eat in Spain eat thanks to the estraperlo. (The estraperlo is a popular slang expression for racketeering.) One day in Madrid a couple of women were arrested for selling sausages and cold cuts in the black market. Hauled into the office of the district chief of police, one of the women said: "You can put me in jail, but in your house nobody will eat meat. Your wife buys all her meat through me." And she was very sure of gaining her freedom.

The estraperlo plays a role in the field of raw materials, too. No one can buy steel or wood or cement except through the estraperlo. Obviously, under such circumstances, it is impossible to budget the expenses of any enterprise. The leading estraperlistas are, of course, the Phalangists themselves. They, and in lesser degree officers of the army, civil servants, and so on, must have money not only to cover the inflated expenses of living but to take care of their amusements. In Spain few things have been rebuilt, but never were there more cafes and cabarets open in Madrid. There, a package of Lucky Strikes costs $2.50, a cocktail $3, and a pair of Nylon stockings, rarely obtainable, $35. The only free commodity is the slogan "Long Live Franco"—but very few people use it.

A. DEL V.

[A second part of this report, to appear next week, will deal with life in the Spanish prisons and the activities of the underground.]

Program for Austria

BY JULIUS DEUTSCH

AFTER a couple of years of obscurity, Austria became a front-page story again a few months ago. The immediate cause of this renewed interest was nothing that Austrians could feel enthusiastic about. It was the creation of an Austrian Battalion in the American army, and the reinstatement of its "appointed commander," Otto of Hapsburg, as favorite of Washington and New York society. Through Otto, some people became very pro-Austrian again. Of course, they supported an Austria that had as little to do with the true Austria as the one constructed from Viennese music, operettas, and moving pictures. They forgot the small bourgeoisie, the workers, and the peasant masses—the backbone of the country.

Forming as they do the overwhelming majority of the population, the workers and peasants have given their impress to Austrian politics, which are for that reason much simpler than the outside world imagines. There have always been only two big parties—the Social Democratic Party, representing the workers, and the Christian Social Party, in essence a peasant party but including also the conservative middle class.

In the last free elections, in 1932, the Social Democratic Party received 42 per cent of the votes cast, the Christian Socialists 36 per cent. Together, the two parties controlled more than three-fourths of the seats in Parliament. The rest were divided among the Great Germany Party, the National German Agrarians, and the fascist Heimwehr. Neither the Communists nor the Monarchists, it should be noted, ever succeeded in winning a single seat of the 165 in the Austrian Parliament.

As long as the two big parties remained halfway at peace, the small splinter groups in Parliament had no importance. The impetus to change came from outside. To extend his sphere of influence in the Danube region Mussolini bought and paid for certain ambitious Austrian politicians. One of these was Prince Rüdiger von Starhemberg, who says himself in his memoirs that he received a total of 3,600,000 schillings. With this Italian money mercenaries were hired and weapons procured, and soon the "political movement" represented by the Heimwehr was supported by a private army.

The Christian Socialists, led by Dollfuss, then committed the unpardonable sin of making an alliance with the fascist Heimwehr. This fatal act was the primary cause of the destruction of Austrian democracy and the ruin of Austria itself. From 1934 to 1938 Mussolini ruled the Danube region. Soon, however, Hitler forced Mussolini to take a back seat; the Third Reich established its supremacy in Central Europe; and Austria, five years ago next week, ceased to exist as an independent state.

The foregoing brief survey brings us to the question of what developments we may expect in Austrian politics after the end of the Second World War. In my opinion the situation will not be much more difficult than it was in 1918. The two great classes that gave the Austrian Republic its character will still exert a decisive influence on affairs. The only probable change will be a further reduction of the bourgeoisie's political importance, which even in the old days was very slight.

The complexity of the Austrian problem derives, therefore, not from the country's internal politics, but from its relations to foreign powers. At the end of the First World War Austria was reduced over night from a great to a small power. In order to live it had to lean, politically and economically, on one of its neighbors. I was a member of the government at that time, and I could tell many a tale about the difficulties we encountered in trying to reach satisfactory understandings with the states that had formerly been part of Austria-Hungary. For that reason Anschluss with Germany seemed the best, one might say the most natural, solution. In Parliament the proposal found unanimous acceptance. And not only in Parliament; the great majority of the people saw no other solution for the nation's thousand and one problems. There was no opposition to Anschluss.

This statement may not be welcome to every ear today. But it defines the political situation at the end of the First World War and points to what, after the Second, will be the crucial problem of the Danube region.

When the United Nations have overthrown Hitler, they are likely to undo everything that the Nazis did by force. Since Austria was obviously a victim of Nazi violence, they will annul the Anschluss and try to restore the conditions that existed prior to March, 1938. But no such negative action will solve the Austrian

FROM BERLIN AND ROME

Berlin broadcast to North America: "Spain is not to be won over by Churchill or Roosevelt blandishments or promises of enriched economic life. If the red peril really threatens Europe, Spain as a nation can be counted upon to join the ranks of the half-dozen European countries which are fighting against this peril. Spain has already sent many thousands of Spanish volunteers and workers who are fighting on the eastern front and working in the factories of Germany."

Fernandez Cuesta, new Spanish ambassador in Rome, in an interview in Gazeta del Popolo, Rome: "There can be no doubt concerning Spain's attitude toward the Bolshevik menace. Spain more than any other country has had an opportunity to experience the criminal tactics of a Communist revolution, and therefore when the European campaign against the barbarism of Moscow commenced, many thousands of Spaniards volunteered for service."

problem. Nor will material aid to the Austrian people suffice, important as it may be to prevent a continuing economic crisis in the heart of Europe. The new order in the Danube region must not only relieve Austrian distress but remove possible causes of a future war. It is no accident that both the First World War and the Second really started in Central Europe.

In a region which contains so many seeds of conflict how can a lasting peace be established? The answer is, through a federation of the Danube states in the frame of a general European federation.

The first condition of a Danube federation is that it be composed of states that are all equally democratic. A country ruled by a landed aristocracy like Hungary, for example, could not enter into a real union with a democracy. Half-feudal states and liberal democracies would never be able to agree on the vital question of the federal government's prerogatives. Yet a union of states must be given power in order to exercise power. Fortunately, the sharp trend to the left throughout Central Europe which will follow the overthrow of fascist rule will prepare the various states to renounce their sovereign rights. A second condition of a Danube federation is that all the component countries have a republican form of government. The Hapsburgs left behind such a heritage of hate that their restoration is unthinkable.

The positive goal for the time immediately after the collapse of Nazi power will therefore be to restore the democratic-republican constitution in Austria, to set up a strong government of workers and peasants, and to secure Austria's collaboration with its neighbors in a democratic Danube federation which will be part of a European federation.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

WITH growing vehemence and frequency Germans are being told that they cannot count on England and America to save them from eventual bolshevization. Quite the contrary. Washington and London have already definitely promised the Russians that Germany shall belong to them. In this respect the two Anglo-Saxon powers are only—Herr Fritzsche first used the phrase on February 10—"Russia's auxiliaries." To hammer this fact in, countless "open avowals that they intend to deliver Europe over to bolshevism" have been fabricated. Proof of America's purpose is found in articles alleged to be by the journalist Constantine Brown, "Roosevelt's expert on European affairs," and by Walter Lippmann, "Roosevelt's speaking trumpet." The English point of view is represented by the British ambassador at Moscow, and especially by Lord Beaverbrook, to whom is attributed the statement: "Anybody is crazy who sees a danger to Europe in bolshevization" (Fritzsche).

Of course the Jews are said to be behind it all. "Capitalism and bolshevism are not opposites but are both a form of Jewish domination." If they can't have open capitalistic tyranny, the Jews are perfectly content to have "capitalistic tyranny in the guise of bolshevism" (Goebbels on February 18). Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin, the three representatives of the Jews, have now reached an agreement on how the world shall be divided up after the war: Europe shall be Jewish-bolshevist; the rest of the world Jewish-plutocratic. Therefore, Germans, no one will save you from what you dread unless you do it yourselves! "Great Britain and the United States are not only in no position to protect Europe from bolshevism; they have no intention of trying" (Fritzsche). Defend yourselves unto death!

There is some risk, of course, in this method of whipping up the people to action. The effect might just as well be to paralyze them. If everyone outside Germany is agreed that they are to be bolshevized, what is the use of struggling? However, the expectation is that it will work the other way.

A new police force, in addition to the many others that already exist, has been organized by Herr Himmler in the villages and farming regions. It is called the Landwacht, or country guard. Its members do not wear a uniform but have an armband, and their duties are not a full-time job but are performed in connection with their usual occupations. It is clear that the new force was organized to deal with the many foreign workmen and prisoners of war now in the Reich. These do not work in gangs in the field, nor are they behind bars. They could easily shirk, or skip out, or now and then steal food and clothing, or even attempt Rassenschande. The danger has grown as the number of foreign helots in Germany has increased; this is said to have risen from 6,000,000 in September, including war prisoners, to 11,000,000 today. So a new army of guards has been formed—and that reminds us that little net profit is derived from this slave labor. Whatever it may be worth in itself, it pins down a very considerable amount of German man-power. The thousands of barracks in which the forced workers live behind barbed wire must be guarded; escort platoons must conduct the men to their place of work and bring them back; in the factories the foreigners are divided into cells of ten men over each of which is placed a German supervisor.

Moreover, every foreign worker is made the special responsibility of a German worker, and in this relationship the language difficulty has been felt with devastating force. The Nazi government hoped at first to overcome the difficulty through "organization." Compulsory lessons in the German language were given in the barracks after working hours, but there was a lack of books and teachers and, on the part of the pupils, a lack not only of good-will but, after ten, twelve, or fourteen hours of work on an inadequate diet, of vitality. The speech lessons were a fiasco; and we know, for example, that the I. G. Farben-Industrie, the chemical trust, has abandoned them completely. In their stead this firm has experimented with a primer, a very elementary illustrated primer such as children might use, which is given to every foreign worker. This primer contains only the fifty most important words in the German language, in their simplest form. For example, no attention is paid to the conjugation of verbs; the infinitive alone is given—ich sein, du sein, er sein, and so forth. But even this has not seemed to work. And the inability of the workers to understand one another, according to reports, has caused countless stoppages, mistakes, and conflicts. Not the least serious of the consequences is the way the German hands—overworked, physically reduced, and nervous—suffer from the irritations that continually arise.

These things explain in part why the millions of foreign forced workers provide such inadequate relief for the German man-power situation.

Correction

An error occurred in a statement appearing in the article entitled Sikorski's Opposition, by Peter Davenport, in the issue of January 30. The statement asserted that Edward Weintal is "now on the pay roll of the Yugoslav ambassador, Constantin Fotich." The word "now" appeared in the quoted phrase as the result of an editorial slip. During the visit of King Peter of Yugoslavia to the United States in the summer of 1942, Mr. Weintal conducted the King's press relations but is no longer serving in that capacity. He is at present employed by the Office of War Information.

BOOKS and the ARTS

YEATS: THE IMAGE AND THE BOOK

BY MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

THE felicity of the life of a genius can never be recognized until after the event of his achievement. His work alone justifies his acts and gifts and supports a propter hoc on his fortunes. "The private history of any sincere work looms large with its own completeness," said James; and it is this retrospective logic of greatness that is most passionately envied by common men. Once the validity or strength of the artist's work is clear, every chance or mischance of his career, every risk or peril that deforms or defeats the average existence, takes on the justice of destiny, the beatitude of his vocation. Form is imposed on the chaos or confusion of experience; life receives the stamp of purpose and of permanence. So the dark night of Hopkins or Rilke rivals the sun's fine weather of Goethe; the agony of Baudelaire becomes more enviable than the serenity of Ronsard; Blake's madness proves as sane as Wordsworth's sobriety; Rimbaud snatches from defeat a triumph surer than Hugo's. To loom large in the dimensions of art is so great a passion in men that even those who fear or despise it are willing to submit to its price in indignity or embarrassment if they may share in its endurance. "Seven cities warr'd for Homer, being dead"; the citizens of three English towns competed for the immortality of surviving as the swine of Dickens's Tatan-swill; statesmen claim a share in the tragedies of Poe and Dostoevski; men and women of impregnable respectability sue for the honor of having been vilified by Heine or seduced by Byron. Redeem us, they plead, from our safety, our boredom, and our nonentity. Proust's law touches all of us: "Life as it flows is so much time wasted, and nothing can ever be recovered or truly possessed save under the form of eternity which is also the form of art."

An age as baffled and demoralizing as ours makes men more anxious than ever to recover themselves from its waste and stupidity by possessing an identity in the work of its image-makers and heroes of form. The impulse may be tragic: witness its results in the worship of demagogues and symbolic leaders. It may also be more happily regenerative: we live half our lives in the world that Mann or Proust, Eliot or Rilke, has arrested and made solid under our feet. Thus the great appeal of the work of Yeats, with its supreme testimony of personal salvation in an age of confusion and defeats. His poetry in its sixty-year evolution and triumph is already a document on its times; now that the life out of which it issued is complete, his career becomes more than ever an object of envious attention and analysis. Joseph Hone's biography*—the first full record of Yeats's life thus far attempted—is certainly one of the most enthralling books the year is likely to see.

Of the two difficulties that alternately harass the biog-

raphers of poets—the embarrassment of poverty that comes of finding little or nothing in the life to account for the poetry, the rarer embarrassment of riches that comes of finding too much—the historian of Yeats obviously works under the second. His problem is further complicated by the fact that Yeats anticipated him, in verse, prose, and autobiographies, at every point of his task. Yeats took his life, almost from the beginning, as "an experiment that needs analysis and record" ("at least my generation so valued personality that it thought so"); he sought "an image not a book"—the continuous vitality of symbolic experience and action, not the tact and decorum of a purposive career ("Self-interest and self-preservation," said his greatest teacher, his father, "are the death of poetry"). His energies were held in tension between purpose and instinct: between seeking his spiritual victory in "an intellectual daily re-creation of all that exterior fate snatches away" and making an art that should be "a fountain jetting from the entire hopes, memories, and sensations of the body." ("I must," he wrote in his diary in 1909, "keep one note from leading to another that I may not surrender myself to literature. . . . Neither Christ nor Buddha nor Socrates wrote a book, for to do that is to exchange life for a logical process.") He took it as his supreme task to "understand why there is a deep enmity between a man and his destiny, and why a man loves nothing but his destiny." The life he lived exists in two realities: historical and imaginative, actual and symbolic, book and image. It is with both those realities—with their mutual necessity, their complementary existence—that every biographer or critic of Yeats is taxed, and every reader faced, if Yeats's value for the men of his time is to be realized.

It is the book of Yeats's life rather than its image that Mr. Hone has set himself to write, as it was the symbolic image, in its fullest derivation and reference, that concerned Mr. MacNeice in his recent study of the poetry.* The work of biography could hardly, at this early stage of Yeats's posthumous history, have fallen into abler hands than Mr. Hone's. His skill and tact—already seen in his excellent "Life of George Moore" six years ago, a better book than this one by virtue of its simpler subject and freer conditions—here work under official privileges which, though they have imposed inhibitions that make the poet's later career obscure at a good many points, will be enjoyed by none of his successors. What Keats said of Shakespeare is far more explicitly true of Yeats: he led a life of allegory upon which his work is the comment. Mr. Hone resumes the full record:

* "W. B. Yeats: 1866-1939." By Joseph Hone. The Macmillan Company, $4.

"The Poetry of W. B. Yeats." By Louis MacNeice. Oxford University Press, $2.50.

childhood in Dublin and Sligo among those "old fathers" and "half-legendary men" of the West—Butlers, Pollexfens, Corbets, Middletons; school days in Dublin and London with Yeats's father as a mentor in wisdom and sympathy apparently unrivaled among the fathers of poets (happily Mr. Hone is soon to publish a collection of the letters and papers of this superb individualist); the eighties and nineties in London and Paris, where Yeats was divided between the "tragic generation"—Dowson, Wilde, Johnson—and those people of "militant action"—Morris, Henley, O'Leary, Shaw, Maud Gonne, the Parnellites—who were preparing the future; the return to Ireland, a dramatic moment in modern literature, to join with Lady Gregory, Martyn, Moore, and Synge in the battles of the Abbey Theater; the return to the larger world and to a poetry of responsibilities; the drama of 1916, of civil war, and of the new Free State; marriage at fifty-two; the final creative phase announced by "The Tower"; and the apotheosis of old age. To what was already familiar in this history Mr. Hone adds many details: we learn the importance to Yeats's thought or verse of mystics like W. T. Horton, Mohini Chatterji, and MacGregor Mathers the cabalist; of T. W. Rolleston, Ian Hamilton, Thomas Davis, Olivia Shakespeare, and Mabel Beardsley; of the women who so decisively influenced Yeats's character (though here the facts are cautiously shrouded); of the conflicting politics of Maud Gonne, the Parnellites, the Unionists, the Treaty party, and the O'Duffy Blueshirts with whom he temporized in his last decade. Yeats saw his friends and enemies in a hierarchy of values; and the pageant of these people—"Ireland's history in their lineaments"—furnishes not only a drama of causes unrivaled in modern poetic experience but an annotation of the materials whereby Yeats substantiated and tested the conceptions his imaginative and philosophical experiments were yielding him.

His life has a greater import than that of its rich opportunities and contacts. It is an emblem of modern experience, a parable of intellectual and moral exoneration in an age of unstable thought, "skeptical faith," and moral irresponsibility and evasion. The shape his career assumes is the shape imposed on it not only by his experiments in art, thought, and action, but by the conflict of personal will at grips with the typically modern passivity to fate and historical necessity which he saw as an evil of his times. His art is so brilliant and compelling that it tends to make his readers impose an excessive justice, a kind of ex post facto idealism, on his experience and ideas; but this tendency, which may often go to extremes, is countered by another: the critical repudiation of Yeats's way of art and thought—the acceptance of his poetry without admitting the truth of the forces and conditions that brought it into being. One review of Mr. Hone's book has already stressed Yeats as "ignorant of philosophy" and has presented as literal his statement in "A Vision" that his symbolic system may be regarded as "stylistic arrangements of experience" that "have helped me to hold in a single thought reality and justice." Another has announced that Yeats "never thought well" and that, while their "transmutation into poetry" is convincing, "his excursions into Berkeley and Plotinus, his attempts to rebut Bertrand Russell, his gleeful infatuation with viscous Oriental mysticism are pathetic." All this comes from the contemporary habit of looking on beliefs and spiritual processes as mainly if not wholly instrumental, justified only after the fact of their utility or stimulus is demonstrated in a result. It tends to be the stress made by Mr. MacNeice in his highly resourceful and suggestive study, which interprets Yeats from the vantage-point of a "reality" of which he was largely innocent but which a later generation has at its disposal; and it reappears in Mr. Auden's review of the Hone book when he says that "Yeats's temptation—he never succumbed to it completely—to regard art as a religious ritual damages the art, for it prevents the artist from taking serious risks of failure. Magnificent as is their diction, I cannot but feel that his poems lack a certain inner resonance. Each exists solidly enough in its frame of reference, but rarely transcends it. Comparing his poetry with that, for instance, of T. S. Eliot and Robert Graves, I find it, beautiful as it is, lacking in seriousness, which, of course, has nothing to do with solemnity."

This point is serious and it is legitimately raised, but its implication must be clarified. Yeats's work undoubtedly lacks a fully convincing "architectonic" (to revive Arnold's word for it), a consistent and applicable structure of belief and reference; the structure it has often appears strategic, provisional, eclectic, and unstable except in terms of a personal need and imperative. I mean to join in no aspersions on Yeats's verse—to me it is inferior to nothing in modern literature—when I admit that its empirical provisionality keeps it from having the integrated seriousness, superior to both personal and historical emotion, that is the strength of Eliot's. Of this lack—but also of the compensating zeal, energy, and sincerity of his interests—Yeats's life supplies an explanation: he was aesthetic in his origins and temperament, he did accept Johnson's idea of ritual well past the age when such consciousness of function and attitude can remain safely overt in a poet, he did risk the laming of his faculties and the enervation of his motives by constant manipulation and curiosity, and his achievement is in a serious degree a victory over wilful indulgences of temperament and sensation. Yeats knew he had to grow from sensation to emotion, from reverie to thought, from passivity to action, from aestheticism to art, and the growth is as much marked by intention as by natural maturity. The growth was personal, sensible, moral, before it was anything else—historical, philosophical, critical. But to deprive it of reality or seriousness is to set up a paradox between Yeats's character and his poetry that admits no solution: if the poetry is real, sound, and true, the experience and "thinking" out of which it issued must be so likewise; and if they are not, it is not.

Yeats would never admit thinking to be an exclusive prerogative of the intellect; it must be a process and occupation of the whole man and of the objects to which his thought is applied—his actions, his friends and enemies, the cones and gyres of "A Vision" that describe the processes of history, good and evil alike. His father once praised a man because he "loved humanity too much to hate any man, and knew too much of history to hate any opinion." Yeats "studied hatred" and cultivated "rage," but however valuable he felt them in his creative life, he knew there is a love that transcends them and without which knowledge, sympathy, justice, and wisdom are impossible. This is perhaps not the moment to hope that such a counsel will be adopted by civilized men; an uncivilized work must first be finished. But to those who tend to regard squeamishly Yeats's ideas of history, of the aristocratic principle, and of what many are now emphasizing as his "proto-fascist sympathies," it may be a good moment to suggest that unless Yeats's doctrine is resorted to after present disasters are put by, we may entertain little hope of emerging from "the growing murderousness of the world" or the anarchy of righteousness that has brought it about. Yeats's realities are the realities of our human capacity for vitality and sincerity; his resonance is that of the poetic integrity, whose imagination includes philosophy. If the framework of his thought and insights deprives him, through its specialized symbolism, of taking a place among the very greatest poets, it nevertheless establishes him as a poet preeminent in modern times for his sense of the moral wholeness of humanity and history.

Yeats's life has the superb advantages of its drama and its heroism. But before we claim the drama and heroism as our own, with the easy vicariousness which his poetry encourages, we should do well to remember that they are the achievements of a man who had the power of shaping and controlling them, who wrought them and the poetry that expresses them out of ordeal, division, and a full share of bitterness. It is also necessary to remember that the success of art is never easy. Yeats's life may appear felicitous now that his work is done, but its felicity will prove misleading and his poetry deluding if we imagine that we can enjoy them by assuming our own superiority, as thinkers, realists, and exponents of justice, to the man on whom it fell to prove that his life was fortunate and his talent genuine. There was nothing unreal or facile about that task. And it would be the last irony if Yeats, who hated abstraction, should end by having an abstraction made of his art through its divorce from the truth of his experience and the reality of the thought and imagination out of which it grew.

The Spirit of Norway

THE MOUNTAIN WAITS. By Theodor Broch. St. Paul, Minnesota: Webb Book Publishing Company. $3.

THEY CAME AS FRIENDS. By Tor Myklebost. Translated by Trygve M. Ager. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

HERE are two books on the Norway that cannot be conquered. One is a workmanlike presentation of the record of Norway's fight. The other is a recreation of Norway as it lived and struggled and dreamed in the ten years before the war and as it took the invasion. Myklebost is the competent journalist. Broch is the creative writer. One can be read without the other. Both can be read without duplication.

Broch has taken his own little corner and his personal experience and let the tale unfold itself from that angle. His little corner is a small town in northern Norway which gained world renown in 1939 and may reach the headlines any day again: Narvik, the port from which Sweden's valuable iron ore used to be shipped abroad. He arrived in this town in June, 1930, to hang out his shingle as a lawyer. A married young man of less than thirty years, he settled down without much ado to make a living. To read his modest story, you would not realize that he also happened to be one of the burning young idealists who were helping to make Norway a country of social progress and decent living for everybody. It comes as a surprise to the reader, as it apparently came as a surprise to Broch himself, when the workers of the town decided that this youngster was just the man to be elected Mayor of Narvik.

Broch is a lawyer and he is political-minded. He does not miss anything in telling about the development of his law practice. Nor does he miss anything in describing the social structure and politics of the town and countryside, not even the links between this distant spot of human habitation and world events which deprived the people of the town of their livelihood during the world economic crisis in the early thirties and brought seeming prosperity as the great military powers started pouring in ships to get out Swedish iron ore from across the mountains. His description of the invasion and the invader, of the fighting and the civilian resistance, is meticulous.

But it is all incidental to his main tale, a human story about the people, about friends and family, of Ellen, his wife, and of little Siri, their daughter, both of whom he had to leave behind as he fled from a death sentence, and who were later to meet him in the Middle West of this country, where his book most appropriately has found its publisher. And the Norseman from the land of the Midnight Sun, but above all of weeks and months of winter darkness, tells more than a human story. He tells a story full of humor. Broch relates how one Major Quisling arrived in Narvik late in 1938: "He had just resigned from active military service to devote himself to his philosophical and political studies and was to give a lecture in the Temperance Hall. A rather large group attended. It had been a long time since a circus had been in town." Broch tells of the rescue of the British consular officials who during the invasion had lived in a tool shed in the mountains. One of them knew Norwegian, but the others had pretended to be deaf-mutes when people happened by. After the naval battle of April 13 the cabin had been packed with German sailors who raged and cursed at the British; and Consul Gibbs, shaking his head and smiling, had poured coffee for the uninvited guests. Typically good-natured and dumb Norwegians, the Germans must have thought as they enjoyed the coffee.

At one stage of the invasion Mayor Broch took a German prisoner. "The corporal clicked his heels and declared himself to be my personal prisoner," writes Broch. "I clicked my own heels a little to make it official. But I am afraid I scratched my head in a rather unmilitary fashion. What was I going to do with the poor devil? When I just asked him to disappear, the corporal regained his dignity to a considerable extent and asked for a receipt for his pistol. I became brusque once more and tried to look as mad as a colonel at morning parade. What? Did he not know the simplest war rules? Baggage checks are not issued in such instances!"

Broch has now enlisted and is back in the firing line in the British Isles. His wife and little girl are still with us in the United States and may treasure with us one of the finest literary monuments to the spirit of the Norwegians.

Myklebost has done an entirely different job. Although he lived through the two months of actual warfare on Norwegian soil and a good part of the occupation period, his person does not appear. His ambition has clearly been to provide a faithful record of Norway's fight as a whole. He does not presume to be the historian of the epoch. He is journalistic in his presentation of the facts. But they are the facts. And the facts are enriched by the experience of an eyewitness and participant. Here is the story of the workers' organizations, the teachers, the clergy, the members of the Storting (Norway's Parliament), the members of the fighting forces of Norway, documents on the muddle of German administration and the inhumanity of Nazi methods. Mr. Quisling is given his due. From it all the perseverance and strength of the democratic way of life emerge.

BJARNE BRAATØY

Lessons of Dieppe

WE LANDED AT DAWN: THE STORY OF THE DIEPPE RAID. By A. B. Austin. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

DRESS REHEARSAL: THE STORY OF DIEPPE. By Quentin Reynolds. Random House. $2.

THE Dieppe raid last August was far more than a commando operation. Two commando units took part, and their tasks were to put out of action the two big German coastal batteries to the east and west of Dieppe; if they failed, the whole raid would be smashed. The bulk of the troops, however, were picked battalions of infantry, some of whom prided themselves on being highly trained all-around soldiers and not "just beach-grabbing desperados." In addition to the ground forces, almost as many men of the navy and air force were involved in the battle, for this was a one-day miniature invasion of the Continent.

Rehearsal for war is even more vital than for a play. The Italian rehearsal was in Ethiopia, the Japanese in China, and the German, most brutal and thorough of all, against the Spanish Loyalists. Dieppe, although on a much smaller scale, was a rehearsal of the most complex form of warfare ever known, for here 10,000 men of all three services had to play their parts in coordination and pick up their cues on the minute.

As Mr. Austin points out, a bewildering number of speeds had to be calculated exactly—the speed of the mine-sweepers that cleared the path, the transports that followed, the landing barges moving through the surf, the men cutting barbed wire, the tanks crawling up the shingle beaches, the fighter planes providing the umbrella overhead. For ten minutes just before dawn the warships were to fire 1,780 shells on to the 1,780 yards of the beach; Quentin Reynolds noted that the barrage opened as the second hand of his watch hit the minute. At one point the men ashore asked the headquarters ship to get their cliff screened with smoke, and within two minutes Boston bombers were laying artificial clouds on them.

The whole operation was much too intricate and too secret for any one reporter to see or reveal all its phases. Mr. Austin covered Dieppe for the British newspapers, Mr. Reynolds

BEHIND THE DICTATORS

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" is a book you should not miss—Reveals the Religious Origins of Fascism and Nazism—the Tie-up between the Vatican and the Dictators.

THE AUTHOR was active for many years as a priest of the Roman Church on three continents and in Vatican affairs. He is now editor of THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE.

PRICE IS ONLY 50¢. GET A COPY NOW!

For further information on Roman Catholic Aims subscribe to

"THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE"

This informative magazine is edited by a group of former Roman Catholic priests. Invaluable for inside knowledge of the aims and activities of the Roman Catholic church.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE is only $1.00 a year
(Canada and Foreign, $1.25)

ORDER FORM:

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE
229 West 48th Street, New York City

Please send me:

- ☐ 1 copy of BEHIND THE DICTATORS—50¢.
☐ 1 year's subscription to THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE—$1.00.

Enclosed find $.....

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE

for Collier's. Apart from the main outlines, there is scarcely any duplication in their two books. Mr. Reynolds, who calls so many distinguished persons by their first names, traveled to Dieppe de luxe on the headquarters destroyer, and the brandy was on the King. Mr. Austin had to pay one and sixpence, cash down, for his 1:45 a. m. pork-chop breakfast; he was to land at dawn with Commando 4—men for whom the government had bought one-way, not round-trip, tickets to the English port of embarkation. Mr. Reynolds was disappointed in his hope of getting ashore, but his day was no less dangerous than Mr. Austin's. One of the bombs that hit his ship killed two of the four men with whom he was standing on the deck and seriously wounded the other two, but only knocked a gold inlay out of a Reynolds tooth.

"Dress Rehearsal" should be read first—an amusing and varied hors d'oeuvre. Like "Tristram Shandy," it does not cling closely to the subject, but wanders about among the high adventures of a super-duper correspondent taking a war in his genial stride. We learn at some length that Mr. Reynolds's secretary was so remarkable that she could get a Cabinet minister to serve as a pianist at a London party; that Herbert Marshall once gave a honey of a party for Mr. Reynolds in Hollywood; and that Lord Louis Mountbatten, like Jack Dempsey, Ernest Hemingway, and Clark Gable, has "that indefinable something called color," unlike Sergeant York, John Steinbeck, and Paul Muni, who haven't. Mr. Reynolds, too, has color.

Mr. Austin had so keen an interest in the Dieppe expedition that long before the raid he made practice night landings with the beach-head infantry and even taught some skeptical Scotsmen how to swim in their Mae Wests. When he went ashore with Commando 4, he came as near as he could to fighting alongside them; he prepared mortar shells for firing and carried messages up and down a defile in the cliff under fire.

Both authors agree that the Dieppe raid was not the success that had been hoped for. Commando 3 was slaughtered in the barges and on the beach because it had encountered in the darkness off shore a German convoy which warned the shore defenders of its approach. Of the 5,000 Canadians who formed the bulk of the landing troops, 3,350 were killed, wounded, or missing. Ninety-eight planes were lost that day.

Napoleon and Hitler quailed before the staggering task of sending invasion armies from east to west across the English Channel. Mr. Austin and Mr. Reynolds believe, from the experience gained in the dress rehearsal at Dieppe, that the feat can be accomplished, from west to east, by England and America. To Mr. Austin the most important lesson was that the defensive power of the German air force in Western Europe could be broken. Mr. Reynolds suggests that on another occasion the British bombing force may well be used to soften up the enemy's coastal defenses with an intensive two-hour preliminary barrage of bombs; this was not done at Dieppe because it would have sacrificed surprise. He thinks also that parachute troops attacking from behind might be of great value, and he notes that General Eisenhower, after studying the Dieppe results, made good use of parachute troops in the descent on North Africa.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Frank Norris

FRANK NORRIS, A STUDY. By Ernest Marchand. Stanford University Press. $3.

AS MR. MARCHAND'S bibliography indicates, there have been few exhaustive studies of Frank Norris. He received quite his share of critical attention from his contemporaries, and while the struggle over naturalism was at its height he was the bête noire of the genteel reviewers. Eventually he won wider acceptance; after his untimely death many journals suffered a change of heart, and favorable estimates and appreciations of his work began to appear. But even after the cause which Frank Norris espoused all his life won a victory in American letters, Norris himself gained little from it, and despite his popularity, his stature has, on the whole, diminished. Mr. Marchand's study makes no attempt to establish him in greater eminence. He follows closely Norris's development and evaluates his writing with an equal sympathy for its virtues and its weaknesses.

Norris's shortcomings, as Mr. Marchand shows, were largely those of impatience. He had little use for self-conscious artistry, which to him connoted only the effeteness of the aesthete and the poetaster. "Who cares for fine style! Tell your yarn and let your style go to the devil. We don't want literature, we want life." His appetite for life led him to the development of a style rich in detail and heavy in rhythm, keyed to the power and the brutality which he found everywhere in nature. And yet his style was no more than the measure of his temperament, not the disciplined form of the artist but the inconsistent expression of the man. At times it had dignity and simplicity; but more often it was burdened with a romantic extravagance and fell into the very clichés of the genteel moralists whom Norris despised.

His impatience with style was a result of an even more fundamental impatience with abstract thought. Norris was a poor theorist, and like many of his generation he could embrace the cult of the strong man with a belief in the social responsibility of the individual. In "The Octopus" his spokesman, Presley, reflects his own confusion in recognizing the injustice of railroad monopoly while holding that the abuse of power is inevitable, a manifestation of the same force which underlies all growth. The universe was governed by blind and neutral, if not brutal, force; and yet he believed, or tried to believe, that all things worked resistlessly for the good. Apparently he regarded his confusion as a token of his fidelity to nature.

Perhaps nowhere was his confusion so much in evidence as in the conception of naturalism to which both his thought and his temperament led him. He had none of Zola's scientific control of the medium. His sub-plots, the characters and episodes he introduced for relief, always betrayed him. In the middle of a powerful, objective narrative he could present a sentimental love story, as in "McTeague," or a lush, mystical melodrama as in "The Octopus," and treat these digressions with as much care and sincerity as he gave to his major passages, thereby revealing himself a naturalist in conception and in detail, but a romantic at heart.

Marchand's very successful study fails, I believe, at only one point. He does not devote sufficient attention to Norris's symbolism, that phase of his work in which, as with all artists, his power can best be judged. The epic theme of his uncompleted Wheat Trilogy, considered as symbolism, has great scope, almost as universal as Melville's white whale. It could have been developed with even greater force, for it was a symbol of the natural world, while Melville, for all his intensity, achieved only a metaphysical signification. But Norris's symbol of the growing wheat has power only as symbol and only in so far as its meaning is self-contained and not rendered explicit. Unlike Melville, whose symbolism was so vast that it absorbed all possible levels of explication, Norris is not content to present the symbolic object alone, and he rather detracts from it by his uncertain interpretation when he identifies it both with the indifference of the universe and the nîsus toward the good. A symbol can always remain powerful on its own level; when its meaning is shown forth on the level of the natural world through narrative and invention it strikes a greater power and an even greater depth. Norris could not accomplish this merging of the symbolic and natural levels of art. His characters are neither great individuals nor great types, and the lives they lead seldom have more than the significance local to the story. His depiction of love, in particular, does not carry convincingly the overtones of the theme with which he appears to endow it. In "The Octopus" the symbol of the growing wheat has a lofty splendor out of all proportion to the banality of love's counterpart; in "The Pit" it disappears entirely.

But if the symbol of nature remained always outside his work, the presence of nature was fully realized. The force of his temperament and the passion of his perception seldom deserted him, and the world he depicted has color, size, and conviction. Nature may have been as much a theater as a stage, but the dramatic power with which he realized his episodes sustained even melodrama, and the figures which move through his pages show a clarity of characterization which never failed to give them life.

ISAAC ROSENFELD

Power and Justice

THE WORLD AFTER WAR. By Henry Bamford Parkes. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.50.

THOUGH Professor Parkes's discussion of post-war international problems is modest in both compass and spirit, it is more profound than most of the treatises which beat the tom-toms for this or that panacea. The author has a firm grasp of political realities. He understands the relation of power to justice. He believes that "if conceptions of justice were excluded from politics, life would not be worth living, but it is only by the exercise of power that men can enjoy the security which makes justice possible."

A part of his book is devoted to an analysis of the failure to establish a workable international order after the last war. He believes that the victorious nations failed to keep the peace largely because they failed to preserve the unity of preponderant power by which they won the war. This analysis of past failure determines his prescription for success after this war: "Those nations who make the peace settlement must retain overwhelming superiority of power

FRANCE IS IN THE NEWS!

For accurate information,
For revealing and comprehensive analyses about...

EVENTS IN AFRICA
THE FRENCH UNDERGROUND
THE FUTURE OF FRANCE

READ

pour la VICTOIRE
JOURNAL FRANÇAIS AMÉRICAIN

THE FRENCH WEEKLY NEWSPAPER OF AMERICA

Editorials by:

GENEVIEVE TABOUIS
PHILIPPE BARRES MICHEL POBERS
HENRI DE KERILLIS

Weekly articles by France's most prominent scholars, writers, statesmen and artists.

Additional Feature Each Week:

A two-page digest, in English, of news and comments on France.

Twice a month:

"Service Universitaire"—Special section for colleges and universities. Articles of general culture, literature, history and art.

Beginning Wednesday, March 3,

Pour La Victoire will sponsor:

"FRANCE IN THE NEWS"

2 Weekly Broadcasts Over WQXR

Every Wednesday Evening at 10:30

Michel Poberes—Commentator

Every Saturday Evening at 10:30

Genevieve Tabouis—Commentator

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION: $4.50

SIX MONTHS: $2.50

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
13 WEEKS FOR ONE DOLLAR

POUR LA VICTOIRE

535 Fifth Ave., New York City

PLV—N

Murray Hill 3-6208-9

Please send POUR LA VICTOIRE to:

Name.....

Address.....

I am enclosing ONE DOLLAR

over any nation who might wish to change it; and must be willing if necessary to use it." The United Nations "must be prepared to police the world—and they must exercise this power not for a few years only but for generations."

His answer to the problem of international anarchy will be regarded by some as an imperialistic solution. He envisages no Anglo-Saxon imperialism, but rather a kind of hierarchy of imperial unifications, with the four dominant members of the United Nations—Russia, Britain, China, and America—maintaining an indisputable hegemony. Before this solution is rejected out of hand it would be well to follow Dr. Parkes's refutation of alternative solutions.

His arguments against either the possibility or desirability of Continental federations, whether on the European continent or in the American hemisphere, seem to me quite unanswerable. The inadequacy of either a league or a federation is convincingly established. If there is to be a stable world order, there must be no question where the power lies; and responsibility and power must be commensurate.

Whether a stable peace could be achieved upon the basis of the preponderant power of the larger United Nations would depend upon their ability to remain united; whether the peace would be just would depend upon the internal and external checks which could be placed upon the exercise of preponderant power. On the first question Professor Parkes considers the various causes of friction between the four great powers and comes to the conclusion that the self-interest of each would predispose it toward the maintenance of unity and peace. On the question of the relation of the Western world to Russia he is particularly wise and measured, believing that a permanent accord with Russia is both possible and necessary. He would hold the larger nations together by something less than a federation and more than an alliance and depend upon historical forces to weld the various parts together more solidly. His whole approach is an example of historical rather than of abstract political thinking.

On the second question the author believes that the democratic character of the dominant nations would serve as an internal check upon their exercise of power. He is right in observing that the history of the past decade proves with what difficulty democratic powers can be prompted to engage even in wars of self-defense. This implies that they would be even less likely to engage in wars of aggression. The weakest part of his argument probably consists in his failure to do full justice to the peril of economic and political exploitation by the dominant powers short of actual military aggression upon weaker powers. It is this peril of injustice which drives so many good democrats to consider utopian rather than historical solutions of the world problem. There is indeed no adequate guaranty against injustice in any possible workable scheme of world order. The trouble with less dangerous schemes than the coagulation of dominant power at the center of a world order is that the peril of a new anarchy is greater, in them, than the peril of injustice in a United Nations plan.

Professor Parkes has a lively sense of the relativity of all historical justice and concedes that no one group of powers has an absolute or abstract right to maintain its rule. He goes too far, however, in finally denying that the idea of justice is relevant to international relations. He declares: "The concept of 'justice' can be applied only to the relationships of individuals and not to nations." If that were true the Nazis would be right. He implicitly refutes his own disavowal of the morality of international relations by seeking for a solution of the international problem which will guarantee both order and justice. It is of course true that no historical order ever corresponds to an abstract conception of justice, because the accidents of power do not fully correspond to the requirements of justice. That is, incidentally, as true of individual as of collective relations. Professor Parkes's lapse into moral cynicism was probably just a slip. For in his introduction he formulates the problem correctly. He declares: "Power without justice is the objective of Germany and Japan; but justice without power is too often the aim of liberal idealists."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

AMUSEMENTS

N. Y.'s 2 BIG HITS

"Vivid and entertaining theater."—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.
THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY & ROWLAND STEBBINS present

THE PATRIOTS

by SIDNEY KINGSLEY
NATIONAL, W. 41st St. PE 6-8225. Evgs. 8:40, Mtu. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

★ ★ ★ ★

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage." —Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

The Playwrights' Company presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A New Play by MAXWELL ANDERSON
CORT, West 48th Street, BR 9-0346. Evgs. 8:40, Mtu. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

SPECIAL

Class Room Rate
only 25¢ monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address.

Desk Copy Is Free!

ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK CITY

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

IN BRIEF

TRAIL OF THE MONEY BIRD. By Dillion Ripley. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

HEADHUNTING IN THE SOLOMON ISLANDS. By Caroline Mytinger. The Macmillan Company. $3.

As part of a very informal expedition sailing in a fifty-foot schooner from the Atlantic coast, the author of the first of these books hunted birds in the Solomons and in New Guinea for the Philadelphia Academy of Sciences. The author of the second was half of an even more informal expedition, consisting exclusively of herself and a girl friend, which set out with no backing and very little money to do crayon portraits of the aborigines in the Solomons—the idea being that the way there and back could be paid for with portraits of white subjects picked up along the route. Both authors had the good fortune to discover a few years later that the public had developed a new interest in the regions visited, and both books give very interesting sidelights on what life is like there. Neither draws a picture likely to attract tourists, and Miss Mytinger's account of Guadalcanal is quietly hair-raising. Quite aside from topical appeal, both books are unusually interesting and unhackneyed travel literature. Mr. Ripley, who is only a beginning ornithologist and was a graduate student at Columbia when he was invited to make the trip, writes modestly and well about the birds he saw and the adventures he had. Miss Mytinger, who was probably a problem child not so very long ago, is funny as well as vivid in describing the scrapes she and her friend got out of as well as into. Of course both she and Mr. Ripley had their bouts with malaria.

EXPERIENCING AMERICAN PICTURES. By Ralph M. Pearson. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

Contemporary American art is here as- sayed in the light of the formal values which modernism emphasizes. It is not found so wanting as one might expect. Mr. Pearson is perhaps too literal-minded in applying his test, and he writes very badly, but there is a basis for his every judgment, right or wrong. He has earnestness, sincerity, and knowledge. Also, he examines seriously comic strips, advertising, and magazine art, and makes some shrewd points about Bud Fisher and the New Yorker cartoonists. If only Mr. Pearson had the power to generalize as well as observe; as it is, his book is disjointed, and quite boring except when some specific work of art is being dealt with. Mr. Pearson is also inconsistent. He underrates John Sloan simply because Sloan puts no obvious stress upon abstract values, but he is much impressed by such painters as Castellon, Berman, and Albright, who have nothing except their bright, hard finish and showy subjects. The abstract values are present in Sloan's work all right, but they are not advertised in the way Mr. Pearson has come to expect.

POEMS OF THIS WAR BY YOUNGER POETS. Edited by Patricia Ledward and Colin Strang. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

The contributors to this English anthology have three things in common: they are all young, they are all comparatively unknown, and they are all a trifle anemic. Two or three exceptions could, at a pinch, be made; and one undoubtedly should be. The poems of David Gascoyne, and especially his Elegy for R. R., distinguish themselves by their depth of feeling and their grace of gesture; the poems of Nicholas Moore by their continually unembarrassed loquaciousness; and those of Alan Rock by their absence of fat matter and by a kind of awkward nobility. Apart, however, from these three poets, there appears to be very little call here for individual congratulations. What is finest about this anthology is the general climate of all the contributions; for under the stress of the war these poets have retained the prerogative of being themselves even to the point of the precious. It is to be regretted that, with the three exceptions named, so little has emerged from their determination.

THREE GREEK TRAGEDIES IN TRANSLATION. By David Grene. The University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

"Oedipus Tyrannus," "Prometheus Bound," and "Hippolytus" have not been too well treated by English translators, unless you care for Gilbert Murray, who has reduced all three to soda water. David Grene is not a poet; a fortiori not a bad poet. He has had the novel and sensible notion of rendering in prose the parts of the plays that do not reach the highest intensities; this avoids the unbearable monotony of the stiffly handled forms into which most English translators have forced the flexible Greek meters. The verse passages, in blank verse or bumpy rhythms which Grene seems to take for free verse, are less successful, but very honest with the Greek and quite free from archaisms and poetasters' clichés. The straightforward approach to the problems of translation and the excellent general introduction and penetrating critical studies of the several plays make this volume by far the best in English for readers, with tastes formed since 1914, who want a good "general impression" of Greek tragedy.

LONDON CALLING. Edited by Storm Jameson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

As a gift, a tribute, and an apology Storm Jameson sends us this collection of stories, essays, and poems to be sold for the U. S. O. England has no other way than this, as she explains in her introduction, of making a return for the bundles and hospitality to the children, and she hopes that the true voices of the best-known British writers may help to remove our misunderstandings that arise from ignorance. Thirty-two writers welcomed the opportunity to send contributions. The historian G. M. Trevelyan compared the first Anglo-Saxon settlements with those of their descendants in New England. Harold Laski wrote on Lincoln, Phyllis Bentley on Cooper. Rebecca West told of her domestic calamities when Alexander Woollcott came to dinner, and Noel Streatfeild shared the plucky pages of her blitz diary. There is something for every taste in this douceur given with such graciousness and good-will.

Drama Note

EVIDENCE continues to accumulate that the war is having a peculiar effect on the taste of the New York audience. Whether that audience itself is differently composed or whether the stress of the times is making it forget its sophistication—in the good as well as the bad sense of the term—I have no way of knowing, but it is repeatedly demonstrating an unmistakable disposition to accept with good grace plays which two years ago it would have scornfully recommended as suited only for the country cousin. "This Rock" (Longacre Theater) is another case in point. The notices it drew were of the sort generally regarded as fatal, and yet when I dropped in nearly a week later I found an audience which stood to applaud after the curtain had gone down. Part of the applause was no doubt a tribute to Billie Burke, who can still exhibit what was inevitably described as her "fluttery charm" and who has, besides, a real comedienne's gift. But I think the audience also genuinely liked the broadly sentimental piece about an English country family which learns to love the slum children wished on it by a solicitous government. It follows pretty closely the lines you would expect and inevitably includes the spoiled daughter who falls in love with the young airman born out of her class. I found myself thinking how much William Winter would have liked the play and of the review he would inevitably have written, drawing the contrast between its healthy feeling and the morbidity of Ibsen or the impudence of Shaw. But the audience of 1943 is also evidently in the mood for simple pleasures, and "This Rock" is competently written and well played—by the standards appropriate to drama on this level.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

BERNARD SHAW, writing in 1892, speaks of Verdi's "Trovatore," "Ballo in Maschera," "Ernani," and so on as "that ultra-classical product of Romanticism, the grandiose Italian opera in which the executive art consists in a splendid display of personal heroics, and the drama arises out of the simplest and most universal stimulants to them." Having defined the executive art they require, he ascribes the popular misconception of them to "performances in which the superb distinction and heroic force of the male characters, and the tragic beauty of the women, have been burlesqued by performers with every sort of disqualification for such parts, from age and obesity to the most excruciating phases of physical insignificance and modern cockney vulgarity." Describing them as "that dynasty of execrable impostors in tights and tunics, interpolating their loathsome B flats into the beautiful melodies they could not sing, and swelling with conceit when they were able to finish 'Di quella pira' with a high C capable of making a stranded man-of-war recoil off a reef into mid-ocean," he says that to blame Verdi is "much as if Dickens had blamed Shakespeare for the absurdities of Mr. Wopsle."

Today at the Metropolitan one hears "La Forza del Destino" conducted by Bruno Walter with respect, affection, care, and musical understanding; one hears the work as a whole, treated in this way, come into existence with validity, power, style; one hears not only the dramatic force of the music but its loveliness, its exquisitely wrought delicacy. But the "superb distinction and heroic force of the male characters and the tragic beauty of the women" are still burlesqued by the unimpressive appearance, the lunging and clutching and arm-waving of Kurt Baum, Leonard Warren, and Zinka Milanov, whom I heard at an evening performance; by the bellowing of Mr. Baum throughout the evening, except for the few moments when he lay wounded and, singing quietly, sang with surprising beauty of voice and phrasing; by the occasional shouting of Mr. Warren, who when he did not shout charmed the ear with the rich sonority of his voice; by the occasional tremolo-ridden shrieking of Miss Milanov, who at other times produced sounds of ravishing beauty. Ezio Pinza, on the other hand, was, as always, impressive in appearance, movement, and singing.

The lunging and clutching and arm-waving don't occur only in performances of Verdi's operas; they are the absurd clichés and mannerisms to which most singers reduce the plastic movement that is—like the singing of the words which makes it necessary—one of the expressive means, one of the conventions of opera. In itself this convention is no more absurd than any other; it becomes absurd only when it is absurdly used; and what dignity, expressiveness, and force it can have one may observe in the Orfeo, the Fricka, the Marina of Kerstin Thorborg. And what it can be when it is the medium of one of those singing actors who command stage and audience like sovereigns by their mere presence, their imagination and feeling, their communicative intensity, one may observe in the Leonore, the Marschallin, the Elisabeth, the Sieglinde of Lotte Lehmann. One may observe them, that is, in so far as the Metropolitan permits; and one of the things the Metropolitan has to answer for is the fact that during the years when Lehmann was still singing Leonore in Salzburg the American public was deprived of an impersonation which takes its place in operatic history with things like Chaliapin's Boris.

The Metropolitan's production of Strauss's "Rosenkavalier," however, still offers Lehmann's Marschallin, which remains a wonderful and affecting achievement even though much of the subtle detail of the impersonation and much of the singing do not reach a person in row Z of the huge auditorium. It creates, in fact, the one bit of reality and truth not only amid the clutter of cliché and mannerism of the performance but amid the clutter of the trashy work itself. Of the other principals in the performance I attended Eleanor Steber, when she got rid of an initial tremolo, sang the part of Sophie exquisitely; Risé Stevens, the Oktavian, did not get rid of her tremolo throughout the evening; Emanuel List half-talked his way through the part of Baron Ochs with the quavering remains of a voice; Julius Huehn's Faninal was one of the Metropolitan's most grotesque errors in casting; and Elwood Gary sang the Italian aria well. Having read about Erich Leinsdorf's unauthoritative conducting, I watched and listened to his work very attentively, and found it technically expert and authoritative and musically effective. But then I have no ax to grind.

B. H. HAGGIN

SONGS OF FREE MEN
Sung by Paul Robeson

■ "These songs," says Paul Robeson, "show in no uncertain way the common humanity of man. They issue from the present common struggle for a decent world, and express much of what I deeply feel and believe."

From Border to Border (from Quiet Flows the Don—Dzerzhinsky)
Oh, How Proud Our Quiet Don (from Quiet Flows the Don—Dzerzhinsky) 17356-D* $.75

The Purest Kind of a Guy (from No for an Answer—Marc Blittstein)
Joe Hill (Robinson-Hoyes) 17357-D* $.75

The Pest Bag Soldiers (German Concentration Camp Song)
The Four Insurgent Generals (Spanish Loyalist Song) 17358-D* $.75

Song of the Plains (Red Army Song)
Native Land (Donayevsky) 17359-B* $.75

*Four records in illustrated album $3.50
All prices exclusive of taxes

COLUMBIA RECORDS

Order from your Dealer today

Letters to the Editors

Let the "Sun" Rise

Dear Sirs: As a subscriber to The Nation, may I thank you for the two excellent articles by Keith Hutchison in which he tells The Truth About the A. P.? I'm speaking for myself, but I believe I express the gratitude of all Chicagoans. We are keenly interested in the Department of Justice's case against the A. P. because we want to see our new morning newspaper, the Chicago Sun, get the break it deserves.

As you know, for many years we have had to swallow the "news" as it is manufactured by the Chicago Tribune. Pick up almost any issue of the Tribune, and you'll find at least one-half of the first page devoted to editorials, made to look like news, attacking the New Deal, especially Washington personalities. For weeks now we've read about Harry Hopkins's dinner, and recently New York City has been bitterly attacked (it seems that some brass hat from Washington was spotted in a New York night club).

Marshall Field has been making every possible effort to give Chicago a good morning newspaper. He hasn't hesitated to fire expensive talent which failed to capture the Chicago outlook. He has added many fine columnists. Some of these are pro-New Deal and some of them are anti-New Deal. He has promoted persons in lesser positions to jobs of real responsibility if they showed talent. (Recently he made Milburn P. Akers, his political editor, the managing editor—and excellent results are already evident.)

I mention these points because they show that Mr. Field is genuinely interested in giving Chicago the best—and it is entitled to the best. It is entitled, among other things, to the A. P. wire service. The people of Chicago—and not Mr. Field—will benefit from it. Heaven knows he has all the money he needs, all the fame, all the everything that a man could ask for. When selfish members of the A. P. deny the Sun their service, they are robbing the people, not the owner of the paper.

Mr. Field's competitor, Bertie McCormick, continually harps on the freedom of the press. There are columns of space devoted to the subject in his paper, and recently he began a series of radio talks. He believes in freedom of the press—so long as it applies to the Tribune. He doesn't believe in it for the Sun. He simply says that the Sun is not a newspaper!

Perhaps your readers know that the Tribune has printed articles and cartoons viciously attacking Mr. Field. It has called him almost everything in the book, concentrating particularly on his social activities and his war record. The Tribune's point of view is that the Sun doesn't deserve Chicago's support, because it doesn't like the publisher personally.

One more example of the two newspapers' handling of news: The Sun has printed (with special permission) the A. P.'s point of view in the Department of Justice's case against it. The Sun has refrained from editorials on the subject. On the other hand, the Tribune twists every story pertaining to the case to suit its own selfish interest.

I don't know how the case will come out. The members of the A. P. are powerful and influential. One thing is sure: If the Tribune and the A. P. win the case, then neither newspapers nor the American people deserve freedom of the press, or freedom of anything else.

STEPHEN TEDOR

Chicago, February 13

Oxenstierna

Dear Sirs: Well, what the devil did Oxenstierna say 300 years ago? (See Albert Guérard's review of "The Road to Vichy" in your issue of February 13.)

LOWBROW MORON

New York, February 13

Dear Sirs: in re Oxenstierna.

Text: Oxenstierna, Swedish chancellor at the time of the Thirty Years' War, told his son: "Go, my son, and see with how little wisdom the world is governed."

Commentary: We are told, from day to day, "Be still, children: Father knows best!" We realize, from year to year and from decade to decade, Father's egregious mistakes. I believe John Doe, the common man, has a sounder conception of diplomacy than the Career Boys. Not that John Doe is more intelligent, or better informed, than Metternich or Talleyrand. But because they are "realists," the professionals think in terms of the past: the past is "real," the future is "shadowy." Therefore they pay excessive attention to vested interests which are inevitably special interests. Their one desire is to preserve or restore the status quo, perfectly defined as "the mess we are in."

It was said that "the machine is an excellent servant but a bad master." The same ought to be said of professional diplomacy. John Doe's heart is in the right place. Let him assert himself. He wants a saner world and should not be gypped out of it by the clever sub-realists.

ALBERT GUERARD

Stanford University, Cal., February 20

Karolyi and Bela Kun

Dear Sirs: Revolutions intrinsically tend to extremes. This is probably the reason why the Gironde is never successful and only history decides in its favor. It is gratifying, therefore, that Lucien Vogel, in his brilliant analysis of legitimacy published in your issue of February 3, discounted the final judgment of Clio on the government of Count Michael Karolyi in 1918. May I correct two slight errors marring his otherwise flawless argument? When General d'Espérey, or rather the Big Four, refused to recognize the Karolyi government, there was as yet no Hungarian white army. This army was organized many months later at Szeged under the protection of the French occupation forces.

Of more importance is the erroneous statement that Karolyi "released from prison the Communist leader, Bela Kun, and turned the government over to him." This happens to be one of the conventional historical lies on which the Horthy regime forged the moral foundation of its existence. In two judgments passed in the trials of the People's Commissars and Matthias Rakosi (whose counsel I was), the court, referring to conclusive evidence, declared in the reasoning of the sentences that Karolyi or his government neither released the imprisoned Communist leaders nor turned the government over to them. What, indeed, happened was that Karolyi hoped to appoint a Social Democratic government to get the support of the proletariat against pressure brought upon him by unjustified demands of the Allies. Meanwhile, a member of his government, with two Socialist leaders, came to terms with the imprisoned Communists. The staging of this putsch was easy because the strongest unions were under Communist influence.

To question this judicial statement would be inadmissible, for the courts in Horthy's Hungary were and are certainly not biased in favor of Karolyi. In the light of the adage, On n'est jamais trahi que par les siens, he always will be the arch-traitor of the Magyar fascist-feudal caste.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

New York, February 16

"The Itching Parrot"

Dear Sirs: It may seem a long way back to the review by Lionel Trilling—in your issue of March 28 last—of the Mexican classic "The Itching Parrot" by José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi, of which an English translation by Katherine Anne Porter has appeared under the imprint of Doubleday, Doran and Company. A sheer coincidence made me reread the review: a friend presented me with a copy of the Spanish original—an almost unobtainable book in England just now—and the evening I finished what I believe to be a fourth perusal of "El Periquillo sarniento" I came across the back number of The Nation with the review. Naturally, I compared my own impressions of the book with those of the reviewer, and the first query that came to my mind was: are my impressions based on the original only—for I have not seen the translation—and are the reviewer's based only on the translation? I think it must be so, because, to judge from the review, the translator does not seem to have achieved the impossible. Your reviewer says: "Miss Porter's translation is a model of firm, simple prose in the manner of the eighteenth-century masters of realism; but she tells us that the allusive and obscene language of the original will not submit to translation." Miss Porter's contention is right, and I hope she will not take it amiss if I add that Lizardi's Spanish is very far from being firm, simple prose and that to transmute it by his highly flexible vernacular—indeed, conversational—Spanish into firm, simple English is to transform an itching parrot into a somewhat sedate and tidy macaw without an itch on his whole body! Does that explain, perhaps, why your reviewer found the book a bore?

There need be, however, no mistake about one thing. This book does contain if not the secret at least some of the best interpretations and presentation of Mexican psychology to be found in literature. It can be compared with the Chilean work "El Roto" and the Argentine works "Don Segundo Sombra" and "Martin Fierro," for in a sense it does for Mexico what those books have done for the southern republics.

The Mexican reader can see in it reflections of the workings of his own mind; and that is its principal secret. No blame to the translator for not being able to make those of us with entirely different traditions and psychological make-up see in it the workings of our minds; the genius of the two languages is so different, and the difficulties of translation so great, that most of the subtlety of the original must be inevitably lost. To translate such works is like trying to make a dish of tamales into a dish of Irish stew. No literature is more difficult to convey in translation than Spanish; the same may be said of Spanish American classics. Not one translation conveys one-half of what is in "Don Quijote."

Your reviewer does not think that any great original powers of intellect can be claimed for the author of "The Itching Parrot." In company with dozens of the best Mexican critics, and those of other countries also, I disagree—absolutely. For, in spite of the faults and blemishes in the book, one has to admit that the author succeeded in the difficult task of giving us an entirely convincing and in parts very amusing picture of a complex period in the history of his country. He has produced a most valuable social document, some say the transcendental novel of Mexico, with remarkable sketches of representative types and keen psychological insight into the vices and virtues of a very solid section of his people—all written in a most readable if not academically perfect style. The picture and the types are drawn so clearly that when one sees them one grasps the reason for much of Mexico's history. Such an achievement, surely, indicates considerable powers of intellect. Of how many English or American novels can one say the same?

"The Itching Parrot" is without any doubt a "key book" for those—especially foreigners—who wish to understand Mexico. Hence, the translator has rendered a great service, and if she has not entirely succeeded in producing the perfect last-word translation, to judge by your reviewer's tribute she has produced one pleasant to read which should help and encourage those who might some day tackle the original. For, as with every great book written in Spanish, or any other language, it is always the original which contains most, and this book is the gateway to an understanding of the country which seems destined to have a profound influence on Spanish America of the future. It is therefore of first-class importance.

CHARLES DUFF,

Editor, Spanish News Letter,
Translator of Quevedo's Works

London, January 9

Miss Porter Adds a Comment

Dear Sirs: A number of persons, some of them good friends, all of them well disposed to my work, have confessed that they simply (simply!) could not be interested in "The Itching Parrot." Some of them don't like picaresque novels in any language. Others thought it not a good example of the kind. And others thought it was cut too much. (I agree.) This dismayed me as translator, for I found the book interesting in Spanish and naturally have an indulgent eye for the curtailed version in English. This is not altogether self-love, for I had a regiment (or anyway a squad) of collaborators and advisers, some of them extremely well informed on the subject and all of them marvelously opinionated. Also I was guided in the first working over by a borador made by Mr. Pressly, a good knowledgeable, if sketchy, translation. Toward the end I took flight in the most cowardly manner, leaving the manuscript to its fate, pretending not to know what was being done to it; and I am not half so sorry as I should be, perhaps, when I consider the great number of serious, good criticisms I have had by letter from real authorities in the Spanish language, Spanish and South American literature, and intelligent admirers of Lizardi. And I feel that Mr. Elder certainly made the very best of his part of a bad bargain, for the final cutting is pretty adroit, I think.

My share in the book has been well rewarded in Mr. Duff's scholarly and courteous defense of my motives and methods in publishing the book in its present—and first—English version. He is most reassuring. All my gratitude to Mr. Duff for supporting me in the matter of untranslatable idiom, slang, and double meanings. The only way to translate them would be to hold up the progress of the story with a paragraph of explanation for every such word or phrase. For example: "Todo lana es velo," or "All wool is hair." Is that all? Why, how pointless. Indeed? Look it up in the dictionary. As for my tidying up the Parrot, and turning him into a Macaw, that may have happened. But I did not assume "the manner of the eighteenth-century masters of realism." That manner is Lizardi's, and I found it comfortable because of the special influence upon me of eighteenth-century English prose: notably that of Lawrence Sterne; and Lizardi's style comes into English in just that manner. Even his slang, his racy phrases, have a mixture of formality in them, and as for the straightaway course, I open the book at random and translate at sight the first paragraph under my eye: "That which they call Fortune appeared quickly to have wearied of favoring me. I formed a close friendship with two rich merchants of Vera Cruz, who proposed to me that I should share with them in the negotiation of certain interesting contraband on board the frigate Amphytrite. . . ." Call that what you please, firm and simple, or eighteenth-century, or just plain prose, it is as near an exact translation as my mortal powers will allow. . . .

March 6, 1943

I have always been in favor of publishing the full and complete document, whatever it may be. I detest edited historical papers, novels cut in half when brought from one language to another. Yet, in the end, I consented and for a good reason. There was absolutely no prospect of getting it published in the original form. I should know, after ten years' trying, and fourteen publishers' rejections. I have the first version, in four big fat typewritten volumes, with a map of Mexico City for 1770 or thereabouts, a portrait of Lizardi, and the illustrations which appeared in the 1884 edition. They will probably never see daylight. The present version, I decided, was certainly better than none, for Mr. Duff is right in his belief that the book is important, and for precisely the reasons he gives.

As an inadequate expression of my thanks to Mr. Duff, I shall send him a copy of the translation, to judge for himself. (God willing that there is room for it on a ship and the ship shall arrive.) I stand by the translation, what there is of it. I wish it were all to do over again, perhaps it would be better next time. I shall be glad to see a full translation published by someone else. I can't do it again, there is not time, I must go on to the next thing. . . .

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

Ballston Spa, N. Y., February 15

The Truth Is . . .

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of February 6 there appeared the regular Washington report of I. F. Stone, in the first part of which the writer discussed our government's decision to send a commission to investigate labor affairs in Bolivia. In discussing the composition of the commission Mr. Stone made the following comment, in utter disregard of the real facts: "The commission was picked at the State Department, and this may explain the absence of a C. I. O. member."

The truth is that a C. I. O. member was appointed and will most probably be in Bolivia by the time you read this letter. His name is Martin C. Kyne, an executive vice-president of the United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America.

JOSEPH GODSON, Publicity Director,
United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America
New York, February 8

Dear Sirs: The truth is, as Mr. Godson should have known, that the C. I. O. had a very difficult time getting the State Department to add a C. I. O. man to the commission, that Mr. Kyne was not appointed until after the rest of the commission had been named, and that my letter was written before Kyne was added to the commission.

I. F. STONE

Washington, February 15

Double Edge

Dear Sirs: Thanks very much for the poetry review by H. P. Lazarus in your issue of January 16. It struck home. For over twenty years I have been trying to understand the modern poets—particularly the poems published in The Nation.

M. M. FLANDERS

Chicago, Ill., February 7

Here's Hoping

Dear Sirs: Here's hoping that the final outcome of your campaign against the State Department is successful; that the democratic interpretation of policy accompanies our boys and our flag to foreign soil. It is more than a shame that good American lives should be lost for causes that are nullified by the unenlightened diplomacy in "high places." Rip Van Winkle woke up after twenty years. If the State Department is to come to sooner than that illustrious gentleman, the people will have to shake it rudely.

I. RESTES

New York, February 12

Thank You

Dear Sirs: Because of some particularly excellent recent numbers of The Nation, I cannot help thanking you for every article and for every word.

I am at a loss to say what I appreciate most—articles, essays or editorials. Each inconspicuous review of books or music is perfect. It is significant of the high level of your contributors that an article such as Britain Is Not Amused is bound to bear most effectively on the mind of the reader, although the facts are obsolete. FREDERICK BARDACH
Milwaukee, Wis., February 24

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES G. PATTON is the militant young president of the National Farmers' Union. Committed to a policy of "security of the farm family . . . in an economy of abundance," the N. F. U. has become a major rival of the conservative "farm-bloc" organizations which have traditionally dominated American agriculture.

IRWIN EDMAN, professor of philosophy at Columbia University, has just returned from a trip covering many of the campuses of the Middle West.

RICHARD M. BENNETT, practicing architect and products designer, is assistant professor of architecture at Yale and visiting lecturer at Vassar.

JULIUS DEUTSCH, former Secretary of War of Austria, and a general in the Spanish Republican army, is now working in the European Council of the Free World Association.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, professor of English at Loyola University, is the author of "Literary Opinion in America."

BJARNE BRAATTOY is a Norwegian author and journalist. In the recent reorganization of the foreign propaganda service of the Office of War Information he was appointed chief for Region 4, which covers the Scandinavian countries and the Baltic states.

MARCUS DUFFIELD is on the staff of the New York Herald Tribune.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 10 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CROSS-WORD PUZZLERS!

Please Notice

that with this week's cross-word puzzle all blind letters have been permanently eliminated. If you had an easy time with puzzles Nos. 1 and 2, you will find No. 3 and subsequent ~~are~~ much ~~more~~ difficult to solve.

We repeat: The continuance of this ~~new~~ feature depends largely upon the response from puzzle fans. Make sure to send us your suggestions and recommendations. Tell us if you want us to continue these puzzles. Tell us whether you prefer other types of puzzles—political, geographical, literary, or cryptogrammic brain-teasers.

Address your letters to

THE PUZZLE EDITOR
The Nation
55 Fifth Avenue
New York City

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8
☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Name

Address

8-6-43

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 3

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Father embraces the leading lady and is revealed for what he is
- 5 Sounds like a lugger, but it's a different sort of vessel
- 9 Little ones fell great oaks, according to Poor Richard
- 10 Property, and when backward they are set at S.E.
- 11 Feminine name
- 12 One great country in a thousand
- 13 A slow coach, judged by modern standards
- 14 Train without wheels
- 16 Liberality, with a capital letter
- 18 The tale is altered
- 21 These supporters may be spongers, and they quit when the fighting starts
- 24 Overseas telegram, or undersea wire
- 26 Bovine remark
- 27 A way they have in church
- 28 First thing Henry VIII decided to do when he came to the throne (two words, 3 and 4)
- 29 Effusive people, but welcome to oil prospectors
- 30 If you want retorts to be emphatic, try this for a change
- 31 "Go on, Ann!" (anagram)

DOWN

- 1 A spider is mixed up in this hopeless condition
- 2 Might take the form of a present, but it wouldn't be a very welcome one
- 3 A low joint, but not in the vulgar

- 4 "I am monarch of all I survey, My right there is none to -----" (Alex. Selkirk)
- 5 Form of elation that is the limit of your understanding
- 6 Barred entrances
- 7 Wanton mischief that might make a goat rise
- 8 Trying persons
- 15 Born in need
- 17 This bird would surely want to take a peck!
- 18 Makes a charge, though it sounds like what the polite marker may offer you
- 19 Tabitha reveals her place of abode
- 20 Stoats in their winter coats
- 21 As its head suggests, the effects of this cordial are not exceptionally rapid (two words, 4 and 3)
- 22 Something put by for a rainy day, perhaps (hyphen, 4 and 3)
- 23 Hat popularized by cowboys
- 25 Oh, run away and get married!
- 27 The parson loses his head and turns to crime

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1

ACROSS:—1 COMET; 4 EDITORIAL; 9 CARBINE; 10 HAUNTED; 11 ROLL; 12 SEDAN; 13 OGRE; 16 ASSAULT; 17 LITERAL; 18 HORNAIL; 22 AJLMENT; 24 MARY; 25 MADAM; 26 BEAR; 29 MANGLED; 30 DIURNAL; 31 CATAMARAN; 32 TARRY.
DOWN:—1 COCKROACH; 2 MARRLER; 3 THIN; 4 EVILREST; 5 ISHMAEL; 6 GONUS; 7 INTRODER; 8 LOMER; 14 DUMAS; 15 STYLE; 18 LATERALLY; 20 BARONET; 21 LEANDER; 22 ABANDON; 23 ELEANOR; 24 MIMIC; 27 FLUM; 28 BUST.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 13, 1943

NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

361

EDITORIALS

- Strategic Frontiers and Collective Security 364
The Man-Power Muddle 365
While the Jews Die by Freda Kirchwey 366

ARTICLES

- Words Are Not Enough by Archibald MacLeish 368
What Has Happened to Hitler? by Joachim Joesten 372
Why Food Is Scarce—II. by James G. Patton 374
Seventy-five Years Ago in The Nation 376
How to Curb Absenteeism by James A. Wechsler 377
In the Wind 378

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Finland's "Peace" Offensive by Jack Gerber 379
The Yankees Arrive 380
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 382
File and Remember 383

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 384
To a Camoufleur. A Poem by Lynn Riggs 384
Under and After Mussolini by Gaetano Salvemini 385
War Primer for Civilians by Robert K. Haas 386
English Pageant by Keith Hutchison 387
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 388
Out of the Old South by Grace Adams 390
In Brief 391
Art by Jean Connolly 391
Music by B. H. Haggin 392

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

393

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 4 by Jack Barrett

396

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
L. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART
Music Critic Drama Critic
B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U.S.A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

FOR THE FIRST TIME SINCE OUR TROOPS landed in North Africa, the fortunes of political war on that front have begun to favor the cause of the United Nations as distinguished from their purely military interests. General Giraud has at last stated the simple proposition that a country freed from Nazi rule need not obey Nazi law. This new French revolution was encompassed in an eleven-word official paragraph, to wit: "A decree signed in Vichy is not valid in French Africa." What is more, the General's spokesman announced over the Algiers radio that Vichy "governs contrary to French national feeling" and that "nothing can be expected of this shadow government of prisoners and traitors." What is still more, the General specifically wiped out official anti-Semitism in North Africa, abolished the agency in charge of making life difficult for Jews, and dismissed the official who as recently as March 3 published Vichy racial decrees in the Journal Officiel of Algeria under the seal of Marshal Pétain and his Chief of Government, Pierre Laval. Even in Morocco, which is under the control of the unsavory General Nogué, government workers dismissed by Vichy were reinstated and the ban on foreign radio stations was lifted. For all these improvements we rejoice, but we do not imagine for a moment that the battle is over. Ground has been given slowly—under pressure, not out of conviction. Giraud and his regime, reports Drew Middleton of the New York Times, "continue to make surface moves toward liberal government and political reforms, but in most respects they are essentially the same as they were when they first took office. What is needed is a salesman who will convince them that the cause of the United Nations is just. They already know that that cause will win."

✱

THE BATTLE OF THE BISMARCK SEA TURNED out to be the most decisive in a long string of United Nations victories in the South Pacific. For the first time in modern warfare an entire convoy was destroyed by air action alone. While the American fliers undoubtedly had luck on their side in this engagement, the results can be laid primarily to careful preparation and effective teamwork. According to General MacArthur's official communiqué, the efficiency of the attack was extended to the "mopping up of barges, lifeboats, and rafts from the sunken ships of the . . . convoy"; so that "practically all were destroyed [and] there was scarcely a single survivor." In the absence of more details on the exact location of the engagement, it is difficult to pass judgment on this aspect of the operations. If the sinkings occurred within a few miles of the convoy's destination at Lue, and a considerable number of Japanese troops were likely to get ashore with their equipment to continue the fight, such a massacre might be justified under the laws of war. But if our airmen merely indulged in the same sort of indiscriminate strafing of lifeboats which the Nazis have engaged in, the action is indefensible even against the most ruthless enemy.

✱

THE RECENT DRIVES LAUNCHED BY JAPAN to "drive China out of the war" now appear to have been far weaker than was first supposed. In no instance has the enemy gained more than transitory success. North of Shanghai a Japanese attempt to trap a Chinese force has failed, and the Japanese appear to have fallen back to their original positions. In Kiangsi they have been forced to withdraw in the same area in which they suffered a severe setback last summer. The greatest Japanese success was gained in the mid-winter offensive along the Burma frontier, but the force that had advanced some thirty-five miles northward into China along the west bank of the Salween is now reported to be in full retreat after a Chinese counter-attack. Japanese attacks in Hunan, Homan, and Suiyuan are also said to have been repulsed. Although China has been relieved by those victories from any immediate military threat, its critical economic and supply position is unimproved. The Allied campaign in Burma appears to have bogged down before it was fairly started, and recent reports from the American air force in China indicate that it has been only slightly strengthened since the days of the "Flying Tigers."

✱

NO ONE IN HIS SENSES—UNLESS HE WERE AN Axis agent—would knowingly stimulate the growth of feeling against Russia. Close relations between the Soviet Union and its allies are essential—today, for winning the war; tomorrow, for establishing a peaceful Europe. Hitler, knowing this, is doing his best to whip up dread of the "Bolshevik menace" among the people of the Allied countries and to encourage the tensions that have already developed. This is good strategy because feeling against Russia is undoubtedly growing. Stalin recognizes this tendency and knows its danger; he has several times gone out of his way to assert his faith in Allied unity. At the same time it must be admitted that the Anglo-American contribution to the war has in fact been minimized in his speeches and in the internal propaganda of the Soviet government. This belittling treatment of United Nations aid has been something of a sore spot, but until this week's outburst by Ambassador Standley it was not a major issue, largely, we believe, because Americans and Englishmen know deep down that the thousands of tanks and planes we have contributed to the eastern front do not tip the balance against the millions of lives contributed by Russia. Now Standley has dragged the issue into the open, accusing the Soviet government of deliberately hiding from its people the facts concerning Anglo-American aid in order "to create the impression that they are fighting the war with their own resources." Indirectly, he has threatened that a continuation of this attitude might condition the extent of further lend-lease aid. As we go to press, it is impossible to say whether or not the Ambassador spoke with inspiration from Washington. From the undiplomatic tone of his remarks we suspect that he was sounding off on his own and that something in the way of an official repudiation will quickly follow.

✱

ON ANOTHER LEVEL AN IRRITANT TO GOOD relations with the Soviet Union is the execution of the Polish labor leaders—Ehrlich and Alter. The record of these men provides the strongest possible refutation of the charges of anti-war activity on which they were condemned by a Soviet court martial. They were not Socialists of a pacifist stripe. On the contrary, they helped organize the valiant resistance to the Nazis of the workers of Warsaw, and kept up the struggle long after the Polish government had fled. That they were anti-Communist is certain, but it is not easy to believe that, as Poles, stranded in Russia and wholly at the mercy of the Soviet government, they engaged in conspiracies against the regime. Whatever their offense, the act of the Russian military authorities has outraged opinion in other countries, especially among Socialist and Jewish workers, who were slowly coming to realize the need of closer ties with their fellow-workers in Russia. And in reactionary circles, where the fate of two labor men would ordinarily be a matter of vast unconcern, the executions are being used as another instrument against the unity of Russia and the West. For this the chief responsibility lies with the Soviet government. The execution of Ehrlich and Alter was not only bad justice; it was also bad propaganda. But people in this country have a responsibility too. It is no accident that on the same day pickets marched up and down in front of both the British and the Russian consulate in New York; those groups which allow their sympathy for the cause of Indian freedom to boil over into anti-British propaganda are equally ready to use the death of the two Polish Socialists as the basis for an anti-Soviet campaign. Such behavior plays directly into the hands of Goebbels. The enemy in this war is still the international fascist conspiracy headed by Adolf Hitler—and not either one of our chief allies.

HENRY WALLACE'S SPEECH BEFORE THE Conference on Christian Bases of World Order might have been subtitled A Plain Man's View of the World. It was bold, simple, and utterly disinterested. Even its religious overtones, which in the mouths of public officials usually sound like a politician's set phrases, held no hint of hypocrisy, for Wallace is genuinely religious. His description of the "three great philosophies in the world today"—the Prussian, the Marxian, the democratic—might not satisfy the political philosopher, but it was a description that is basically sound and easily understood by the ordinary person. We are grateful to Mr. Wallace for speaking frankly of the third great conflict which will be the penalty the plain man must pay if he fails to fight for a decent peace after World War II. We are particularly glad, in this connection, that Mr. Wallace talked sense about the German people at a moment when even intelligent men and women are preaching hatred and extermination. They are, he said, "neither better nor worse than Englishmen, Americans, Swedes, Poles, or Russians"; but for a hundred years, and especially in the last ten, they have been systematically educated to the belief that might makes right, that war is glorious, that the state is all supreme. They must be reeducated—but here again Mr. Wallace offered no imposed panaceas. "It is not up to the United Nations to say just what the German schools of the future should teach, and we do not want to be guilty of a Hitler-like orgy of book burning. But it is vital to the peace of the world to make sure that neither Prussianism, Hitlerism, nor any modification of them is taught." Within these limitations it is the "many cultured German scholars with an excellent attitude toward the world who should be put to work on the job of rewriting the German textbooks in their own way." Finally, Mr. Wallace stated with fresh force that unless the Western democracies and Russia come to a satisfactory understanding before the war ends, World War III will be inevitable.

✱

IN THE SECOND PART OF HIS ARTICLE, Why Food Is Scarce, James G. Patton, president of the National Farmers' Union, discusses the food-production program which he presented last week to the National Economic Stabilization Board. Mr. Patton's objective is to increase the contribution to the nation's food supplies of some 2,000,000 medium and small farms which have a margin of unused capacity. He proposes that this should be done by pooling labor and machinery and by a government investment of $1,000,000,000. This may seem a large sum, although it is only 1 per cent of this year's budgeted war costs. But in any case it is a small price to pay if it saves us from a condition of scarcity that will hamper the war effort. Moreover, the alternative seems to be to let prices rise unchecked until supply and demand reach an equilibrium—a policy which would cut the living standards of everyone and add untold billions to the cost of the war. Mr. Patton believes that the present price level is satisfactory on the whole, but he urges a system of forward prices so that the farmer will know what return he may expect when he sows his crop. It cannot be said that prospects for the adoption of this program are very hopeful. The farm bloc in Congress has shown little interest in the small farmer, and Mr. Wickard, the Secretary of Agriculture, seems bent on appeasing the farm bloc, as we noted last week. The latest step in this direction is permission to farmers to increase cotton-planting allotments by 10 per cent despite the fact that we have abundant short-staple cotton. The excuse given is that the by-product of this crop—cotton seed—is an excellent source of protein feed and edible oil. But according to Professor Theodore W. Schultz of Iowa State College, "in terms of oil yield peanuts do three times as well as cotton seed per acre."

✱

THE UNITED STATES POST OFFICE HAS decided to deny second-class mailing privileges to an obscure organ called the Militant on the ground that it has attempted "to embarrass and defeat the government in its effort to prosecute the war." From the little we have seen of the periodical and from what we know of leftist splinter politicians, we find it easy to believe that the Militant entertained such gaudy ambitions but impossible to believe that it had the faintest chance of realizing them. Censorship of the press is in its nature so risky that we favor a rigid adherence to the Holmes doctrine of taking no action except in cases of "clear and present danger." If the Militant represented anything like the menace of, say, Social Justice, we would witness its complete suppression without a qualm. But a few facts should make apparent the fatuousness of the Post Office's solemn action in the case of the Militant. Of the paper's total circulation of 12,000 (probably an inflated figure), only about 1,200 readers receive their copies through the mail. Presumably these are subscribers, and as such confirmed Trotskyists of the same persuasion as the Militant's editors. They don't need the paper to be stirred to the heretical belief that this is an imperialist war; they start out with that conviction. In short, the Post Office is using a dangerous power so that 1,200 individuals will no longer learn by second-class mail what they already think they know. The government has been sparing in the use of its censorship powers in this war, and we are sorry to see it set a dangerous precedent to so little purpose.

✱

A MERE HEADLINE READER MIGHT ASSUME that the greatest threats to war production these days are absenteeism—and glamor. On another page of this issue, as no Nation editorial writer can refrain from pointing out, James Wechsler deals with absenteeism. We defy anyone to deal with glamor. Telling women war workers to "forget sex appeal"—we quote Miss Dorothy Sells of the Office of Defense Transportation—is almost as futile as telling men to go and do likewise. But Miss Sells is not dismayed by a problem that has been with us for a long time. She goes right on to denounce the "well-filled sweater" (it sounds like a War Aim) and asserts sternly that "women need firm discipline." Uplift in this country, as any brassiere manufacturer will tell you, has come to stay. It seems to us that Miss Sells is forgetting another old problem—reproduction—without which wars could not even get under way. In Germany of all places, glamor, according to Wallace Deuel, is now encouraged after an early unproductive attempt to stamp it out as non-essential. We have been told to learn from our enemies; and from the pictures we've seen of Nazi Frumpy Frauen it seems quite possible that the glamor girls on the American assembly line, even if they induce absenteeism, are an asset rather than a liability. In any case, we doubt that sumptuary legislation—or factory rules—against sweaters, lipsticks, or the seeing eye will get very far. Nature will take its course, even in Mother Hubbards.

Strategic Frontiers and Collective Security

THE series of sharp exchanges between Moscow and the Polish government-in-exile over the delimitation of frontiers, after the Nazis are liquidated, again calls attention to the urgent necessity of "a common strategy for peace"—to quote the recent report of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace. Russia's tough attitude in respect of the little Baltic states and eastern Poland has shocked a good many people in this country who feel that it is already repudiating the Atlantic Charter. On the other hand even some of our reactionaries are praising the Kremlin for being "realistic" and urging that we should make haste to follow its example.

Russia's claims for expansion beyond its pre-1939 borders are being justified on more than one ground. Eastern Poland, it is asserted, is largely inhabited by Ukrainians and White Russians who ought not to be separated again from their brothers in the autonomous Soviet republics of White Russia and the Ukraine. One can sympathize with this argument when one recalls that not so many years ago the treatment of the Ukrainian minority in Poland was one of the major scandals of Europe.

It seems certain, however, that Russia's major reason for demanding the inclusion within its boundaries of the Baltic states and the disputed Polish territories is a desire for "security." Used by a hostile power, this area would form a massive springboard for attacks directed against Leningrad and Moscow. It was to avert this danger that the Soviet Union extended its frontiers in 1939 and thus added to its defense system a depth which stood it in good stead in the summer of 1941.

But do exigencies that existed when Hitler was at the height of his power justify demands at the expense of small nations after Hitler is liquidated? The answer depends largely on the sort of world we are to have after the war. If we are going to have a genuine system of collective security, strategic frontiers ought to become an obsolete conception. But at present it cannot be said that we, any more than the Russians, are proceeding on that assumption. It is true that a good deal of lip-service is paid in this country to the ideal of collective security. The Russians, however, may be forgiven if they pay more attention to the fact that, far from attempting to clothe that ideal with reality, many of our spokesmen seem preoccupied with the question of strategic security for America.

Secretary of the Navy Knox, for instance, is currently agitating the question of acquiring Pacific naval and air bases. And he has made it clear that he is not thinking about the Japanese mandated islands, which we may eventually hope to capture, but rather about bases in territories owned by our allies, who, he suggests, should be invited to turn them over to us in perpetuity in return for lend-lease contributions. Moreover, Mr. Knox has just told us that his department is planning for a "permanently enlarged fleet."

If after the Axis is defeated, the world is to slide back into the pre-war international anarchy, Messrs. Stalin and Knox can hardly be criticized. But we do not believe that the peoples of the United Nations are willing to resign themselves to such a future. There is a demand for collective security which the statesmen will ignore at their peril. And the time to lay its foundations is now, before the defeat of our enemies opens the way for a free-for-all game of strategic grab.

No plans for collective security can be even formulated without the definite assurance of participation by the United States. At the end of this war we shall command a greater force for good or evil than the world has ever known. We shall possess the greatest air force, the greatest navy, and the greatest war plant, together with a very large army. This predominant position will give us the inescapable responsibility of choosing either to direct the world toward a peaceful future or to persuade it by our example to turn once again to the delusive security of strategic frontiers and back-breaking armament programs.

As the Report of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace points out:

The British will hesitate to commit themselves to a new colonial or commercial policy if they fear that the United States will again retire into isolationism after this war. The Russians may feel it necessary, in self-defense, to seize important points in Europe unless the United States will accept her share of the responsibility for collective security in the world. The Chinese do not care for hegemony in the Far East, but they may find it necessary to protect themselves if there is no international system to give them protection. The American republics must delay their planning for the future until the policy of the United States is made clear.

Such assurances cannot be given by the Administration alone. Our allies remember all too well that Woodrow Wilson was repudiated by Congress, and they will feel no confidence in any proposals put forward by Washington unless they are underwritten by the legislative arm of the government. Recently there has been some faint stirring of interest in such questions on Capitol Hill. Senator Gillette has put down a resolution urging the President to negotiate an agreement giving substance to the Atlantic Charter, and Senator Pepper has made the excellent suggestion of a joint Congressional committee to study post-war problems. Even more interesting is the news that Senator Bennett Clark, one of the leaders of the isolationist bloc prior to Pearl Harbor, is considering the introduction of a joint resolution favoring "the establishment of a system of collective security, including international, social, economic, and military protections and . . . the effective participation of the government of the United States in the maintenance of this system." We hope Senator Clark will persevere in this project. The passage of such a resolution would have an electric effect on the United Nations and would assure him a place in history.

The Man-Power Muddle

AS THE man-power situation becomes more critical, Washington's utter lack of a basic policy becomes more evident. Each of the half-dozen Congressional committees studying the problem has come up with its own solution. One wants to revise our draft procedure so as to give blanket exemption to farm workers. Another would throw out the principle of occupational deferments and reinstate dependency as the chief basis of deferment. The Education and Labor Committee of the Senate some weeks ago sponsored a bill to set up a civilian Office of War Mobilization to coordinate all man-power activities, while the House Appropriations Committee recently eliminated from the budget an essential appropriation for strengthening the one agency, the United States Employment Service, that is capable of bringing order out of chaos in local communities.

This confusion in Congressional ranks has greatly hampered Manpower Director Paul V. McNutt in dealing with the increasingly acute situation. As long as McNutt was content to tinker with minor aspects of the problem he encountered no opposition from Congress. But the moment he attempted to come to grips with the problem by such drastic action as the "work-or-fight" order, the forty-eight-hour week in critical areas, and measures to freeze men in war jobs, a drive was started against him. As a result he has been unable to offer the kind of leadership the situation demands.

Mr. McNutt has insisted that the country's man-power needs can be met most effectively by voluntary measures. Accordingly the War Manpower Commission has placed chief reliance on local labor-management stabilization agreements designed to reduce labor turnover and speed the transfer of workers from non-essential to essential industries. It cannot be denied that these stabilization agreements have improved the situation in many localities. Labor piracy has been greatly reduced; discrimination by employers against women and Negroes has been cut down. Nevertheless, these voluntary arrangements are not putting men and women in jobs as rapidly as is required in an all-out war program. Donald Nelson, chairman of the War Production Board, recently testified before a Senate committee that the country is short 2,250,000 workers of the number needed to achieve and maintain present production goals. This does not take into account the shortage in agricultural labor, estimated at nearly 1,000,000. Moreover, the War Manpower Commission has been inexcusably slack in long-range planning. Apparently it has not tackled the most fundamental of all problems, that of balancing military and civilian man-power needs. And it has never taken adequate steps to recruit and train women workers. It has been conspicuously lax in encouraging the organization of day nurseries and facilities for the care of older children which would release mothers for war work.

In an attempt to offset the Manpower Commission's lack of planning, the President has appointed a special committee headed by Stabilization Director James F. Byrnes to consider basic policy. Its report is not yet available. But as a result of the failure of McNutt's voluntary program, there is an excellent chance that on its recommendation Congress will pass the Austin-Wadsworth war-service bill. This bill would apply the principles of Selective Service to the recruitment of essential workers in war industry and agriculture. No one can quarrel with these principles. In a total war no distinction should be made between a man's obligation to serve on the fighting front and on the home front. Women should be expected to serve to the limit of their capacities in the same way as men. Advocates of the Austin-Wadsworth bill are probably correct in insisting that the government's right to assign workers in accordance with the country's needs must be established by law before we can bring order out of the present man-power chaos.

But a labor draft can be successful only if the public is convinced that it is the fairest and most efficient method of distributing the burdens of war. In England the demand for a labor draft came very largely from the common people, who knew that sacrifices must be made and who asked only that they be made by everyone. Organized labor was strongly behind the plan. There is no reason to believe that American labor would react any differently if it were given an effective voice in planning the details of the program and were assured that the interests of the average worker would be adequately safeguarded.

In its present form the Austin-Wadsworth bill virtually ignores labor's interests. It contains no provision for protecting organized labor in union or closed shops against dilution by unorganized workers. There is nothing in the bill that would prevent a skilled worker from being moved arbitrarily from a highly paid to a poorly paid job in the same or another industry. Nor is there protection against discrimination because of race, sex, or union affiliation. Passage of the Austin-Wadsworth bill without these elementary safeguards might stir up a hornet's nest of labor opposition that would seriously delay the war effort. But we believe that it is possible to work out a compromise measure that will prove acceptable to all groups in the population.

While the Jews Die

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

JEWs in Europe are being killed because they are Jews. Other innocent people are being killed too—hostages, men and women who resist oppression, old people who consume food needed by German soldiers and workers. But only Jews are being killed without other excuse or cause than the fact that they belong to a single religious-racial group. Hitler has promised their total liquidation, and he is carrying out that promise as fast as his Mobile Extermination Squads can work. They work fast. Seven or eight thousand Jews a week are being massacred. The ghetto of Warsaw, two years ago the dumping ground for Jews from all over occupied Europe, is now depopulated. Every Jew is dead. In Cracow, where 60,000 Jews lived, 56,000 have been killed.

The ways in which these slaughters are conducted have been reported. The numbers have been verified. The story is old. But the killing goes on. And as Hitler's armies are forced step by step back into Europe, the tempo of extermination quickens. He must hurry now lest the liberating armies arrive in time to rescue some fragment of the doomed race. It is not fantastic to believe that even when Hitler is overthrown, he will find profound compensation in leaving behind him a Europe "cleansed" of the hated Jew.

If this happens, no one living today will escape retribution for the crime. For the purge of the Jews is only positively a Nazi crime. In this country, you and I and the President and the Congress and the State Department are accessories to the crime and share Hitler's guilt. If we had behaved like humane and generous people instead of complacent, cowardly ones, the two million Jews lying today in the earth of Poland and Hitler's other crowded graveyards would be alive and safe. And other millions yet to die would have found sanctuary. We had it in our power to rescue this doomed people and we did not lift a hand to do it—or perhaps it would be fairer to say that we lifted just one cautious hand, encased in a tight-fitting glove of quotas and visas and affidavits, and a thick layer of prejudice.

Today we hear something is going to be done. Secretary Hull has suggested a meeting at Ottawa of the executive committee of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees appointed at the Evian Conference in 1938. This group will undertake "preliminary exploration" of the problem of the Jews in occupied Europe. But the exploration, it seems, is to proceed along rather well-worn trails. For, as Mr. Hull assured the British government, the United States government feels "that it has been and is making every endeavor to relieve the oppressed and persecuted peoples. In affording asylum to the refugees, however, it is and must be bound by legislation enacted by Congress determining the immigration policy of the United States."

By all means let's have the conference. But let's remember that it wasn't called because our government felt impelled to do something about the greatest crime committed in our generation. Not a move of any sort was made until a delegation of prominent Jews called on Secretary Hull and the President of the United States on December 8 and presented them with verified accounts of the massacres in Poland which were simultaneously released to the press. The President and Mr. Hull promised action. But nothing happened until more than a month later, on January 20 to be exact, when Lord Halifax presented an aide-memoire to Secretary Hull expressing the "concern" of the British government over the killings. And then it took another month for Secretary Hull to reply with the note quoted above. Hundreds of thousands of Jews fell into their self-dug graves while our government, with glacial slowness, moved toward a proposal to confer and to explore. And in view of this record of delay it is fair to wonder whether even this modest step would have been taken if a great mass-meeting of protest had not been called for March 1 in Madison Square Garden in New York—a meeting organized by the American Jewish Congress and sponsored by a group of important labor and liberal organizations. Mr. Hull's note to Lord Halifax was dated February 25. It was made public the day after the mass-meeting took place.

Whatever the sequence of events, we must be glad that some voices were loud enough to penetrate the official armor. But let us not bank too much on the new "Evian" conference. The first one was held in 1938 while it was still possible to save the Jews of Europe. But Hitler is still busy with the job of exterminating 5,000,000 of them. Let us be hopeful—but not sanguine.

And let us also acknowledge the uncomfortable fact that if a group of American Jews had not demanded action, nothing, not even a conference, would have resulted from the horrors in Europe. Let us acknowledge that in shame. And let us ask ourselves what has come over the minds of ordinary men and women that makes it seem normal and indeed inevitable that this country should stolidly stand by and do nothing in the face of one of the world's greatest tragedies until the Jews themselves press for action.

But what on earth could we have done more than we did do? We let in refugees until people protested that jobs were being taken from good Americans by an invading army of aliens. We let them come in to the limit of the quotas—provided, of course, that they had money and good sponsors and respectable political views. We did our best—all that public opinion and Congress and our State Department would permit. And why should we do it all, anyhow? How about Palestine? Why don't the British let them in there? And how about South America and Canada and Australia?

This is the sort of question non-Jewish Americans ask when they are faced with Jewish suffering and the reproaches of their own conscience. But the questions are not impressive, and the answers are easy.

One answer is that we could have cut down those barbed-wire defenses strung along our shores. We could have suspended the immigration quotas for the duration of Hitler. We could have raised funds to support refugees who couldn't bring out any money. We could have chartered ships to bring them from Europe. We could have put any questionable individuals in detention camps or segregated them on a Caribbean island. We could have offered an example of decency and humanity to a world hungry for evidences of good feeling.

We could have done all this. But we wouldn't have had to be quite so generous. An easier answer was at hand. We could have made the resolutions of the Evian conference a reality instead of a hollow gesture. We could have entered into an agreement for common action with the other anti-Axis nations—an agreement to absorb all the victims of Hitlerism who were physically able to escape—each nation taking a quota decided upon with due regard to its size and wealth and capacity to absorb immigrants. If the United States had taken the lead in such a move, I am certain that no nation would have refused its cooperation. And under such a scheme, the burden on each would have been insignificant.

But nothing was done. Every nation established its own restrictions, the United States admitting no more immigrants than in the days before the persecutions began. And so we come to the horrifying present.

The resolutions adopted by the mass-meeting at the Garden the other night were restrained and practical. Here they are, in summary:

1. Through neutral intermediaries, Germany and the governments of the states it dominates should be asked to release their Jewish victims and permit them to emigrate.
2. The United Nations should designate sanctuaries, in Allied and neutral states, for Jews whose release may be arranged for.
3. American immigration procedures should be revised in order that refugees may find sanctuary here within existing quotas.
4. Great Britain should be asked to receive a reasonable number of new refugees and accommodate them for the duration.
5. The United Nations should urge the Latin American republics to modify their immigration regulations sufficiently to provide refuge for agreed numbers of Nazi victims.
6. England should be asked to open the doors of Palestine for Jewish immigration.
7. The United Nations should provide financial guarantees to neutral states offering refuge to Jews from occupied territory.
8. The United Nations should organize the feeding through neutral agencies of victims forced to remain under Nazi oppression.
9. The United Nations should undertake the financing of the program here outlined.
10. The United Nations are urged to establish an intergovernmental agency to implement the program of rescue here outlined.
11. The United Nations are urged to appoint a commission forthwith to implement their declared intention to bring the Nazi criminals to justice.

This is a good program, though more moderate in several details than I would wish. How far it will influence the coming conference at Ottawa remains to be seen. One thing is certain. The United States—or the United Nations as a whole—will save only as many Jews as they are inflexibly determined to save. If the representatives of the anti-Axis powers meet in a mood of impatience, prepared to deal on a minimum basis with a difficult and irritating problem—if, in short, the mood of the past prevails—nothing will happen at Ottawa or after. Europe's remaining Jews will be saved only if their anguish has become unbearable to men and women who live in safety at a distance. They will be saved only if we recognize their fate as inextricably linked with our own.

Words Are Not Enough

BY ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

THE Speakers' Committee of a Chicago association wired me recently that the association wanted me to talk about psychological warfare but hoped I would call it something else. No neater summary of a complicated matter was ever sent by Western Union. "Psychological warfare" as a title repels almost as many Americans as "psychological warfare" as a subject fascinates. It sounds too much like a Pennsylvania hexing party, or the art and skill of jabbing heated needles into small wax dolls. The picture of a group of adult males, some of them in uniform, sitting as a "Committee on Psychological Warfare" to plot the undoing of the psyches of their enemies is a picture in which the elements of comedy, mystery, and terror are so inextricably confused that the ordinary citizen cannot make up his mind whether to grin or shiver.

There is a good deal to be said therefore for a discussion of the realities as distinguished from the terminology. What precisely are we talking about when we talk about psychological warfare? Are we talking about a new terror of war like the terror—infinitely overrated—of bacteriological warfare or of chemical warfare? Are we talking about a secret weapon invented, this time, by Freud? Are we talking about the use of whippers by wireless and shouts over loud speakers—the dissemination of rumors on crowded roads and the broadcasting of panic? Or are we talking about something else?

We should have no difficulty in agreeing, I think, that we are talking, if we are talking seriously, about something else. It is not, that is to say, the black arts or the ingenious devices or the clever tricks which principally concern us. It is not even the offices and agencies of government in which this form of warfare is conducted. It is the form of warfare itself. The offices and agencies of political and psychological warfare both here and in Great Britain are offices of communication and dissemination—hard-working and overburdened men and women whose days and nights are filled with programs and publications, with radio and leaflets, with the problems of timing and the problems of beaming and the problems of interpretation, and the over-all, ever-present problems of intelligence—of the understanding and the integration and the fitting together of the complicated facts. They are not, here or in Britain or in any honest country, the manufacturers of a product but its distributors. And their activities, fascinating though they may look through the darkened glass of professional reticence, are not the real object of intelligent concern. The real question, the question that is never asked by those whose interest is in mystery and melodrama, is the question of the substance of the thing itself. What warfare? Waged by whom? And with what weapons?

There will be various answers to that question, depending on where it is asked. There is the answer, for example, of those who believe psychological warfare is a bright, new branch of military warfare which can be "planned" by the generals and the strategists in a guarded room with a secret staff of experts and advisers, as you would plan a movement of troops. There is the answer of those who believe that psychological warfare is an operation for psychologists, to be run as you would run a psychiatric clinic, and of those again who look upon psychological warfare as an activity for journalists, to be practiced on typewriters, or a profession for refugee scholars and refugee statesmen who know how to play by short wave on the fears and aspirations of their countrymen in Europe.

These are the answers commonly heard, but none of them, or so it seems to me, is true. And for a very simple reason—that none of them takes account of the essential nature of the action. What we are really talking about when we talk seriously of psychological warfare is, I submit, nothing more mysterious and nothing less important than the effort of a nation at war to enlist the opinion of the world—enemy opinion as well as neutral opinion or friendly opinion—in support of its position and its purposes. Psychological warfare, in other words, is nothing more and nothing less than that branch of warfare of which the field of battle is men's minds and the objective men's opinions—a form of warfare waged to conquer, not cities or islands or elevations or continents, but the convictions of the world. A nation, to put it prosaically, wages psychological warfare to convince its enemies that they cannot win and to persuade the rest of humanity that it not only can win but will win and should win and furthermore deserves their help in winning.

It is unnecessary to point out that there is nothing novel about such warfare except the word "psychological"—which has somehow or other become attached to it in our time—and the methods of communication, such as short-wave radio and leaflets dropped from planes, which are now employed in its prosecution. Generals have always fought on the battlefields of men's minds as well as on the battlefields provided by geography. Indeed, the ultimate victory sought in any war is inevitably a victory of opinion. It is not by massacre of one's opponents to the last male child that wars are won but by the persuasion of the enemy that further resistance would be useless. The purpose of modern psychological warfare is precisely that purpose. Psychological warfare aims to do, more adroitly and with less expenditure of men and iron, what Caesar did by the fame of Rome and the unanswerable logic of the Roman legions.

The objectives have not altered. And neither—and this is the essence of the matter—have the weapons of this warfare. It is still by its armies and by its actions as well as by its broadcasts and its leaflets that a modern nation convinces its enemies of its strength, and its neighbors of the desirability of coming to its aid. With a nation as with a man it is the total impression—the conduct summed up in terms of character—which counts. And with a nation as with a man actions speak far louder than words. It will do you very little good, and may indeed do you considerable harm, to say you are powerful if in fact you are losing battles. And it will not help you but will certainly injure you if you protest the nobility of your principles while you display a preference for expediency in your acts.

The addition of the word "psychological" has not changed these all too obvious truths. It may be, though readers of Greek poetry will doubt it, that the psychologists have discovered aspects of human fear and aspects of human self-interest unknown to earlier men, but these discoveries, if they have been made, have left the principles of human conduct unaltered. You can so appeal to the fears of the world's reactionaries and the self-interest of its petty tyrants as to persuade them, if you are Dr. Goebbels, that you are the savior of truth and virtue, but no one else will believe you indefinitely if your own conduct in Germany and in conquered Europe makes it obvious that your protestations are not true. No inventiveness in the arts of terror or seduction can change the fact, now or ever, that nations, at war as at peace, speak to the world and persuade the world by the things they do as well as by the things they say—and more convincingly.

The point needs making not because it is obscure but because it is too easily forgotten. Men, and men not of the least intelligence or the smallest authority, speak sometimes as though the actions of a nation could be divorced of their significance in the world of human judgments—as though there were such a thing, for example, as a purely military action having only military meaning—as though a military action could be stripped of its human meaning and left dumb and inarticulate and meaningless as a stone. An action which could not be justified on any other ground may, it is true, be justified on military grounds, but it is foolish to hope that any act of a nation at war will not be interpreted by the watching world as an expression of that nation's actual character and inner purpose. And it is a little unrealistic to expect that the world or anyone in it will think of the most purely military action in purely military terms, as though it were an abstraction of military science or a footnote in a history. We did not so consider the military action by which Nazi Germany overran Poland, and we were not impressed by the contention of the Nazis that they were acting solely in a military capacity in their own defense.

The same thing is true of all the actions of a nation at war—its conduct of its international relations, its production of goods and weapons, the way its people behave, their determination and purpose, their ability to endure privation and suffering and even death. These are the expressions by which the nation speaks and is heard and understood. And these, therefore, are the essential weapons of the warfare for men's minds. The nation which carries the strategic points of opinion, the nation which captures the dominating heights of belief, is the nation which convinces the world by the total effect of its conduct as a nation. It is the wholeness of the expression which counts, for the wholeness of the expression is the guaranty of its sincerity.

The phrase about ideas being weapons is a good phrase and within the limits of its picturesqueness a true phrase, but as a guide to the practice of this form of warfare it is quite misleading. The implication is that a man's ideas will fight for him like his dog, and that in a struggle between opposing ideas the best idea will win. But the fact is that in the battles for men's minds ideas will fight for you only if you make them yours; and neither with nations nor with men are ideas appropriated by speaking them in words. There is no doubt in the mind of any sane and healthy man that the idea of human freedom is superior to the idea of human slavery, but unless the world is convinced by the totality of United Nations behavior that human freedom is on the United Nations' side in this war and that human freedom for others, as well as for ourselves, will follow from our victory, the idea of human freedom will not fight our battles for us.

It is unnecessary to look far for proof of the proposition that ideas will fight only for those who deserve to own them. The Nazi attempt to capitalize upon the worldwide fear of communism is the classic case. The world was generally agreed that communism was hateful. It was ready therefore to applaud and encourage the opposite of communism. But not all the efforts of all the propagandists in Germany were able to persuade anyone but General Franco and a few Balkan dictators that the opposite of communism is fascism. Nazi propaganda would have won its great victory, and the war as well, had it been able to persuade the peoples of Europe and the Americas that the ideas opposed to the idea of communism were its ideas. It failed because every expression of Nazism in action rather than in words suggested that the contrary was the case.

But there is no need to labor the point. The theory is clear enough, and the record is even clearer. The question before us here is the question of the application of this theory and record to the practice of psychological warfare. If the real weapons of what is miscalled psychological warfare are the actions and the declarations of a fighting nation as they affect the opinions of that nation's enemies and of the world besides—the total actions of that nation—then how should this form of warfare be considered? Is it an auxiliary to other forms employing purely military weapons? Or is the opposite the case—is military warfare only one of the means by which this larger warfare, this warfare of the nation's total will, must be conducted?

The answer, I think, is obvious and would be even more obvious if the adjective "psychological" could be sponged out for good and all. What we are really talking about when we talk about the battle for men's minds is not a part of warfare, an incident of warfare, but the whole of warfare, of which other actions make the parts.

Even in the medieval wars of mercenary troops military action was only the most persuasive of the various means of convincing an adversary or attracting an ally. And what was true in the mercenary wars of the fourteenth century is considerably truer in the total war of our own time. Military action remains with us the most convincing, as it is the most difficult, of the warlike arguments, but not even the military argument can persuade alone. The Battle of Britain is the eloquent and moving proof. Britain was beaten—except that Britain was not beaten. And today the Nazi propaganda agencies hold out to the victims of the catastrophe at Stalingrad the example of the British nation, which turned military disaster into a people's victory by something else than arms.

But if this is true, then certain obvious conclusions follow as to the conduct of the warfare for men's minds. First, it can be conducted only by those who direct the total effort of the entire nation, those who can commit the nation by their words and make their acts its acts. Second, in democratic countries, and to a certain extent even in dictatorships, it can be conducted only with the support and participation of the people as a whole.

"ACCORDING TO PLAN"

The first point is obvious enough both in principle and practice. If a nation affects the opinions of the world by its total conduct as a nation—its production as well as its armies, the behavior of its people as well as the behavior of its diplomats—then the direction of these expressions of the nation's character and purpose can be exercised only by those who represent and speak for the nation as a whole. It cannot be exercised either by the generals or by the foreign office or by any other section of the government. And in practice, both here and in England, it has been the officer of government who alone can speak for the nation as a whole who has most effectively conducted this all-inclusive warfare. The most powerful blows delivered by Britain and the United States in the battle for men's minds have been delivered by Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt.

One need only recall the words and actions by which the loss of British prestige at Dunkirk was turned into the greatest victory British repute has ever won to estimate the role played by the Prime Minister in the struggle to convince the world, and above all to convince the German people, that Britain cannot be defeated in this war. And as for our own country, the massive blows we have struck for the defeat of the hopes of our enemies and the assurance of our own have been struck, one after the other, in words and acts as well, by Mr. Roosevelt. The Arsenal of Democracy, the Four Freedoms, Lend-Lease, the declaration of unlimited emergency, the order to shoot on sight, the production program of 1942—these, one after the other, were victories in the war for men's opinions, and they were victories gained, one after the other, by the President. The President and the Prime Minister are both, it is true, masters of the spoken word. But it is not for this reason that their declarations have taken strategic point after strategic point in the struggle for belief. Their declarations have been powerful because both combine the mastery of words with the mastery of action and because they speak, both of them, as the elected and supported leaders of their people.

For the second point as to the conduct of the warfare for men's minds is as important as the first. This warfare can be successfully conducted, at least in democratic countries, only with the support and often with the participation of the people. More penetrating and more powerful than anything the people of America may say by leaflet or by radio abroad is the echo overseas of what the people of America have said at home. The transmitters may tell the people of China after their ten years of agony that the American people are their friends and wish them well and will supply them as best they can with guns and planes to fight with, but their words are of little meaning beside the worldwide echo of the roar of approval which went up in the House of Representatives a month ago when the President spoke in praise of China. And so too the transmitters may repeat to every corner of the occupied countries of Europe the great commitments of the Atlantic Charter, but unless these commitments take breath from the words the Americans speak to each other in their talk at home, the assurances will not be heard.

The fact is that the opinion of a nation—its true and real opinion, the opinion it speaks to itself and hears from itself and accepts—is itself an action in this war. If the Nazis believe that we here believe that we shall surely win this war—believe it with understanding of the meaning of the words we speak, believe it soberly and grimly and speak of it in grim and sober earnestness between ourselves—their hope that we will be defeated is, by that much, shaken and decreased. If the peoples of the occupied countries and those who fight beside us in this war believe that we believe in freedom and in decency—believe in these things with an understanding of the meaning of the words, believe in them earnestly and with the devotion with which our fathers and our grandfathers believed in them—their determination to survive and to resist beside us will be that much greater. The people's morale in a democratic country is not an end in itself, whatever it may be in a dictatorship. The people's morale is a means, and one of the most powerful of all the means, by which the purpose of the people may be won.

The determination, for one example, of the American people will almost certainly decide the success or failure of the effort of their government to win, beyond this war, a lasting peace. The principal danger to that hope today is the danger that our allies in the war, remembering the defeat of Mr. Wilson's undertakings by the Senate, and realizing therefore that no American President and no American government can make commitments in advance, will decide now that each must take such measures as he can, alone and for himself, and will proceed, as opportunity permits, to take them. The inevitable consequence of such a course of action would be a repetition of the history of the last disastrous years. And yet that course of action will certainly be taken unless the world can have some reasonable and believable assurance that if other peoples will put their trust in order we will add our trust to theirs.

Such an assurance can be given under our system, the world now understands, only by those in whom the ultimate sovereignty resides, and by them only in human, not in legal, forms. And yet, so pressing is the necessity, so terrible is the alternative, there is little doubt that a clear indication of the purpose of the American people to bear their part in making peace would satisfy the Allied nations. They have learned by bitter experience the limitations on the powers of the American Executive, but they still believe that the will of the American people is binding on their Senators and Presidents and that the people of America can make their purpose good.

It is therefore strictly and precisely true that the most critical struggle this nation's government has ever attempted on the battlefield of world opinion depends for its success upon the participation of the American people. There is reason, I think, to believe that the participation of the people is assured. No disinterested observer questions the people's thinking on this subject. Even in sections of this country where private ministries of propaganda, conducted under the guise of the publication and the sale of "news," have attempted to stifle and suppress the people's thinking and to give distorted pictures of American opinion to the world, the truth is quite apparent. The people of this country are determined that there shall be peace. They know that peace has obligations and responsibilities, and they are ready to assume those obligations and responsibilities. They know what happened before. They know what it cost them. And they have made up their minds that it shall not happen again, and that no man nor any group of men shall make it happen.

There is no question that the American people have made up their minds. But neither is there any question that unless American opinion can be so declared that all the world will hear it—unless the truthful interpretation of American opinion can be set above those other interpretations which traduce it and distort it—this battle for a decent and a lasting peace may have been lost before we start to fight it.

What Has Happened to Hitler?

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

THIS is no inside story from the Führer's headquarters, but merely an attempt to distil a few drops of truth from a welter of facts and rumors.

The mystery of Hitler's whereabouts, his prolonged silence, and the Wagnerian orgy of gloom after the Stalingrad disaster have produced a flood of conflicting and generally unsubstantiated reports that Hitler is (a) dead, (b) insane, (c) permanently intoxicated, (d) prisoner of the Russians, (e) under arrest, (f) ill. What are the known facts underlying these rumors?

Hitler made his last public appearance on November 8, 1942, when he addressed a Nazi Party rally at Munich on the anniversary of the beer-hall putsch. Six weeks earlier he had spoken at the Berlin Sportpalast. In his Munich speech Hitler, as usual, went far out on a limb. He said about Stalingrad: "I wanted to take it. And—you know we are modest—we actually have it. There are only some very small spots left." He also promised early eviction of the Anglo-American forces which had just landed in North Africa.

But things didn't come off a bit as he had planned. The Germans met with continuous reverses both in Russia and in Africa: Stalingrad, Kursk, Rostov, Kharkov, and Tripoli were lost in rapid succession. Hitler made no more speeches; nor did he appear in public. He even failed to show up at two of the party's greatest memorial dates—January 30, the tenth anniversary of its rise to power, and February 24, the official birthday of National Socialism. On both occasions he addressed the faithful by proxy, in manifestos read by Joseph Goebbels and Hermann Esser. The wondering party comrades were given the unconvincing explanation that the Führer was too busy on the eastern front to attend the celebrations. Perhaps he really could not absent himself from the front; but there are many technical devices that will carry a leader's voice to a far-off audience from any place of his choosing.

There is no point in discussing whether or not the two written messages were Hitler's own compositions. Many persons find them as Hitlerian in spirit and style as "Mein Kampf." On the other hand, some very discerning observers think they are just clever imitations. Surely it would not be beyond Goebbels's ability to produce outpourings which Hitler himself might mistake for his own stuff.

What is important is that we did not hear the voice. (If Hitler's voice could be imitated, that would have been the time to do it.) Nothing can explain Hitler's failure to speak, through a microphone or from a record, but the assumption that he was physically or mentally unable to do so. Hence the rumors.

Let us now examine the plausibility of each rumor.

Hitler is dead. This is sheer speculation, unwarranted by any known fact. Since his failure to appear or to speak could be explained by many other contingencies, there is no need to attribute it to death. As for the three-day national mourning after Stalingrad, this is a far-fetched argument for the theory of Hitler's demise. Why shouldn't a highly dramatic regime like the Nazis' mourn over a military catastrophe of such magnitude?

Hitler is insane. The obvious answer is that he has always been insane, and that this has never prevented him from making speeches.

Hitler is drinking. This is the kind of "inside story" a correspondent facing a dearth of copy would dream up. It ranks with the recurrent stories of Hitler's sexual orgies. All such reports are contradicted by the known facts about the type of man he is.

Hitler is a prisoner. If the Russians had captured him, you can be sure they wouldn't hide him under a bushel. Nothing is more damaging to the morale of the enemy than to announce the capture of his commander-in-chief.

Hitler is under arrest. This could happen only after a military coup d'état. But it is absurd to think that the generals would arrest the Führer and leave his principal henchmen untouched. If and when the military strike, you can be sure that all the leading Nazis will be taken care of.

Hitler is sick. This is the only assumption that stands up under scrutiny. And it is not a mere guess. There are good reasons to believe that the Führer is really seriously ill.

The main evidence supporting this theory comes from the "Chief," the mysterious announcer who broadcasts daily over the secret German radio station Gustav Siegfried Eins. It is quite irrelevant in this connection whether the "Chief" is a voice of the German underground or broadcasts from somewhere outside the Reich—there are reports that he is a high German officer. Whoever he may be, and whomever he may represent, the "Chief" has proved many times that he knows what he is talking about. He has uncanny information about the most secret happenings in the Third Reich. He has many notable scoops to his credit. For instance, he revealed as early as last October 28 that Hitler had replaced his Chief of the General Staff, General Franz Halder, with the then totally unknown S. S. general Kurt Zeitzler. At the time nobody believed the story, but Berlin officially confirmed it in December.

In recent weeks the "Chief" has repeatedly referred to Hitler's poor health. On February 2 he said: "The man has utterly overworked himself. He is a physical wreck now as a result of that abdominal trouble [an apparently serious ailment which the "Chief" had mentioned once before]. But instead of undergoing an operation he lets that brute, Dr. Brandt, pep him up with injections. And these injections drive him even more crazy." And on February 15: "The man is washed out, physically and mentally exhausted. All those who have seen him in recent weeks have had to confirm this impression. . . ."

This description of an ailing Hitler is strikingly borne out by a recent photograph which shows him precisely at his last public appearance in Munich. The caption calls attention to Hitler's "tousled hair, rather sagging jowls, pouchy eyes, a double chin, and enlarged midriff." Indeed, the picture is so startling that one is tempted to doubt its authenticity. Yet according to reliable information, it is an actual photograph of Hitler in the beer hall, sent to London through neutral channels. If the Führer looked like that four months ago, one can imagine what the débâcle in Russia must have done to his declining health.

Another significant item has just been added to these indications. On March 3 the London Daily Sketch reported in its "inside-information" column that Hitler was at his mountain retreat at Berchtesgaden and that it was believed he had not been at the Russian front for two months. And, said the paper, Hitler's physician, Professor Sauerbruch, has recently left Berlin for an unknown destination. Dr. Sauerbruch, who also treated President Hindenburg, is one of Germany's foremost surgeons, a specialist in internal complaints.

All this adds up to the conclusion that Hitler is in fact gravely ill and probably laid up at his Berchtesgaden home, where Sauerbruch now at last may be performing the operation which "that brute" Dr. Brandt tried to avoid by means of injections. The Rome report that Hitler and Mussolini have just met "somewhere in Germany" seems to confirm rather than contradict this impression. Of course it is possible that the news was "planted" to reassure the Axis public that Hitler is still alive; on the other hand, there is no reason why such a meeting should not take place at the Führer's bedside, even though he is too ill to appear in public.

The "Chief," in baring Hitler's state of health, had a purpose: he has persistently exhorted the Führer to relinquish active command of military operations and again to intrust the conduct of the war to firmer and more experienced hands. For the "Chief" would by no means rejoice over a complete German defeat; on the contrary, he is violently anti-Soviet and nationalistic. He is believed to belong to the officer clique which now detests Nazism because it has forever destroyed Germany's chance to conquer the world. He and his kind do not relish the sight of a human wreck interfering autocratically in military operations.

The most interesting feature of the whole mystery is that Hitler, in the past few weeks, apparently has given up his control of military operations. We need not credit the "Chief" with this achievement, but it was undoubtedly brought about through the efforts of the military circles which he is said to represent. Though Hitler may still be the titular head of the German state and of its army, he no longer commands in the field, nor apparently at home. This conclusion is inescapable if one studies certain recent reports and observes how they all fit into the picture.

From Swedish sources we learn that General Halder is back at his former post and that other competent generals—Guderian is one—have also been recalled from retirement. Besides, the increasing firmness of German lines in southern Russia suggests that military operations are once more handled by professionals, not amateurs.

Meanwhile, in Germany, Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels emerges more and more as the man of the hour. After his recent speech neutral observers expressed amazement at the unusual honors now being accorded the little propaganda wizard. And on February 26 Gunnar Müller, former Berlin correspondent of the Stockholm Aftonbladet, declared that political power in the Reich had passed into the hands of a quartet of high Nazi officials headed by Goebbels. Aftonbladet is notoriously German-inspired and unreliable, but this development also has been reported by the more trustworthy correspondent of the New York Times.

The most plausible explanation, then, of Hitler's eclipse is that he has at last yielded to the persistent pressure of his generals and other advisers and retired to nurse his ills. These seem to be of a serious nature. We may yet see Hitler die in bed like Napoleon, and possibly of the same disease.

Why Food Is Scarce

BY JAMES G. PATTON

II

IN THE dual role of Secretary of Agriculture and Food Administrator, Claude R. Wickard, an Indiana farmer, faces a task far more difficult than the conversion of American industry to war production. Pearl Harbor, Bataan, and Singapore convinced industry that conversion was necessary; imports of rubber and other vital industrial materials had been cut off. But our food supply did not seem in danger, and many farmers and the public assumed that food surpluses would continue. In attempting to convert agriculture to war, Wickard has to deal with about 6,000,000 farm operators, whereas potential war industries were concentrated in a few hundred enterprises. Politically, he has to deal with farm-bloc Congressmen dominated by men from cotton states sensitive to any proposal to divert millions of acres to the production of food instead of cotton, of which we have about two years' supply on hand.

Although he had no counter-balancing political support from farm organizations, consumers, or the public, Wickard last November considered a sweeping plan for the complete reorganization of the great Department of Agriculture, with its 64,000 employees in every farm county in the nation, into a single machine for the production and distribution of food. He was specifically authorized to do this by the President's Executive Order of December 5. But the political repercussions in Congress, which controlled appropriations, appeared so great that the original plan was shelved and a compromise program adopted. Existing agencies were continued, and after the departure of H. W. Parisius, who resigned as Food Production Director on January 9 in protest against the shelving, Wickard inaugurated great departmental activity. Production goals were raised and support prices announced on several vital crops, including soy beans, peas, grain sorghums, flax, potatoes, and sweet potatoes. Corn, which had been scheduled for a smaller yield in 1943 than in 1942, was stepped up—though only 5 per cent—and its acreage restrictions were removed. Late in February acreage restrictions on wheat were removed. These steps had long been urged by the Farmers' Union. Credit to finance increased production in the sum of $225,000,000 was offered in Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation non-recourse loans, to be administered by local representatives of the county war boards. These are dominated by the AAA, which is now shifting its policy from one of controlled production to one of expansion. The loans are to run for one year at 5 per cent.

Incentive payments were offered to farmers producing more than 90 per cent of such crops as sweet potatoes, soy beans, grain sorghums, peanuts, flax, dried peas, potatoes, dry beans, and truck crops, up to 110 per cent of their production quotas. These payments were to be met out of an addition to the budget of $100,000,000, a request for which in Congress was promptly turned down by farming-as-usual leaders.

The Farm Security Administration, which is assisting nearly 500,000 low-income farmers to produce more, is to be continued—if the President's budget request is honored—but not expanded except for the recruiting, training, transportation, and housing of farm labor for larger farmers. By the time this is read, the FSA will have about run out of rehabilitation-loan funds—at a time when at least half a billion dollars should be available for expanding 1943 food production on the lower two-thirds of the nation's farms.

This program has satisfied no one. Spokesmen for the Farm Bureau, the Grange, and the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives (dominated by the Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation) late in January served notice on Congress that they would be satisfied with nothing less than the removal of price ceilings. They denounced incentive payments as subsidies and professed a new and passionate love for the free market and natural price levels. Spokesmen for these organizations were critical of the RACC loan program, the Farm Bureau and Grange going to the length of telling Congress that country bankers could meet farmers' new credit needs and should be given exclusive opportunity to do so. Wickard was given scant thanks for increased quotas of farm machinery and fertilizer and for belated steps by Selective Service to keep farm man-power on the farms. These measures were in part the result of Congressional pressure.

Our farm organization, as well as the leaders of some smaller groups which had likewise been urging all-out production since Pearl Harbor, recognized that Wickard had made his decision. While it was being tried, farmers would have to make the best of what was offered.

Although it is now too late to get in 1943 the maximum production of which American agriculture is capable, it is not too late to step it up somewhat. More important, it is not too early to act to get maximum production in 1944. And the world probably will be hungrier in 1944-45 than in 1943-44. What, then, should the program include?

The federal government should appropriate immediately up to one billion dollars to be invested in expanding the nation's farm plant by one-sixth, and it should appropriate another billion and a third to be invested in the following two years. Of this initial billion dollars, it should advance an average of $700 apiece to the 1,200,000 farm operators now producing from $400 to $1,500 in farm commodities annually. Allowing $50 for technical services and administration of each loan, this would total $900,000,000. The remaining $100,000,000 should be used to mobilize, train, and transport—and maintain labor standards for—most of another two million farm families who have so little land, equipment, and other resources that it is advisable to find them employment as farm laborers during the war emergency, thereby giving the top million farms the farm-bred labor they need. It may be that some of this labor can be spared for replacements in industry as inductions into the armed services continue at the rate of 12,000 a day.

For the probable food needs of the next three years, our farm plant is wholly inadequate. Compared with the intensive farming of Europe, American agriculture is inefficient in its use of land, machinery, and man-power. More than three-fourths of our farm families do not have enough livestock, tools, and other equipment to employ their full time efficiently. Many of them, compared to our large commercial farms, are grossly undercapitalized. In World War I we met increased food demands by bringing more land under cultivation. This time we cannot use that easy solution. We must expand production by investing in machinery, fertilizer, feed, and seed, and by better organization of farming operations on the land now occupied.

Even the commercialized farms which are responsible for most of our farm output can improve their methods. The million largest farms now produce two-thirds of the nation's total and are operating near capacity. But they must have machinery, replacement parts, repairs, fertilizer, and man-power to keep up. They can pay for the machinery and the fertilizer; they can pay wages and provide the housing for hired labor. The mobilization and transportation of the labor can best be done by the government as part of the war effort and should be paid for by the government.

Claude R. Wickard

The best opportunity for immediate expansion of production, however, is found among the middle-income farmers, those with gross incomes of between $400 and $1,500 a year. At least 1,000,000 of these farms, and probably 1,500,000, can show rapid production increases if mobilized in a livestock farming program that will provide full year-round employment. Such a program will also help to improve their soils.

Many require additional equipment. New equipment and that already in the neighborhood can be put to maximum use by community agreement. Machinery pools can draw in privately owned apparatus only if (a) the owner is guaranteed first call on his own implement, and (b) the government gives him a guaranty that the machinery will be maintained in working order and returned to him in as good condition as when he pooled it, or, if depreciated or worn out, that it will be replaced. County-wide cooperative machinery associations should be organized among farmers themselves, with government assistance when it is needed. Such cooperatives can schedule maximum employment of machinery, using county- and state-highway machine shops and garages as maintenance-and-repair stations. Of course some farmers have always shared some of their machinery, but now we must have full utilization, working it around the clock when feasible. The machinery inventory of large farms is more than adequate if enough machine operators, replacement parts, and repair services are provided. Big farmers must be induced to share their machinery with smaller farmers.

Farm man-power, both operators and hired labor, must be really stabilized by shutting off the suction of Selective Service and industrial employment. Job "freeze-ing" will work even less satisfactorily on farms than in industry. Coercion does not make the best workers. Commercialized agriculture must accept some minimum labor standards of wages, hours, housing, and sanitation.

Many middle-income farm families need somewhat larger farms in order to balance and fill out their operations. They should be assisted with credit and management to lease farms or parts of farms that have been vacated or are poorly run.

A system of forward pricing is necessary, that is, a contract to purchase all strategic foods and fibers at a specified price, together with full insurance against loss. The present level of prices is in the main satisfactory; in a few instances prices are too low, in others too high. But certainty of price is important to the grower. He should know a marketing season ahead what he is going to get. The government must make firm contracts with farmers themselves or with their cooperatives, just as it makes war contracts with industrial plants. Such contracts are extremely useful in getting farmers to shift from familiar to unfamiliar crops, and particularly to high-risk commodities such as flax, hemp, peas, tomatoes, and other truck crops—all vital war foods, all on the deficit list. The government assures manufacturers of financial aid and a market for munitions; likewise it should advance credit and guarantee a market to the farmer who is asked to run five more "fat factories" or five more "milk factories," that is, five more hogs or cows.

Some farmers who expanded peanut and soy-bean production in 1942 were disappointed when they moved them to market, and considerable tonnage, particularly in soy beans, was left in the fields for lack of labor and milling facilities. To prevent a repetition of this failure, the investigation proposed by Chairman Hampton P. Fulmer of the House Agriculture Committee should be useful. This investigation would inquire into the spread of food costs between grower and consumer, particularly into wasteful practices in marketing, processing, transportation, and supplies. We must cut waste of manpower and transportation facilities in the handling of food after it leaves the farmer's gate.

Finally, such steps as I have outlined must be the responsibility of a fully integrated food administration which is in turn fitted harmoniously into one over-all agency for total mobilization for total war.

As a matter of practical politics, conversion of agriculture to war is impossible until Congress feels the public demand. At present Congress is most conscious of the demands of big agriculture seeking ever higher prices, even at the risk of inflation. Closer attention and courageous leadership by the Administration will help. But the people have the last word. Until the people speak, "farming as usual" will continue to produce too little, too late, too dearly.

[Part I of this article appeared last week.]

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

IMPEACHMENT [of President Andrew Johnson] and the subject of appropriations have occupied most of the attention of Congress this week. . . . We shall be heartily glad to see Mr. Johnson relegated to private life if he should be convicted, but that his fate will furnish either a warning or an example to his successors we do not in the least believe. . . . There is one other consideration, too, more powerful than any, and that is that Mr. Johnson's acquittal will be the death of the Republican Party. Why it will be so, it would be easy to explain; but that it will be so, very few will deny.—March 5, 1868.

THE INCREASING infrequency of marriage at the present day is fast getting into the category of topics of universal discussion. . . . The cause, if we mistake not, is nothing less than the higher development of civilization and the new form which modern progress has given to modern life.—March 5, 1868.

MR. GLADSTONE has a decided turn for literary pursuits—a weakness it may be called, considering its results. . . . One wonders a little at the almost unqualified praise which the head of the Liberal Party gives Scott as a writer of historical novels. Surely Scott's novels left uncorrected would have made a statue of Cromwell bought with public money an impossibility in England.—March 5, 1868.

FOR CRITICAL EXAMINATION in detail, Mr. Darwin's new book ["The Variation of Animals and Plants Under Domestication"] must be referred to the scientific journals and to cultivators and breeders. But whatever audience he may address, a wide circle of general readers is sure to attend the founder of a new ism, and the word Darwinism has become as familiar as Galvanism or Mormonism.—March 19, 1868.

THE RESULT of the New Hampshire election has not been officially promulgated, but it is certain that Harriman is Governor. . . . On the whole, the Republicans have every reason to be very well satisfied. . . . Their adversaries, too, would be more than human not to be a little disheartened. . . . The Mobile Tribune, however, takes almost too melancholy a view of the situation. It receives the news with this welcome: "There is a sulphurous volcanic cloud rising over the northern land; and by the lurid light that gleams along its borders we can see houses in flames, and fields desolated, and outraged women flying with disheveled hair to hide their shame, and mastless hulks with blood-stained decks drifting rudderless on seas whitened no more for ever with the canvas wings of commerce, and cities of the dead whose mouldering ruins would topple over and fall with the jar upon the air of a single footstep upon their sidewalks, but the footstep is not there." It should remember that the Democrats have made gains in Biddeford, Maine, and other towns.—March 19, 1868.

How to Curb Absenteeism

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, March 6

REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN of Mississippi confided to a half-empty House the other day that God rescued Eddie Rickenbacker so that he might bring Americans the truth about absenteeism. It appears likely, however, that the current furor over hooky-playing among war workers would have occurred without divine intervention. The "strike wave" had been played up too hard at anti-union revival meetings; with walkouts reduced to an invisible minimum, the beat-labor-first bloc desperately needed an issue. And then came Rickenbacker. He accused home-front workers of lying down on (or off) the job, urged suspension of overtime payments as a sobering-up measure, and incidentally opposed the $25,000 salary ceiling as inconsistent with the American dream. He made "absenteeism" a headline word, and he got a lot of lecture invitations.

Since the aviator's first public sermon, the subject of the cause and cure of absenteeism has been magnified to amazing proportions. Most of the talking has been done by those who, like Rickenbacker, appear more eager to discredit labor than to cut down job absences. They have created the impression that the nation's workers, with the stealthy cooperation of the union bosses, are wilfully devising new and ingenious ways of staying home from work. Last week-end Admiral Edward L. Cochrane denounced an epidemic of "twenty-four-hour pneumonia cases" and asserted that the absentee problem "is one which can be solved only between the individual worker and his conscience." The best available evidence indicates that this is bunk. Informed government officials believe that if all "wilful absenteeism" were eliminated, only a minor increase in job attendance would result. Secretary of Labor Perkins has estimated that 90 per cent of the absences are due to industrial accidents and illness. Many accidents and some illness could be prevented, but not by workers communing with their consciences or by admirals delivering speeches.

None of this is to suggest that the loss from absenteeism is trivial. It isn't. People in the best position to know believe we have just begun to get a glimpse of the scope and nature of the problem. Labor Department surveys show that absenteeism in commercial shipyards has averaged about 7 per cent since last April; in air-frame plants, 6.4 per cent since January. The department's Monthly Labor Review admits that, apart from specific studies, "there is no statistical information available to indicate the general extent of absenteeism in war industries." All the localized inquiries, however, furnish indisputable evidence that involuntary absences are much more prevalent and serious than week-end binges. This was confirmed by the OWI's recent analysis of government information and by the absentee study prepared by Fortune.

The causes of involuntary absence should be pretty apparent; but they have been obscured by the loafing legend. Overnight expansion of war industries has created a multitude of daily annoyances and hazards for war workers. Inadequate transportation facilities become hopelessly snarled in bad weather. (Did any newspapers headline the story of two elderly Connecticut workers who went back to their jobs when war came, tried to walk to work in a blizzard, and perished on the way?) Lack of housing has forced families to live in trailer camps where illness rates have risen steeply; workers at Willow Run have been living in desolate shacks without heat or proper sanitary devices. Such conditions are imperiling the health of employees in many war-industry areas.

Again, the thousands of women who have been added to the labor force are intensifying the rising absentee rate. For one thing, women are less used to the arduous routine; for another, inadequate facilities for the care of their children and unavoidable housekeeping demands compel them to take time off. Similarly, the many older workers who have returned to the labor market are inevitably more subject to accidents, sickness, and fatigue than younger men. In many plants the work-week has been steadily lengthened, sometimes to fifty-four hours or more. British experience after Dunkirk showed that the cost of such an increase is many man-hours lost through absenteeism.

All these factors are by-products of the sudden creation of an industrial war machine. Some can be combated with direct government measures, such as large-scale housing projects. But a large part of the problem, most investigators believe, arises in the war plants themselves and is directly attributable to the negligence or the apathy of the management. Reports to the Labor Department reveal that fatigue, eye strain, poor ventilation, inadequate heat and sanitation, and lack of food facilities are all contributing to illness—and absenteeism. It has been found that steps as simple as providing decent drinking fountains and improved lighting will bring dividends in better job attendance. These so-called "frills" become imperative when men are working fifty-four hours a week.

There are usually two sides to every "horror story" about absenteeism. The front pages of many newspapers recently reported that the Bethlehem Steel Corporation had fired 150 welders at its Fore River shipyard because they were guilty of absenteeism. Editorials throughout the country cited the case. Subsequently the C. I. O. produced rebuttals from some of the men dismissed. One said that he had worked seven days a week for five and a half months, then got pneumonia and stayed home for two weeks. He was fired for absenteeism when he went back to work. Another said he went to the hospital for treatment of bleeding ulcers and was similarly dismissed when he returned.

Finally there is the impact of labor hoarding on workers' morale. C. I. O. officials have showed me numerous case-histories of plants which kept workers around idle because materials were lacking but which didn't want to cut their labor force. (Under fixed-fee contracts the government pays the bill anyway, and profits actually decline if labor costs are cut; besides, the materials may arrive some day.) At a Columbus, Ohio, aircraft plant men were told to go out and play basketball in the afternoon—they were "cluttering up" the plant. When this sort of thing happens, it is difficult to persuade an employee that his showing up for work every day may be a matter of life or death for a boy in North Africa or the Solomons.

It is as silly to think of "legislating" against absenteeism as to plan to outlaw the common cold. The real answer has been found in those war plants where labor-management committees are genuinely functioning and are not treated as mere window-dressing. Wendell Lund, labor director of the War Production Board, cites a California shipyard where absenteeism was drastically reduced after a labor-management committee had discussed its causes. The findings were elementary: the yard needed a sweeping safety program, including regulation of crane-loads, use of respirators in spray painting, and solid construction of scaffolding.

Records in the files of the Department of Labor show that this experience has been duplicated in plants throughout the country. Labor-management committees can also plan more effective utilization of the working force. They can stage morale drives which the workers will understand and respect because the leaders come from their own ranks. They can make life unpleasant for the habitual absentee. Unfortunately, too many managements still regard these committees as the prelude to socialism and either refuse to establish them or ignore their existence. Too many managements—and too many Congressmen—prefer the Rickenbacker cure. But it won't work.

In the Wind

THE AMERICAN THEATER WING is finding it hard these days to get actors to take part in its "Lunchtime Follies"—performances which are offered in war factories to ease the strain and stimulate production. Actors and actresses who used to give generously of their time and talent are now frequently "tied up." Direct questions put to several of them have brought the equally direct reply that after Rickenbacker's "revelations" they don't want to do anything for labor.

THE RUBICON, an Italian-American news letter published in New York, on war aims: "The reason why we are a democracy (pardon! republic) is not so that we can give democracy to the starving Hottentots and Javanese, but so that we may preserve our own Constitution and Bill of Rights here, not for the English, the Dutch, the French, the Russians, the Germans, or the Italians!"

BRAVE NEW WORLD: An article in Broadcasting, a radio trade magazine, puts it this way: "With the end of the war will come the golden age of American business and industry, and with it the golden age of good, hard-selling advertising technique."

THE OLD AGE PENSIONERS' ASSOCIATION of Scotland recently held a conference on the Beveridge Report. A unanimously adopted resolution condemned the provision for a graduated pension rising to twenty shillings weekly in twenty years, and advocated an immediate pension of thirty shillings.

A SOCIETY COLUMNIST for the San Francisco Chronicle recently visited the Greek consul-general in her city and was given ambrosia and nectar in the form of canapés and cognac. "All this," she wrote, "made me believe that no matter how starving the Greeks are today—and we all know that their situation is indescribably horrible—they are making some pretense at keeping up the niceties they have carried from generation to generation right down from Pericles."

THE NEW ORDER: Danish sources report that the town council of Svendborg has voted to give every child between two and seven years of age one hot bath a month. . . . Of 1,122 children examined in Copenhagen, every seventh had rickets. . . . The Danish press is not allowed to refer to Nazi meetings in Sweden as Nazi meetings. They may only be called "meetings." . . . A special ration of twenty pounds of dog biscuit per month is decreed for Alsatian dogs provided the owner can prove the animal's male parent was German. . . . Official Nazi cars in Holland have horns that give a distinctive sound, and when pedestrians hear it they must clear the road or take their chances of being killed. The published order "also applies to street cars."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Finland's "Peace" Offensive

BY JACK GERBER

SOME of our better-informed news editors and commentators apparently have not yet learned that the smart thing to do about a tendentious story out of Stockholm is to cock an eyebrow and ask: "What good can this do the Germans?" As a consequence of this gullibility, many people took at face value the recent Finnish "peace offensive," first explicit rumors of which came from Stockholm.

But the actual beginning of it goes back to Stalingrad. Nazi propaganda turned the defeat at Stalingrad into "proof" that the "Bolshevik hordes" have the strength to "overrun the world." A major portion of Axis broadcasting time was turned over to "proving" the Soviet intention to rule the world.

For American consumption that kind of talk has a relatively limited appeal. Faced with an imminent second front and the Roosevelt-Churchill "unconditional-surrender" declaration, Dr. Goebbels had to find a gambit so strong it could endanger United States-Soviet relations. During the first week in February Axis short-wave broadcasts directed to the United States suddenly started emphasizing Finland's part in the "crusade against bolshevism." "Finland," gullible American listeners would have believed, "is fighting because the Finnish people know a Bolshevik victory would mean their annihilation." It was apparent that Dr. Goebbels had found his gambit; and a powerful one, as a result of the sympathy so many Americans had worked up over Finland in its 1939-40 war with the Soviet Union.

Simultaneously with the sudden German emphasis on Finland, the Finns opened a new, powerful short-wave transmission directed to the United States. Morning after morning Americans were told: Finland is a fellow-democracy and wants the friendship of the United States; Finland is not "committed to any foreign power"; Finland is fighting only for its independence and territorial integrity against the "Bolshevik aggressor." Said the Finnish spokesmen: "Despite its war with the Soviets, Finland keeps out of the great powers' war."

During the week preceding the reelection of Risto Ryti as Finnish President the United States began to receive "speculation," largely out of Stockholm, that a change of administration would mean a more pro-United Nations foreign policy. Shortly thereafter the first specific "peace" rumors appeared. According to the most concrete of them, Finland was supposed to have made Moscow an offer, via Sweden, containing four points: (1) full recognition of Finnish independence, (2) establishment of "honorable" frontiers, (3) a pledge by Finland to obtain the departure of German divisions in Finland, (4) a guaranty of Finland's integrity by Sweden and the United States.

At that time there was no denial from Finland. Instead, the Finnish radio told Americans that Finland would withdraw from the war "when the right moment strikes and its freedom and independence are secured." Thus encouraged, the "peace" rumors spread for more than a week before the Finns put out an official denial.

Was it really "peace" talk? The four points cited above are all predicated on Russia having been the aggressor against Finland's "independence and territorial integrity." Obviously, the Kremlin could not even look at a plan based on such an assumption. The Finns doubtless know that; more important, the Nazis doubtless know it. A specific proposal that the United States "guarantee" Finnish integrity was mentioned. Guarantee it against whom? Obviously only the Soviet Union.

As to Finland's new propaganda directed to the United States, obviously designed to lay the foundation for American "intervention": Is Finland a democracy? From all accounts it is as thoroughly an occupied country as Denmark. Does Finland really want American friendship? The Office of War Information broadcast a story to the effect that on December 7, 1942, Finnish government officials attended a banquet at the Japanese legation in Helsinki at which toasts were drunk celebrating the anniversary of the Japanese "victory" at Pearl Harbor. The broadcast Finnish explanation of that event was palpably ridiculous: that the Finnish officials had no idea the banquet—on December 7, mind you—would be "turned into a political occasion." Is Finland committed to no foreign power and fighting only for its own independence? Returned American correspondents attest that Finnish troops are fighting on every sector of the Russian front, from Murmansk to the Caucasus.

Every whit of the "peace" and "peaceful" talk regarding Finland has led to one point—the contention of Nazi propaganda that the "Bolsheviks" are the aggressors. If the United States were officially to intervene on such an assumption, our relations with our (to Germany) most important ally would be seriously jeopardized. Alternatively, if enough Americans accepted that assumption independently, there would be the chance that they would put pressure on the Administration for decreased aid to the Soviet Union. Dr. Goebbels will settle for either alternative.

The Yankees Arrive

[The document which follows is being circulated widely, though anonymously, throughout North Africa and, we are told, has a way of reaching the breakfast trays of French and Allied dignitaries. It made its first appearance right after the Casablanca conference. As the reader will see, it pretends to be an account of the landing in France next November of the Armies of Liberation, and it so closely follows the pattern of what happened in the North African curtain-raiser that the authorities there are making serious efforts to apprehend the perpetrators of this cruel satire.]

The reader will no doubt remember that resistance to our armies was ably led in Morocco by one General Noguès (still at the same job, to judge by all reports) and by one Admiral Michelier. On the evening of November 8 the imminent arrival of the Armies of Liberation was announced to the groups in league with us by a code phrase interminably repeated over the London radio: "Attention, Robert is arriving." When General Bethouart, the principal pro-Ally conspirator in Morocco, went to General Noguès to implore him not to offer resistance to the historical friend and ally of France, the General called Admiral Michelier by telephone and was assured by him that there was not an American ship within a thousand miles. So the General fought, in the name of "honor," and was later hailed as a gentleman and a patriot for his act by some of our military men like Major General George W. Patton, Jr., who, installed in a handsome requisitioned villa, plunged into a whirl of social activity as guest and host alternately of General Noguès and his set, male and female. Active in the resistance to the Americans both during and after the landings was the S. O. L. (Service d'Ordre Légionnaire), French equivalent of the Nazi S. S.

Careful study of this satire leads the editors to believe that any apparent resemblances there may be between "General Gonesse" and General Noguès, "Admiral Chamelier" and Admiral Michelier, "Governor General Breuvage" and Governor General Boisson, "General O. W. Littlepatapon, Sr." and General George W. Patton, Jr., the L. O. S. and the S. O. L. are purely intentional. General de la Laurencie, of course, exists but, unlike General Giraud, is now a prisoner of the Nazis.

Paris, November 28, 1943 (From our Special Correspondent): After the inevitable restrictions of censorship imposed following the Allied landing on the coasts of France I can now cable you the first impressions of my arrival with our liberating troops.

I shall not retrace the landing in detail. Everyone knows that the German high command, after having sent to the eastern front all the troops which had occupied France, had turned over to the government of Vichy the responsibility for defending metropolitan France against aggression, from whatever direction. It is known that General Bridoux, Secretary of State for War, had rapidly reconstituted an army, to which was joined the militia formed by Pierre Laval, the Légion de l'Obéissance sacrée (L. O. S.). He had confided the defense of the west coast of France, the most threatened, to General Gonesse, for seven years Governor General of the Celtic Provinces (Normandy and Brittany), trained in the delicate problems of the Celtic world, and enjoying the full confidence of the government of Vichy.

Let us recall the facts rapidly: On the eve of the arrival of our troops the Anglo-Saxon radio had broadcast ceaselessly the appeal agreed upon: "Attention Toto, Teddy is arriving. . . ." The entire civil population was aware of the landing of our troops—it was, as the French say, a "Harlequin's secret." General Gonesse was not without news of these rumors, for many times during the night he telephoned Admiral Chamelier, the commander of the fleet anchored at Deauville, to ask whether anything unusual had been noticed at sea. The Admiral replied each time that the horizon was as empty as a speech by Marshal Pétain.

During this time our troops joyously prepared to liberate the Celts and the French. Our boys whistled gaily at the thought of marching soon under arches of triumph, amid the enthusiastic acclamation of populations drunk with joy. At Bordeaux there was only token resistance, after which the representatives of the government of Vichy, neutralized beforehand in their beds, rushed to fraternize with the liberators, but things did not go so easily in the sector defended by the valiant General Gonesse. Three days of violent fighting, the greater part of the Deauville fleet destroyed, hundreds of deaths on both sides, such was the toll of the glorious resistance offered to the Liberators.

Meanwhile General de la Laurencie, who had escaped from a German prison, had reported to Bordeaux, where he had taken command of the French troops, in full accord with London and Washington. He lost no time in constituting a High Commissariat, to which he hastened to name, with all the honors due him, the faithful General Gonesse, still covered with the blood of so many French and Allied soldiers. He brought in Governor General Breuvage, who had commanded at Dunkerque and had distinguished himself shortly before by fighting off an Anglo-Gaulliste attack against this great port.

This triumvirate immediately undertook the task of galvanizing French patriotism. It proclaimed that the population would not fail to rise as one man and that, thanks to American arms, Free France would soon equip an army of a million combatants, animated by the magnificent traditions of June, 1940, which would not be slow to hang its washing on the Siegfried Line.

General Gonesse, proud of the confidence of General de la Laurencie and buttressed by his influence with the great chief of the indigenous Celts, immediately became the man of the hour. The commander-in-chief of the American troops, Major General O. W. Littlepatapon, Sr., perceived at once the loyal and dependable character of General Gonesse, unswerving in his diverse convictions. The American general was not insensible to the charms of the French ladies; and his French colleague, always delicately helpful, insisted upon the privilege of introducing him to gracious young women who were to make gay the austere life of the American warrior.

All these things are known. Recent events are less so. I shall run over them rapidly.

While General O. W. Littlepatapon, Sr., surrounded by a gracious bevy of young and pretty French girls, actively carried on the war of liberation in sumptuous requisitioned villas, our troops pushed on in all directions. Everywhere they received the acclamation of the people, enchanted to live under a rain of dollars and to think that these men were going to fight and die for them, thus saving them the trouble. The entry of the Anglo-Americans into Paris and Vichy highlighted, as we know, this rapid campaign, which put an end to the resistance of the L. O. S., brilliantly commanded by Joseph Darnand. The German troops had evacuated France taking with them Marshal Pétain, who, until the last moment, never ceased broadcasting over the radio energetic appeals for resistance against the odious British oppressor and the cynical American conqueror.

It was then that Pierre Laval himself courageously decided to rally to the army of liberation. Hardly had the Allies entered Vichy, after a bloody struggle, when they assisted at the reassuring spectacle of a cordial interview between General Teddy Wellcome, commander-in-chief of the Anglo-Saxon forces, and M. Pierre Laval, chief of the French government. The eminent statesman had no trouble in giving proof of his good faith and his good-will. He made much of the fact that he had always been a sincere and loyal friend of the United States, that his son-in-law was more than half-American, that his daughter José had fond memories of the White House, and that in addition he had always wished for the victory of the United Nations and had foreseen the annihilation of Germany. "And if I have seemed to say or think the contrary," he added delicately, "believe me, dear friends and allies, it was for the better, as we say in my country."

Needless to say, General Teddy Wellcome was moved and charmed by this dignified and generous attitude. He assured Pierre Laval of his fullest esteem and asserted that he was ready to collaborate with him. Moreover, he said, since the Allies had no desire to interfere in the internal affairs of France, no one would be better qualified than M. Laval himself to rehabilitate French politics, to give it a resolute democratic direction, and to put the entire country at the service of the sacred cause of liberation of oppressed peoples.

Thereupon Pierre Laval formed his famous Cabinet, for the prosecution of the "holy war for liberty." It was thus composed:

Présidence du Conseil et Intérieur	Pierre Laval
Défense Nationale	Général Bridoux
Marine et Tunisie	Admiral Esteva
Affaires Etrangères	Vicomte de Brinon
Finances et Pots de Vin	Jacques Doriot
Colonies et Affaires celtiques	Général Nogues
Politique et Délation	Joseph Darnand
Instruction Publique	Marcel Déat
Moralité Publique	Alfred Mallet
P. T. T. et Illustration	J. de Lessaigne
Famille et Cinéma	Jean Luchaire
Presse et Propagande	Georges Anquetil

(The President of the Council and Minister of the Interior reserved for himself personally the Portfolio of Treason; he is assisted in this heavy task by a sub-secretary of state, M. François Pietri.)

Such was the political situation, as clear and reassuring as could be wished, when there took place the famous conference of Touquet which was to astonish the world. It has been so often described that I limit myself to a brief summary of its remarkable results. About President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill were grouped the principal British and American military chiefs. The high point of the conversations, which were held against the celebrated background of the celebrated "plage du Nord," was the meeting of Generals Giraud, de Gaulle, and de la Laurencie. Everyone has seen the photograph which has preserved for posterity the triple handshake of the three great soldiers. After laborious negotiations each of these generals put his signature to a document of which this is the exact text: "Generals Giraud, de Gaulle, and de la Laurencie are perfectly in accord on the fact that they are not at all in accord."

Thanks to this virile manifestation of the fighting spirit of the French and thanks also to the confident collaboration of the Anglo-Saxon governments and of the brilliant team organized by Pierre Laval, the people of the United States and of the British Empire can be assured that final victory is in sight, to the great satisfaction of the French nation, which is perfectly aware of the sacrifices it might otherwise have had to make to assure the triumph of Justice, Civilization, and Democracy.

HIMMLER WINS AGAIN

For a long time Himmler has demanded an aviation section for his S. S. guards. Göring refused. At the first evidence of increasing dissatisfaction following the reverses in the east, Himmler renewed his demand, asking Hitler to support it. This time Göring yielded. The question is settled. Should the German people rise, they will be bombed from the air as if they were living in London, Coventry, or Kharkov.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE German word Unruhe means uneasiness, restlessness, anxiety. One can imagine the dismal jokes that are being coupled with the name of General Walter von Unruh. Certainly Herr von Unruh represents the greatest anxiety that the average German suffers today, for he is chief executive of the colossal—and swiftly developing—project that goes under the name of total mobilization. In that capacity he must—before March 15—comb several million hitherto indispensable persons out of war industries and pack them off to the army, and at the same time comb the last civilians out of their peace-time occupations and put them in war jobs.

The two decrees of January 27 and February 4 which ordered this "greatest mobilization in the history of the world" laid down only a few general principles. They directed, for example that all firms and branches, stores, workshops, restaurants, and so on "not vital for the war effort or for the necessary minimum of civilian supplies" should be closed immediately. And they provided that all men between sixteen and sixty-five years of age and all women between seventeen and forty-five not already engaged in war work should be drafted at once for the war economy. But these decrees furnished only the framework and included no practical directions for carrying it to completion. Since then orders, regulations, and blitz measures have been issued in rapid succession.

The first specific order provided that in Berlin alone 50,000 retail shops of every kind, size, and quality, and 50,000 handicraft shops were to be closed. It is reported that already on a street like the famous Kurfürstendamm hardly a shop is open. Of the 12,000 spirits and brandy distilleries still operating in Germany, only 755 will be permitted to continue. A third of the extant newspapers are to be scrapped; the first one to cease publication is the well-known B. Z. am Mittag. Waiters are to be transferred to war industries in a body and their places filled by women; other traditional hotel and restaurant jobs, such as newspaper and tobacco stands, are to be eliminated entirely. Of more far-reaching significance is an announcement made by Minister of Justice Thierack in a conference on February 10. In reporting it the Münchener Neueste Nachrichten said that the minister had made public a scheme for "greatly reducing the number of judges." "At present," it continued, "there are about 14,000 judges, but according to Thierack, 4,000 or at most 5,000 are enough. About 10,000 therefore will have to disappear." To make up for the disappearance of two-thirds of the judges into the insatiable maw of the war's man-power demands, the remaining third will have, as the paper expressed it, "increased authority." Expressed in another way, court procedure will be still more summary than it has been. Even more serious in the long run may be the consequences of the announced reduction of the school week to eighteen hours—so that about half of the teachers still employed can be transferred to war jobs and also so that greater use can be made of the pupils as helpers, especially on farms.

The difficulties of such a colossal undertaking seem enormous. First, there are the damages to be paid. The small tradesmen and handworkers whose shops are destroyed must be left some hope—it is slight enough—of being able to make a new start after the war. They are therefore allowed damages—it looks as if a considerable bureaucracy would be needed simply to evaluate their claims. Moreover, the state is so hungry for goods that it cannot permit the proprietors to dispose of their stock and fixtures as they like. Everything must be turned over to the government—materials, goods, machines, tools, even office equipment, including furniture, telephones, and lamps. To inventory these millions of heterogeneous items and to utilize them or turn them into cash will keep another regiment of clerks busy.

Then the problem arises, how usable will these left-overs be in war production, for which they are completely unfitted by training and habit? The factory managers, who are losing masses of strong and practiced workers and receiving such unsatisfactory substitutes, seem extremely pessimistic. They must have uttered many protestations and warnings, for a joint proclamation issued on February 23 by Minister of Munitions Speer and Labor Czar Sauckel holds the managers responsible for results. It is their job to transform the "reserves" assigned to them into capable workmen by setting up schools and giving the necessary instruction in their plants—and to do it quickly.

The first signs are appearing of how great the "enthusiasm of the people" for the "total mobilization" really is. There have been threats against shirkers and persons making false declarations. The Völkische Beobachter of February 11 attacked women in general because so many of them—some with the help of forged doctors' certificates—are trying to get into office positions instead of essential work.

File and Remember

Volunteers for Fascism

THE recruiting of volunteers [from the occupied countries] for the Russian campaign has been disappointing, but "fascism" points out that the importance of this enterprise must not be measured by the size of the volunteer army. After Jena Napoleon fixed the limit of the Prussian army at 42,000. The Prussians defeated his intention by keeping the army to that figure but passing men through the ranks so that Prussia had a small army but a large number of trained men. Something like that has been done with the volunteers for the Russian war. Numbers of them are continually being brought back from the front and replaced by new men. The Dutch Nazis and the Belgian Fascists boast of the training their followers are thus receiving. Degrelle said that his followers had learned in Russia to kill quickly and well. These forces will not be strong enough to withstand the popular feeling of the occupied countries when liberation comes, but they will make the struggle more bitter. — Manchester Guardian.

A German Majority

Not so long ago the German press boasted that for every four Germans working at home, there was one foreigner. Now the Nazis are finding that there are disadvantages in employing millions of foreigners. Sauckel, Hitler's special commissioner for labor mobilization, says: "We have a situation in which at many factories representatives of as many as twelve alien nationalities are employed. We must now take measures to see that Germans constitute a majority in every factory." — Soviet War News.

Norway on Darlan

The Norwegians, like the peoples of other occupied countries today, hope that their liberation will not be too long postponed. But—and it is important that we should understand this—the Norwegians have taken the political tragedy of North Africa to heart. "The Darlan incident," a leading article in the Norsk Tidend said, "also has its significance for Norway and the other countries. Political and military aims must go hand in hand, otherwise we shall find ourselves on a slippery slope. Our aim, a free and democratic Norway, can never be achieved by a fascist compromise. No good Norwegian has ever had any doubts about this." — The New Statesman and Nation (London).

The Finnish Quislings

Ryti and Mannerheim are as guilty of blood and of the massacre of their people in the interests of a little coterie dependent upon Hitler as are any quislings in Europe. It is amazing that there should be found British and American newspapers which discuss these people coolly as though they were the "victims of unfortunate circumstances." They are no more the victims of circumstance than Pierre Laval. — Daily Worker (London).

Program for Spain

Franco is making things worse by strengthening Morocco, which threatens our position in French North Africa. Our campaign goes slowly there partly because so many of our men have to watch the Spanish divisions, which are commanded by Spain's best general, Yagué.

So what is to be done? Three things. Replace Sir Samuel Hoare. Tell the Spanish people that they will be in the war in the spring unless the Blue Division and half Yagué's troops come home. And tell them that shiploads of food will enter any Spanish port that declares for neutrality and peace, if Franco insists on going on with war.

There are millions of Spaniards ready to be on our side, ready to defend their dwindling chance of peace. They will do the job for us—if we let them. — The Tribune (London).

War in the Air?

There is uneasiness on both sides of the Atlantic. Some Americans allege that by supplying aircraft under lend-lease they are giving the key to Britain; at least as many Englishmen allege that by handing over Empire routes to United States lines they are selling their birthright. Few opinions on the subject are so riddled with nonsense as those expressed in Mrs. Clare Luce's recent plea for "sovereignty of the skies." Fantastically, she speaks of the squeezing out of American shipping by the "heavily subsidized" lines of other "low labor-scale" countries, and voices the fear that the same may happen in the air. It is high time that the British and American governments ended this sordid wrangling by stating exactly what is happening and making plain their future policy. They have to choose between "sovereignty of the skies" and "freedom of the air"; and there is no doubt which choice will best serve both world peace and the efficiency and cheapness of world transport. In this discussion, British and American imperialism look equally ugly. — The Economist (London).

Shameless Cynicism

"The Atlantic Charter is a shameless piece of cynicism. If it were followed, all peoples would have to give up their sovereign rights for the sake of the United States, England, the Soviet Union, and Chungking, and they all would suffer the fate of Cuba and Puerto Rico." — SPANISH COUNCILOR ANTONIO TOVAR in Pueblo (Madrid).

Social Revolution or Reform

No proposition of social reform in modern history has been seized so eagerly or with so much determination by the people as a whole as the Beveridge Report. What fools the Conservative organizers must be not to realize that here was a providential opportunity to steal the thunder of the progressives and place upon the statute books the social enactment of a lifetime. "If you do not give the people social reform," said Mr. Quintin Hogg, one of the younger and better-educated Conservatives, in an admirable speech, "the people will give you social revolution." — A. J. CUMMINGS in the News Chronicle (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

JOHN DOS PASSOS presents in his new novel, "Number One" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.50), a portrait of a Southern demagogue. The model is obviously Huey Long, though the story is a parallel of Long's career, not a literal record. Now Huey Long in the flesh is still sufficiently vivid in the reader's mind to be a constant and authoritative check on the success of any attempt to transfix him in print. Yet Dos Passos has so transfixed him, without shrinkage either of dimension or of body heat.

Mr. Dos Passos has done live historical figures before with great success—the best things in "U. S. A." as far as I am concerned are the short biographies. Here, however, he not only presents such a figure at full length; he does it in fictional terms. In his short biographies of real personalities he could make his readers function as collaborators by tapping the keys of known fact; his skill lay in selecting the keys that would release the particular emotion and idea he wished to use. In the present case he has chosen the indirect and far more difficult method of projecting a fictional character in the image of a known historical figure—which makes of the reader a judge rather than a collaborator. And he has succeeded, for Chuck Crawford is not only a public character in his own right, with his own story, but wins complete acceptance from the reader as the prototype not only of Huey Long but of the whole spate of demagogues which the backward areas of the South will continue to throw up as long as their dismal swamps of poverty and ignorance remain undrained.

A great deal of observation, research, and understanding has gone into Dos Passos's study of a demagogue. He understands, for instance, that it is the element of sincerity in such people which makes them successful—and dangerous. He never loses sight of the fact that the Chuck Crawfords really believe that they are friends and defenders of the people—a belief which confuses both the Crawfords and the people. And he has shown with great skill the shuttling process by which Chuck Crawford, the ignorant, stupid, yet shrewd messiah, gains power by attacking the "interests" (while promising to make "Every Man a Millionaire"), exploits and is exploited by them, and finally becomes their servant as well as a parasite they must support because of his popular following.

But Chuck Crawford remains throughout a public rather than a private character; and since Dos Passos has chosen such a subject, the question must arise as to whether the public significance of Chuck Crawford, past and future, makes him worth the serious novelist's trouble. In Huey Long's time there was a tide in American affairs which might have led a Southern demagogue on to victory over us all—Long's assassination was a stroke of good luck. Today war and organization for war have set new tides in motion which will throw up quite different and even more sinister, and knowledgeable, candidates; and while the primitive Southern demagogue will continue to rise and flourish, he now seems dated as the possible leader of a sophisticated American fascism. In that context Chuck Crawford becomes a reminiscence rather than a prophecy and seems not quite worth a full-length portrait.

That is the danger the novelist runs, of course, when he selects a public character as a major subject. The private character is another matter, if only because we are all private characters, forever interested in ourselves.

There are, of course, private characters in "Number One"—and I am not sure that Mr. Dos Passos does not consider one of them his principal. As a foil (and secretary) to Chuck Crawford, he gives us another of his dismal drinking young men—Tyler Spotswood, weaker brother of the Glenn Spotswood of "The Adventures of a Young Man"—a thwarted idealist who is so obviously weak-willed that one can't help feeling he is an idealist because he is thwarted, not thwarted because he is an idealist. There is a difference. Dos Passos almost broke the pattern in "The Adventures of a Young Man." Glenn Spotswood was defeated in the end, but at least he put up a fight—which is after all far more true to life and a great deal more interesting. The Tyler of the present book is down for the count when the book opens; he never rises and one soon becomes bored by his groans. At the end, when he is left holding the bag for Chuck Crawford, he faces the choice of going to prison or exposing Chuck, with whose wife he is, again feebly, in love; but by that time anything he may or may not do seems quite without significance. (Sue Ann, by the way, like most of Dos Passos's women, is more engaging than his men.)

Here again Dos Passos refuses, or is unable, to endow his fictional characters with the resilience and will power which characterize the real figures of his biographies, including Chuck Crawford—not to mention the general run of the human race. In real life, Mr. Dos Passos notwithstanding, even intellectual under-dogs like Tyler Spotswood, defeated or not, possess those qualities—which are the requisites for staying alive. To deny them to Tyler Spotswood in his argument with life, and with Chuck Crawford, is to invite, from this reviewer at least, that old, fatal newspaper verdict "No story."

MARGARET MARSHALL

To a Camofleur

a tree is not a tree it is a man granite rocks have thirty creeping toes and canvas sides where once the highway ran the scattered flock nuzzles the winter snows mobility lies leaden in the grave inured to torpor there will be those to see what doom of jeopardy consumes a brave anachronistic visibility folded in darkness from your mind erase the dream you dreamed through all the ancient wars a man erect and walking in a space confronting god and stars

LYNN RIGGS

Under and After Mussolini

ITALY FROM WITHIN. By Richard G. Massock. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE author of this book was correspondent of the Associated Press in Rome from the fall of 1938 to the end of 1941. His task was "finding out as best as he could what was going on." But the Stefani Agency (the Italian counterpart of Havas and Reuter) gave out only government "pap." The dailies were mere instruments in an orchestra conducted by the Ministry of Propaganda. The radio, the newsreels, the books and magazines, the news photos—everything was censored. The hotel where Mr. Massock first established his residence was staffed entirely by informers. When he went to live in an apartment, the doorman was a spy and reported everyone who went to call on him. The police kept a dossier on each correspondent and his family. The telephone was tapped. Under such conditions, how could a newspaperman find out what was going on? Even if he did, he was not allowed to send out his findings. His telephone calls were intercepted and transcribed. The radio company automatically sent every dispatch to the ministry before transmitting it. Words were scrutinized, one by one, and their author held accountable for them. If he displeased the masters, he was expelled.

Mr. Massock, while imparting to us such pleasant information, protests that he never deserved expulsion. His record was "clean." He was just a newspaperman "without seditious thoughts or political animosity." He "avoided known anti-Fascists." He "never met any member of the underground, never tried to obtain news in a clandestine manner." He "evaded political discussion in his social contacts." He was only interested in obtaining news that he could transmit "through the nominal channels of information."

"We were sick," he writes, "that we had to withhold so much of the truth. Yet we knew the editors and readers wanted a man on the spot." Wait a moment! No doubt the editors wanted to make money by feeding their public with "good news," whether true or not, and only men on the spot could produce such news. But the public was living under the delusion that a man on the spot would give them the truth. Yet for twenty years, though sick of their dirty job, the men on the spot deceived their public. What was forcing them to do so? Why were they so fond of keeping their records clean? Why didn't they leave Rome as soon as they realized that a newspaperman could not honestly carry on his professional work there? Why didn't their agencies and publishers inform their readers that correct information could not be got from totalitarian countries and that therefore they refused to keep correspondents in those countries?

Here is a problem which should be squarely faced by the "gentlemen of the press" who have consecrated a shrine to the freedom of the press, hail the press as the unstained source of truth, and each year hold conventions where they solemnly vindicate the freedom of the press. Freedom of the press or freedom for the "gentlemen of the press" to fool the people for twenty years?

The chapters Mr. Massock dedicates to the period of non-belligerency from September, 1939, to June, 1940, to the disastrous invasion of Greece, and to the economic and moral conditions of the country are among the best things on Italy that the present reviewer has read of late. Mr. Massock states that "the Italian people hold Mussolini personally responsible for Italy's tragedy. They hate him." "The supporters of Fascism form a small minority of the population." "The majority of Italians would like a restoration of parliamentary self-government, as in the democracies, as the only system capable of giving them decent leadership and economic well-being." But "an Italian revolution now, with all Europe under Nazi domination, direct or indirect, would fail, so strong are the odds against it. And such premature revolt might be catastrophic." However, "with the tide of anti-Fascism rising as it has risen, it is not inconceivable that the public, given the circumstances, could override the militia." "The primary question is how long will the Italians have to wait for the defeat of the German army by those of the United Nations." One hundred per cent right. Could anything else be said for the other occupied countries and, let us hope, for Germany itself?

Mr. Massock notices that "the anti-Fascist movement in Italy lacks leadership, organs of opinion, the means to get together in large numbers. There is no center of agitation, no parliament, no free institutions." Could it be otherwise? If Italy did not lack those paraphernalia, it would be a democratic and not a totalitarian country. It must reconquer them through "blood, sweat, and tears."

During more than three years among Italians in Italy, Mr. Massock never heard mentioned the name of a single émigré who would be a "likely deliverer of the people from Fascism." Quite natural. The name even of Toscanini has been suppressed in the Italian press. Thus a youth who is twenty-two now and was ten in 1930 does not know that a Toscanini ever existed in this world. One can guess what has happened in the case of all the other émigrés who are not surrounded by such a halo of glory as Toscanini. Therefore Mr. Massock is completely correct when he holds that "the liberation and future system of government of the Italian people is primarily the business of the Italians in Italy"; "the Italians seemed to be searching for new leaders among those who had stayed in Italy." Future leaders will arise from among those who are on the spot. Mr. Massock, however, would be at least half wrong if from this fact he drew the inference that there will be nothing for the émigrés to do when they return to Italy. Men and women who were in their twenties when political emigration began to curse Italy, are now in their fifties, that is, still young in spirit. They have not forgotten and will welcome those of their old friends who come back home.

"The pre-Fascist parties have been buried so profoundly that not even their ghosts were abroad in the land." Here again Mr. Massock is entirely right. Names of political parties will most likely still be the old ones. But the mentality of the generation in their thirties and forties is no longer that of the old parties. They want new wine even under old labels. No force on earth will revive the pre-Fascist formations.

Mr. Massock is also 100 per cent right when he reports that at the time he left Rome "the Crown was in contempt among many Italians." The King had fallen so low that he visited the birthplace of Mussolini and laid wreaths on the tombs of the Duce's parents. The Crown Prince "has little personality" (to say the least). Last spring he concluded a manifesto to the troops under his command with these words: "Hail to the King! Hail to the Duce!" The Queen has taken such pains to identify herself with the German alliance that when she received the Japanese ambassador she insisted on his speaking German, though he knew very little German. Under such circumstances, Mr. Massock should have taken less seriously that "anti-Fascist" who told him that "the monarchy is the chief bulwark of Italy after Fascism."

His anti-Fascist acquaintance told Mr. Massock that the army might present the King with a military dictator who would end the reign of Fascism and assume the policing power. Mr. Massock might have asked him how that same army, or rather those same military chiefs who had brought to power and supported and exploited Mussolini for twenty years, might think of putting an end to the reign of Fascism. They would merely substitute Fascism without Mussolini for Fascism with Mussolini. And how could the United Nations disarm Italy if the army were not disbanded and as a consequence its chiefs were not deprived of all material force and moral prestige? Anyhow Mr. Massock might prove a good prophet, if President Roosevelt agreed with Mr. Churchill, to the effect that this war would lead to the most dastardly deception in history, not only for Italy but for the whole of Europe and America itself.

"All the country seems to ask is a fair deal, peace, and the opportunity for its sons to work at home and abroad." "Americans should first prepare for an invasion by making the Italians believe we are going into the Italian Peninsula to help them and to free them from Fascism." Will the Americans give Italy a fair deal? Yes, if they remain true to the tradition of Jefferson, Lincoln, Wilson. No, if they adopt the ideals of Winston Churchill, Myron Taylor, and Monsignor Cicognani.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

War Primer for Civilians

THE STORY OF WEAPONS AND TACTICS FROM TROY TO STALINGRAD. By Tom Wintringham. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.25.

TOM WINTRINGHAM is a practical soldier; he served in France in World War I, commanded the British International Brigade near Madrid in 1937, and, three years later, was largely responsible for the development of a British Home Guard to a strength of over 1,000,000 men, a force so formidable that it may well have influenced Hitler's decision not to invade England. Out of this long experience has come his belief in the importance of the theory of war, his conviction, indeed, that in order for democracies to win, not only the military but the people as well should understand warfare; he stresses the importance of studying the history of war to get a tight grip on this understanding. The subject is huge, but weapons lie at its core. Mr. Wintringham concerns himself in this excellent and suggestive book with an analysis of weapons, their use by land armies, and the changes that have occurred in them and in their tactical employment.

A striking example of this continual change is the Battle of Hastings, in which William of Normandy, with armored cavalry, defeated the more lightly equipped English infantry. William's men were superior to King Harold's in three fundamental respects—mobility, hitting power, and protection. Victory, as a matter of course, followed this concentration of controlling factors. Beginning with the Greek triumph over the Persians at Plataea in 479 B. C., tendencies are traced in which the ebb and flow of emphasis on these three primary elements of war shape themselves into a pattern of alternating "armored" and "unarmored" periods. One of the recurring characteristics of an armored period, such as we are in now—it began with the tank at Cambrai in 1917—is that a kind of coordinated complexity, in which small units, often of an auxiliary nature, operate under commanders exercising great initiative, succeeds a more simply integrated but also more unwieldy organization. A characteristic common to both types of period lies in the surprise nature of changes when they first appear and their consequent effect on the opponent. War is only in part a science; it has few constants, and no completely accurate projection of its future shape is ever possible.

In his chapter on early weapons and tactics the author describes the bows and spears of the Trojans and their scythe-bearing chariots; the armor of the Hoplites, the Greek heavy infantry; the ballistae and catapults of Dionysius, Tyrant of Syracuse; the phalanx invented by the Spartan Epaminondas; the great twenty-four-foot Macedonian sarissa, or pike, used in mass by King Philip; Alexander's inspired division and subdivision of his father's too heavy formations into highly maneuverable units supported by light auxiliary forces; Alexander's defeat of Darius the Persian and his elephants at Arbela; the organization and employment of the Roman legions, how they were humbled by Hannibal at Cannae and how, later, having become free men, they beat the Carthaginians. In the fourth century the first armored period, the period of the victorious Romans, came to an end.

The second unarmored period followed; these were the great days of light cavalry. The Goths, well mounted and armed with lances, the Germans with their heavy franciscas, or battle-axes, took full advantage of the decay of Rome and Roman freedom. Mobile archers assisted, and had already come into their own under the Mongol Genghis Khan.

With Charlemagne's victory at Pavia in 774 the pendulum again swung toward armor, but it was to change direction because of the archer, at Hastings still an auxiliary to the cavalry shock-trooper and only attaining his full flower under the Plantagenets. Crécy, in 1346, marked the end of this second period.

The next era was that of gunpowder; war had become an affair of longer and longer range as guns became more and more efficient. As early as the fifteenth century artillery was a weapon to be reckoned with. Mohammed II, conqueror of Constantinople, had bombards thirty inches in caliber that ed stone shot weighing 1,800 pounds. Fortified castles were no longer impregnable; firearms accomplished the end of the feudal system. Napoleon became the master of artillery; Wellington, to counter him, had to devise new ways of utilizing cover. The bayonet, even in 1870, was less useful as a weapon than as myth. The machine-gun, brainchild of Hiram Maxim and wet-nursed by Basil Zaharoff, flourished and grew great.

March 13, 1943

But armor, coupled with mobility, to be sure, was destined to return. Tanks showed the way, and with supporting planes they are today dominant factors in that violent infiltration which, large-scale, spells "irruption," the deep break-through against which even strong "web defenses" have sometimes proved ineffective.

The author has observed, however, that mechanized units and tanks are particularly vulnerable to the close infighting typical of guerrilla warfare; he believes, further, that the present blitzkrieg pattern is already becoming obsolete and will be supplanted by what he calls the People's War, fought by an armed population linked to an offensive striking force. This revolution in warfare, according to his thesis, will take the form of a popular anti-fascist worldwide revolution. But if it is to succeed, its leaders must ever be ready to make changes in techniques, tactics, and strategy. Change is the single immutable law of war, and, because no book could bring out this point more clearly, none could be more useful.

ROBERT K. HAAS

English Pageant

ENGLISH SOCIAL HISTORY: A SURVEY OF SIX CENTURIES, CHAUCER TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

By G. M. Trevelyan. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.50.

THERE was a time when, in the hands of the Manners and Morals school, social history was almost exclusively concerned with Society with a capital S. The life of the "lower orders" was treated as uninteresting and irrelevant except in so far as it provided a background, sometimes faint, sometimes degraded, for the doings of their "betters." Then, under the influence of Marx, the pendulum swung violently in the other direction, and social historians concentrated on the poor and downtrodden. The nineteenth-century conceptions of the class struggle and economic man were projected backward through the ages by writers who started with a thesis and picked over the ever-expanding shelves of recorded fact for material to clothe it.

In this new social history of England, from its emergence as a distinctive nation to the onset of the present century, G. M. Trevelyan, the doyen of British historians, does not attempt to prove any all-embracing theory. Social history, as he sees it, is quite distinct from both political and economic history, but it is the "required link" between them without which the one is "unintelligible" and the other "barren." "It has also," he adds in his introduction, "its own positive value and peculiar concern"—the reconstruction of the daily life of the past. Its real appeal, Mr. Trevelyan believes, is to the imagination, and thus the impelling motive of historical study is poetic. "Its poetry consists in its being true." There

The Mark Twain of Yiddish Literature

THE WORLD OF SHOLOM ALEICHEM

By Maurice Samuel

"Sholom Aleichem" is a magic word in Yiddish literature. What Dickens did for England, what Balzac did for France, and what Twain did for America, Sholom Aleichem did for the Jews of Eastern Europe.

The author recounts the adventures of the chief characters in the works of Sholom Aleichem, and recreates the folklore, outlook and memories of the villages of the famous Pale Settlement. A remarkable revelation of a great man. $3.00

ALFRED A. KNOPF
501 MADISON AVENUE, N. Y.

PEYROUTON: INCIDENT OR PRECEDENT?

Are We Losing the Peace in North Africa?

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER

The man the State Department didn't want in North Africa. Recently resigned as Deputy Director, Office of War Information.

MAX LERNER JOHANNES STEEL
Chairman: REINHOLD NIEBUHR

TOWN HALL
123 West 43rd Street, New York City
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 8:30 P.M.

TICKETS:

Reserved, $1.00 and $.75 — Unreserved, $.50

Available at the Town Hall Box Office or the U. D. A. Office, 9 East 46th Street

Limited Seating Capacity - - -

- - - Write us telephone immediately. (PLaza 8-0703)

Auspices:

Union for Democratic Action Educational Fund, Inc.

we find the synthesis of the scientific and the literary view of history.

In these terms this book is a brilliant success. It does give us a rich pageant of English life in many of its aspects. We see people of all classes at work and at play, in their economic relations with each other, at home, at church, and in school. We see, too, a developing culture expressing the general conditions of each age in changing forms of literature, art, and thought. But no one historian can give us a complete picture, and Mr. Trevelyan's methods have their limitations. For one thing his over-reliance on literary material inevitably makes for disproportionate attention to the lives of the middle and upper classes, for whom and about whom the mass of literature was written until recent years. We can be grateful, however, for the evidence which this book provides regarding the comparative fluidity of the English ruling class—a factor unduly neglected by some recent historians. It has always been an aristocracy which believed in maintenance of membership rather than the closed shop, and it never carried snobbishness to the point of excluding a steady infusion of new blood from below. Even "the old school tie" is a fairly new symbol. In Elizabethan times, Mr. Trevelyan points out, boys of all classes learned Latin side by side in the grammar schools, and it was only in the middle of the eighteenth century that segregated education for the upper classes became the general rule. Moreover, up to that time, it was common practice for the landed gentry to apprentice their younger sons to city merchants and craftsmen, thus providing a link between the upper and middle classes which was lacking in most Continental countries. Perhaps this avoidance of biological and intellectual inbreeding is one of the reasons why the English ruling class has been so hard to shake. For it has always retained a disconcerting amount of energy, and if not exactly hospitable to new ideas, it has long possessed an instinct for calculating nicely the irreducible minimum of social and political reforms which had to be conceded in order to enable it to hold its privileges.

In his approach to the past Mr. Trevelyan is sometimes hampered by a certain ambivalence. By training and family tradition he is a nineteenth-century liberal, but the belief in progress, which is his birthright, is in conflict with his nostalgia for the eighteenth century, about which he has written so much and so brilliantly. Of the years between 1740 and 1780 he says: "The gods mercifully gave mankind this little moment of peace between the religious fanaticisms of the past and the fanaticisms of class and race that were speedily to arise and dominate time to come." It is not surprising, therefore, to find that the picture he paints of this era is inspired by Joshua Reynolds rather than by Hogarth, by Horace Walpole rather than by Fielding. And his enthusiasm sometimes betrays him into making statements as naive as they are charming. For instance, writing about the development of cricket as a game played by all classes together, he concludes: "If the French noblesse had been capable of playing cricket with their peasants, their châteaux would never have been burnt."

Throughout this book Mr. Trevelyan rightly emphasizes the social aspects of religion, and he has many original and penetrating comments to make on this subject. In the early years of the nineteenth century, he points out, "England was less 'class conscious' than 'church and chapel conscious.'" Consequently religious dissent formed a strong bond between the growing army of industrial workers and the new capitalists, both of whom resented the pretensions and privileges of the Church of England, just at the moment when divergence of economic interests was tending to pull them apart. It was only gradually that the religious division paralleled the class division, as the rising industrialists bought and married their way into the ranks of the upper classes and adopted their mode of thought, including Episcopalianism. Then the dissenting chapels became the nurseries of the trade unions—a development which has had a profound influence on the whole ideology of the British labor movement.

But if religious controversy in England stimulated political growth, it proved, as Mr. Trevelyan shows, a bar to educational progress. Toleration had been painfully achieved in Britain, and it is only in this century that something like real tolerance has developed. During a large part of the Victorian era politicians shied away from the provision of state education, fearing to evoke a denominational battle over the question of religious teaching. The result was a lag in this field in Britain compared to other Western nations, which proved a sore handicap. Standards of education, in fact, are still dangerously low for an industrial community, and it is not surprising that this matter is prominent on the post-war agenda.

Summing up this book, one can say that it provides stimulating and fascinating reading as well as a useful corrective for an overdose of materialist interpretation. But an antidote taken by itself may have unfavorable reactions, and in order to achieve a really balanced ration it should be read in conjunction with such a book as Cole and Postgate's "History of the British Common People." KEITH HUTCHISON

Fiction in Review

EXCEPT for members of the Communist Party or a few sentimentalists who think that the fine victories of the Russian army justify all the sins of Stalinism, and of course Martin Dies, it is hard to know who can take seriously Ruth McKenney's long and serious new novel, "Jake Home" (Harcourt, Brace, $3). As history—and it is in large part an account of the labor movement in America between the last war and 1932—it is written from the Communist Party-pris and therefore suitably tailored to fit the wavy line; as much by what it leaves unsaid as by what it says, it would try to create the impression that the history of labor in this period is identified with the history of the Communist Party, indeed that unionism and communism are always one and the same thing. As frank fiction, on the other hand, Miss McKenney's story of the small mining-town boy who comes to the big city and makes good as a leader of the workers is basically such pure fourteen-carat goldwyn that you need only soft-pedal the cops and occasionally turn the camera on a kindly capitalist or two—the demi-heroine's parents would serve the purpose nicely—in order to wind up with one of those movies in which idealism triumphs over low sexual-commercial temptation and Hollywood saves its soul.

A large section of the book is concerned with the Sacco-Vanzetti case: Jake Home, Miss McKenney's six-foot-three of red-headed hero, organizes Sacco-Vanzetti workers' defense committees over the country. Happily in 1943 the air on the literary front has been at least temporarily cleared of the need to rehab the old left-political issues; so if you will, you can skip Miss McKenney's version of the factional feuds in the case and concentrate on the cultural implications of her narrative. Perhaps even before Jake goes on his tour you will have noticed the delicate distinction between the way he addresses his upper-class associates and his fellow-proletarians — Jake's self-taught English which is so elegantly equal to the Boston lady who buys him his first lobster thermidor but which comes up with the good old proletarian "ain't" the moment he is back with the workers. Then the trip itself is fabulously successful, largely because of the Vanzetti letters which Jake carries with him. Of course, by the time he has read these fine documents to half a dozen public meetings, using Vanzetti's words to play on the emotions of his audience like Aimee Semple MacPherson at a revival meeting, now murmuring them in a hoarse whisper, now blasting them to the heavens, holding up one finger for the accompanying orchestra to play "the dead march" (sic) soft and now two fingers for the orchestra to come up loud, the "Marseillaise" and the "International" and the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" finally mixing hysterically with the sobs of the women and the shouts of the men — by that time, I submit, the serene soul of a martyred fish-peddler may be turning in its grave, but attaboy, says Miss McKenney, the workers of the world are behind Jake Home!

It used to be said that revolutionary theory and revolutionary practice cannot be separated; surely, in the same way, revolutionary culture and revolutionary politics go hand in hand through Miss McKenney's novel. Here, for instance, space being short, are a few of her cultural touchstones jotted down at random; draw your own political conclusions.

1. At the age of ten Jake Home knows "Hamlet" by heart; that's all right because "Shakespeare had to keep the boys in the pit in mind." At twenty-one he discovers Beethoven, for the good, and Rachmaninoff and Debussy, for the bad. At twenty-six he knows of James Joyce, "poet of imperialism," that "this guy is covering up a pretty cheesy mind with a lot of style."

2. Sex for a worker is home, a wife, a son, and curtains, preferably ruffled curtains sewn by the wife's own hands after a jolly day at the revolutionary stencil.

3. Nothing, in the last analysis, is so really bad as an intellectual. For author McKenney, as for the author of "To Have and to Have Not" (remember?), the final insult is to call someone a WRITER.

4. Scratch a WRITER and you will find a Freudian. When Kate, the second of the two evil (female) geniuses in Jake's life, takes to drink instead of having either a baby or curtains, Jake is ashamed of her until one of the comrades gives him a good talking-to. "You have a positively medieval mind on this subject, Jake," says the comrade. "Freud! Jake snarled. 'A bunch of intellectuals picking over their elegant libidos!'" The comrade answers: "Do you know no one, no one at all, who uses the works of Karl Marx to confuse, or even to amuse? I am not saying that Freud himself did not evolve a completely bourgeois theory. Of course he did; but he also suggested lines of inquiry to others which have opened a new world."

It appears, in short, that the proletarian novel, which seemed literary glory a short decade ago, trails into this decade clouds that are musty and bedraggled, like scenery at the opera.

A March Book of the Month Club selection is "Colonel Effingham's Raid" by Berry Fleming (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.50). Definitely on the side of the angels, this new novel by the author of "Siesta" is too coy a handling of an important subject for my taste. It is the story of an aging army colonel who is retired to his home town in Georgia but who, instead of growing roses like a proper gentleman, turns

AMUSEMENTS

N. Y.'s 2 BIG HITS

"Vivid and entertaining theater."—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.
THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY & ROWLAND STEBBINS present

THE PATRIOTS

by SIDNEY KINGSLEY

NATIONAL, W. 41st St. PE 8-8220. Evgs. 8:40, Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

★ ★ ★ ★

"The most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage." —Joseph Wood Krutch, Nation.

The Playwrights' Company presents

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A New Play by MAXWELL ANDERSON

CORT, West 48th Street, BR 9-0046. Evgs. 8:40, Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

his still militant energies against local political corruption. What Mr. Fleming is saying is that house-cleaning abroad is without meaning unless we also house-clean at home—an excellent thing to say—but a writer with such notable gifts of humor and style should also have the taste to offer his political sense without worrying so much about the chic of the packaging.

Theodore Pratt's "Mr. Winkle Goes to War" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2) is about an ordinary human being, an old gent of forty-four, domesticated, dyspeptic, and bespectacled, who, suddenly finding himself classified I-a, has to accommodate himself to the idea that in the eyes of the army he is still young and kicking. Mr. Winkle's adventures through induction and training are reported with such a sure, light touch that even the last twenty pages of rather incredible heroics fail to spoil a pleasant and curiously heartening hour's reading.

DIANA TRULING

Out of the Old South

ANOTHER SECRET DIARY OF WILLIAM BYRD OF WESTOVER. Edited by Maude H. Woodfin. Decoded by Marion Tinling. Richmond: The Dietz Press. $5.

CHARLES CARROLL OF CARROLLTON. By Ellen Hart Smith. Harvard University Press. $3.75.

THREE parts of a diary which William Byrd kept in shorthand have recently come to light. The earliest portion (1709-1712), which begins soon after Byrd, a thirty-five-year-old bridegroom, has returned from his prolonged schooling in London to take over the management of Westover, turned up in the Huntington Library in California and was published in 1941. The second section, in which Byrd, a middle-aged widower, is back in London paying florid court to the wealthy ladies among whom he seeks a second wife and making more direct overtures to those who, in accordance with the custom of his time, he describes quite frankly as mistresses and whores, belongs to the Virginia Historical Society and has not been published. The present volume is made up of two notebooks discovered at the University of North Carolina and includes the diary for the years 1739-1741 and copies of letters and "literary exercises" which Byrd wrote between 1696 and 1726, most of them during his two periods of residence in London.

This portion of the diary lacks the racy interest of the earlier parts. When it opens, Byrd has been back at Westover for thirteen years and is living in aging tranquillity with his even-tempered second wife. All the entries are brief, being for the most part concerned with his family and the management of his plantations; the majority of them end: "At night talked with my people, played piquet with my son, and prayed." Yet these simple homely notations read in connection with the expansive letters, "characters," and satires which Byrd composed during his younger rakish years in London give a peculiarly solid picture of the versatility of the eighteenth-century planter and of the complex relationship between the Southern colonies and England. William Byrd's education had to prepare him primarily for performing his civic duties in Virginia and for managing his 43,000 scattered acres, with their mills and stores and hundreds of "people" both white and black; it had also to fit him for living, during the time he spent at his London residence, the life of a sophisticated English gentleman, a life which in his day centered about the court, the theater, the coffee-house, and the spas.

Though Charles Carroll was only five years old when William Byrd died in 1744, their early lives were remarkably similar. Carroll was also sent abroad at the age of ten to acquire the training of a gentleman; and he returned to Maryland in 1765 to take over the management of Carrollton just as sixty years earlier Byrd had assumed that of Westover. But it was to a different America that young Carroll came back, for the Stamp Act had recently been made law, and colonial resentment, though few then realized it, was already making toward a belligerent break from England. Despite the fact that his religion disqualified him from voting, Carroll plunged so heartily into provincial politics that he was known as Maryland's First Citizen, as well as America's wealthiest young man, by the time war actually broke out. Though not yet an official delegate, the Continental Congress sent him early in 1776 to Montreal, along with Samuel Chase and Benjamin Franklin, to try to persuade Canada to join our side. This mission was, of course, foredoomed to failure, but Carroll acquitted himself so well that notwithstanding his Catholicism Maryland was able to send him as a duly elected delegate to the next session of the Congress.

He arrived in Philadelphia on July 18, in the nick of time to sign Charles Carroll of Carrollton to the parchment upon which the Declaration of Independence, voted upon favorably ten days before, had just been engrossed; and to be appointed to the Congressional Board of War. It was a fortunate appointment, for while serving on the board he was able to help prevent the greatest threat to the Revolutionary cause—the plot to deprive Washington of his command. When the war was done and distrust of Washington had turned to adulation, Charles Carroll was Maryland's first choice as United States Senator. Though "he shared with most of the patriots from Washington down" what Miss Smith describes as "the distressing tendency . . . to feel loyalty and duty to his state before he felt it to his country," he remained a Federalist; and when in 1800 Maryland went Republican he retired from politics a discouraged and embittered man, quite certain that "and so will terminate the Union, if Jefferson should continue President for eight years."

But the most remarkable thing about Charles Carroll of Carrollton was the fact that his life, which stretched back into the romantic bawdy days of the London coffee-houses, extended into what we can accept as really modern times. In 1828, four years before he died at ninety-five, he laid the cornerstone for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, an experience which he described as second in importance to signing the Declaration.

Miss Smith, who in her preface describes this as her first book, displays a pleasing adaptability to her subject; she turns easily from the great events in which Charles Carroll played such an admirable part to the intimate, sometimes petty details of his domestic life that make him come alive as a man.

GRACE ADAMS

IN BRIEF

WING COMMANDER PADDY FINUCANE, R. A. F., D. S. O., D. F. C. A Memoir by James Reynolds. Edmond Byrne Hackett. $1.25.

This is a charming, if somewhat self-consciously Irish, tribute to Wing Commander Brendan Finucane, who was evidently as vivid and interesting a personality as he was a brave flier and born leader of men. The little book is beautifully and appropriately produced.

AN OUTLINE OF POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY. By J. F. Horrabin. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

In little more than 150 pages and 46 maps the brilliant English geographer provides a geographical history of civilization from ancient Egypt down to the present World War, as an aid to world politics now and in the immediate future. He pulls no punches in dealing with the imperialism either of his own country or of the United States and does not hesitate to point a vigorous moral. Here is democratic geopolitics.

OLD THAD STEVENS: A STORY OF AMBITION. By Richard Nelson Current. University of Wisconsin Press. $3.

This is a well-written and well-documented biography of one of the most important figures of one of the crucial periods of American history—the era of Reconstruction. The political implications of the fight Stevens lost and the economic and social results of the fight he won are carefully brought out, but the man himself, one of the most unattractive figures in our history, does not arouse much personal sympathy even in his biographer.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF G. E. MOORE. Vol. IV of the Library of Living Philosophers. Edited by Paul Arthur Schilpp. Northwestern University. $4.

This, the most technical of the volumes so far published in the series, is primarily for professional philosophers. G. E. Moore is distinguished for many reasons. He was among the first to re-establish the prestige of common-sense realism in modern Anglo-American philosophy. As an acute questioner and analyst he has few peers. He is perhaps the world's most skilful virtuoso in the art of epistemological chess. He can get more out of his perception of a match box or a patch of color than many other philosophers can derive from a wild imagination. The autobiographical pages in this volume, which will be the only ones intelligible to the general reader, are an unexpected delight. They portray, in a simple but graceful style, a single-minded devotion to philosophical activity that borders on saintliness. The environment in which G. E. Moore grew up, the schools and university life in England, are described in such a way that they seem to be scenes of a distant time from a different world. If there is a heaven, Mr. Moore will feel at home in it, provided the angels do more than sing.

GREENLAND. By Vilhjalmur Stefansson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

As a companion to his "Iceland," the well-known explorer-author has written a readable and comprehensive account of the history, geography, and strategic importance of this western outpost of Europe now occupied by our troops. Illustrated with photographs, line cuts, and revealing end-paper maps.

THE BURDEN OF BRITISH TAXATION. By G. Findlay Shirras and L. Rostas. The Macmillan Company. $3.

This study of the burden of British taxes on incomes of various size follows the technique of previous British studies of this nature and the technique of the Newcomer study published in the Twentieth Century Fund volume "Facing the Tax Problem." It estimates the total tax burden on families of different size having different incomes by directly estimating the amount of the various taxes which these particular units pay. No attempt is made to reconcile the burden thus set forth with the aggregate revenues by applying these burdens to some distribution of the population among the various income classes. For this reason the results are to be taken primarily as a measure of the relative burden on different incomes and cannot be accepted as a reliable measure of the general level of the burden except for purposes of comparison with previous studies using the same method. In particular, some rather arbitrary assumptions as to the expenditure of the various income classes for various items had to be made, since no British study comparable to that contained in "Consumer Expenditures in the United States" is available. The assumption is made that estates will be subject to the death duties once every generation, estimated at thirty-one years. This appears to be the really serious departure from reality. Actually under the pressure of increasingly high estate-tax rates the practice has grown both in this country and in Great Britain of spanning more than one generation by bequests directly to grandchildren and great-grandchildren or by creating trusts to this end. It appears probable that the method employed greatly overestimates the progressivity and probably the magnitude of the death-duty burden.

ART

TWENTY-FIVE IMPORTANT ACQUISITIONS. At the Primitives Gallery of Harry Stone, 555 Madison Avenue, until March 20.

Most of the twenty-five acquisitions are charming. There is something here to please everyone—the collector, the lover of good painting, or the detective who wishes to trace the artist, the time, or the place.

EXHIBITION OF MONOTYPES BY DEMETRIO URRUCHUA AND EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS BY LUIS HERRERA GUEVARA. At Durlacher Brothers, 11 East Fifty-seventh Street, until March 20.

Two South American painters. Urruchua paints in monotype, a process whereby the paint is applied in reverse to a stone or glass slab, and the slab then run through a press for imprinting on a slightly absorbent paper. This process, the catalogue tells us, is popular in Argentina, but it seems elaborate for the quality of the work produced by Uruchua. His drawing has a slightly frightening quality which does not redeem the mediocrity of his inspiration. Guevara, a Chilean, appears to be a genuine primitive with a peasant's feeling for vivid color and formal design. One might tire of his paintings, but at first sight they are entrancing.

PAUL KLEE, ANDRÉ MASSON, AND SOME ASPECTS OF ANCIENT AND PRIMITIVE SCULPTURE. At the Buchholz Gallery, 32 East Fifty-seventh Street, until March 20.

Klee's pictures, twenty-seven in all, are intended to "illustrate his greater versatility," which, alas, they fail to do. The earlier ones, excluding Number 5 (and perhaps Number 4, which I could not find), show him as a great artist but not at his greatest. Masson is steadily becoming a finer painter, and his smaller pictures are rich and concentrated. But the exciting, the terrific thing in this exhibition is the sculpture. It is not to be missed.

JEAN CONNOLLY

MUSIC

IF AT 6:29 in the afternoon of February 28 you noticed your dog stirring restlessly and whining in his sleep and you felt uneasy yourself, that was because at this moment The Nation's music critic was near death from the most lethally dull of Bach's Sonatas for unaccompanied cello, No. 5 in C minor, which was being played at the final concert of the New Friends of Music by Luigi Silva, an excellent cellist and musician who on this occasion intensified the effect of the music by playing it with the driest tone I have ever heard produced from a cello. Two minutes more and it would have been all over with me; but at 6:30—that was when Rover leaped up with a joyous yelp—Bach and Mr. Silva stopped, and Haydn and the Budapest Quartet resumed; and so I am alive to write the exciting story.

That concert illustrated an old New Friends weakness in program-making—the inability to distinguish between the works of great composers that are worth playing and the ones that should be left in obscurity. The concert a week before illustrated an old weakness in selection of artists. The New Friends' claim has always been that it—and it alone—attracts audiences with music, not with performers, and that having decided to give, say, Schumann's "Dichterliebe" or Bach's "Goldberg" Variations, it then looks for exactly the right artist for the particular work. Actually the New Friends, like other organizations, has always announced lists of performers along with its lists of works, in order to attract the audiences it would not have attracted otherwise. And for "Dichterliebe" it engaged Lotte Lehmann, who in addition to having box-office appeal is famous for her singing of the work; but for the "Goldberg" Variations on February 21 it engaged not Wanda Landowska but Rudolf Serkin, and did so not because of his reputation for competence in the work but because of his ability to fill the hall. The intense emotion which Mr. Serkin felt about the music was evident in the upflung arms which threatened to hit him in the eye and the gyrating body which threatened to slip off the chair, but not in the Allegretto rippling-off of those three great variations in minor which have so different a meaning and effect when played slowly and phrased with powerful tensions and momentums; nor did he reveal greater adequacy and comprehension in the tempos, phrasing, and style of the other variations, some of which he played with dazzling virtuosity. Nor was the choice of Busch and Serkin for performances of sonatas on February 14 an ideal one: they play together with remarkable feeling for ensemble performance, and Serkin does his best playing when stimulated and restrained by Busch; but he in turn does not seem to be able to stimulate Busch into producing something better than the thin, wiry tone and pallid phrasing that were heard in Bach's E major Sonata, and their playing in this great work was, as it often is, unimpressively small-scale.

The weaknesses I have mentioned are to be observed in the New Friends' announcement for next season. Beethoven's ten sonatas for violin and piano are to be played; and if the New Friends were concerned with exactly the right artists for the music it would have engaged with Szigeti either Franz Rupp or Artur Balsam, each of whom is a superlative ensemble pianist with temperament and style that are perfectly suited to Szigeti's; but being concerned with big-name performers it has engaged Claudio Arrau, an excellent musician but a solo pianist whose style is not well matched to Szigeti's. Beethoven's sixteen quartets are to be played; and again if the New Friends were concerned solely with the right artists for the music, and if it were genuinely concerned with "a more uniform standard" of performance "for this concentrated type of music" (whatever that means), it would not divide the works between the Budapest Quartet and the mediocre Busch Quartet, but would have all sixteen played by the Budapest group. Other works of Beethoven are to be played; and the program already announced for the first concert begins with the great Quartet Op. 127 but ends with one of the feeblest and dulllest pieces of music Beethoven wrote, his Piano Quartet Op. 16, to be played by Serkin with members of the Busch Quartet. The series, then, will offer the mixture of good and bad in music and performance that all New Friends series have offered, and that most organizations offer without the New Friends' pretentiousness.

With the signing of a union contract the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to broadcast the first part of its Saturday night concert; and the fabulous beauty and refinement of sonority and execution survive the reduction of range caused by the telephone-wire transmission to points distant from Boston, and even the reduction in range in a small console radio (though they are heard with the interference that used to spoil Toscanini's Saturday night broadcasts). Not only, moreover, did the orchestra exhibit these qualities when Koussevitzky conducted it in his fabulous performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, but one could recognize it as the same orchestra when Szell conducted it in a good performance of Schubert's C major Symphony. That tells us something about Szell, but it also tells us something about the Boston Symphony—something in which this orchestra differs from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. At the time when the New York Philharmonic-Symphony was conducted by Toscanini and was a great orchestra I don't think one would have been able to say one had recognized it as the same orchestra if Szell had conducted it. The difference would have had something to do with Szell, but a great deal to do with the attitude of the orchestra. That attitude is as important in the present New York Philharmonic-Symphony crisis as the mismanagement of the orchestra's affairs by the board of directors and the business manager; and I hope to say more about both next time.

B. M. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Education—American Style

Dear Sirs: The Public Education Association is deeply disturbed by the continuous stream of misleading propaganda emanating from certain groups in New York city who claim to speak for America. These groups actually seek to pin the cause of the current unrest in our schools upon progressive education. Among other claims which have been made is the preposterous one that the activity program is the root of all evil, that it stems directly from Russia, that "Lenin demanded such a program be adopted for the training of children back in 1917-1920," and that America imported this "foreign" philosophy of education, thereby corrupting our educational system.

While one is tempted to treat so patently absurd a statement with the contempt it deserves, it seems necessary, in view of the widespread publicity it has received, to point out briefly its absurdity. These self-styled "patriots" do not seem ever to have heard of Horace Mann (though his name is a household word among educators), who lived from 1796 to 1859, and whose magnificent work in Massachusetts laid the foundation on which our entire educational system was built. Nor do they appear to know of Francis Parker, who was operating widely known progressive schools in Quincy, Massachusetts, and in Chicago, before 1900.

The philosophic basis of progressive education is the theory of pragmatism, developed by a third great American, William James, who died in 1910, and who, although one of the greatest geniuses this country has produced, seems also to have escaped these "patriots'" attention. John Dewey, who applied James's philosophy to education, wrote his educational classic, "School and Society," in 1899. "Schools of Tomorrow" by John and Evelyn Dewey, which describes numbers of progressive, or "activity," schools already operating in this country, appeared in 1915.

Therefore to talk about the activity program as having been imported from Russia is not only sheer nonsense, but is dishonest as well. The activity program is thoroughly American procedure. It was nurtured in our democratic society, because it meets the needs of that society. It encourages in children self-discipline and the ability to think and to make decisions; it makes the child aware of his responsibility to the community of which he is a part. The Public Education Association, believing this to be the logical type of education for Americans, wishes to see that program expanded.

Many persons have written to our newspapers recently demanding a return to formal, rigid methods of discipline in our schools. These persons even urge a return of the rule of the rod with its brutalizing effect on both teacher and pupil. They are the ones who seek the "foreign" formula, not the American. We must not allow them, in this time of emotional stress, to mask their ideas under the guise of Americanism. We must resist and confute their continuous reiteration of the statement that progressive thought and action is alien to America. Who could have been more progressive in thought and action than our founding fathers? Are we to regress to the restricted and repressive concepts from which they fled?

America is today, as it always has been, a forward-looking nation. The activity program is a practical method of educating for this American way of life. Our country has led the world with the concept of free schools and free education for all men. We have always pioneered. Today more than ever we must continue to push forward—not retreat.

MARGARET LEWISOHN, Director
New York, February 26

Mr. Meiklejohn Comments

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of February 27 you publish Professor Sidney Hook's review of my book, "Education Between Two Worlds." May I make three brief comments on that review?

First, Mr. Hook finds the book to be "a horrible object lesson in linguistic confusion." I regret, of course, that he holds that opinion. And yet I have no protest to offer against his expression of it. If Mr. Hook finds my thinking unclear, as I find his, he is in duty bound to say so.

Second, Mr. Hook's account of my argument is, I think, both inaccurate and misleading. In fact, he does not seem to me even to try to state for his reader my central problem in the form in which I was considering it. But, here again, I do not protest. I can only express regret that Mr. Hook's discussion does so little toward the clarification of an issue whose "social importance" is, for both of us, "enormous."

But, third, Mr. Hook uses, in place of clarification, a method against which I do protest. It is that of personal attack. Speaking of my "social and educational philosophy" he says, "Finally it is the 'Mein Kampf' of all frustrated administrators whose enlightened projects have been shipwrecked in the processes of democracy, who would like to ram them down their colleagues' throats, make them like it—and still remain democrats." I do not know what I may have done to arouse in Mr. Hook the personal bitterness of that characterization. But I do know that as criticism such a statement is unworthy either of a student of philosophy or of a reviewer for The Nation.

ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN
Washington, February 27

Dear Sirs: The sentence Mr. Meiklejohn quotes was not intended as a personal characterization of him or as a reflection on his educational practices, about which I know little. If I gave a different impression to him or to anyone else I am sincerely sorry. The paragraph in which the sentence appears enumerates three groups important in American life to whom Mr. Meiklejohn's social philosophy, in my judgment, will make a strong appeal. The group of "frustrated administrators" is mentioned as the third and last.

SIDNEY HOOK
New York, March 2

The SEC Is Right

Dear Sirs: What is all this hue and cry over the SEC's proposed regulation compelling a corporation to call for a stockholders' annual meeting at which any stockholder can say anything he wants to up to a hundred words?

Stockholders are the real owners of any corporate body. They elect the directors, who in turn elect the officers. Too many boards of directors have leaned too heavily toward perpetuation in office. They know that if a sufficient number of stockholders attend an "annual meeting of stockholders" and decide to elect an entire new board of directors, these "perpetuals" are out, including all present officers. But stockholders may be so widely scattered over the country that they never communicate with each other as to how they would like their property run differently. They merely receive notice of the call for the annual meeting, usually with no program whatsoever set forth. And to take care of any opposition, the management secures as many proxies from its friends as it deems necessary (freely solicited or maybe otherwise).

Every voter is a "stockholder" in the United States of America. He helps elect the Congressman who he feels has advanced a platform serving the best interests of his constituency. If this voter (in the mass) decides he no longer wants this Congressman (director) to remain as representative of his (stockholder's) interest (in America), the annual election meeting of stockholders is the time when such action is taken. And there is no doubt as to what the program is—the political rallies, the newspapers, and the radio have acquainted every voter with the two programs in view. Not so with the stockholders in a large corporation.

But some newspaper commentators have come out with, "What a field day for the blackmail! What a wonderful chance for the 'strike-suit' lawyer who through buying a few shares of stock in a company could clean up a fortune on this SEC proxy ruling!" And in this connection one commentator mentions "crooks and shysters" as being given an open door to such a "field day."

This SEC ruling won't make any more "crooks, shysters, and blackmailers" among a corporation's stockholders than there are now. The moral rectitude of a prospective shareholder is never questioned once his checkbook is opened and his pen is dipped in ink. From the opposition by corporations to this SEC ruling one would almost think that the directors considered themselves the only ones above reproach.

When corporate bodies enlist the aid of public commentators to prevent—as coming under "blackmailing, shysterism," etc.—one or a thousand stockholder-owners from learning, in advance of any annual meeting, the opinions of other stockholder-owners as to the present or future operations of the corporation, then it rather looks as if the directors of some corporations have a "nut in the fire" and that they are afraid to be the "cat's-paw" to pull it out. Financial history has shown only too truly the need for stockholder-owners to know more about what their elected directors have been up to.

GRIDLEY ADAMS

New York, February 25

For Civilian Control

Dear Sirs: As I. F. Stone pointed out recently, Baruch sides with the army and navy in wanting military control of production. Like Mr. Stone, I would prefer to see such control in the hands of civilians. But many people seem to feel this must mean that a civilian will decide whether we shall have tanks or guns, etc.

Is not the problem much simpler? Yes! let the armed forces list their needs—but let all control for their production with all possible speed be in civilian hands.

HILDA H. ABRAMS

New York, February 24

From Such Liberals . . .

Dear Sirs: The article on Hull and the Press in your issue of February 6 makes timely a few remarks on the mystery of how Hull became classified as a liberal. He is so thought of by most persons, and yet his record in the critical period prior to the war was clearly one favoring reactionary elements. The record of the State Department in its handling of Vichy and North Africa is not one which on the surface shows a liberal temper, but it may be too early to judge the complexities of that kaleidoscopic epic. Temporarily the State Department may be given the benefit of doubt in judging the character of our appointees and those Frenchmen who have been given posts of importance despite their records of appeasement and as hangmen for Pétain.

If the record of the State Department prior to the war had shown a clear understanding of the growing Nazi menace, our judgment could be further withheld. However, that record is no credit to the State Department. One good instance will show up that record. On May 7, 1938, the New York Times published on page 1 a two-column article headed Hull Clashes with a Columnist on Arms Exports to Germany. The incident was important enough so that a full transcript of the press conference was published that day on page 6 of the Times. This transcript was edited by Mr. Hull. In it it appears that he assumed full responsibility for the export permits which had been granted for the shipment of arms and munitions to Germany. These shipments could not be made under our treaty with Germany without explicit and written permits from the State Department.

Mr. Hull took the position that the treaty provided "Germany should not rearm" and did not provide that we might not rearm Germany. Statements by reporters indicating surprise at such flouting of a clear moral issue brought forth from Mr. Hull his usual petulant remarks about the unfairness of reporters. He made some cynical references to cornfield lawyers who did not understand the fine points of legal terminology, and said that his good lawyers at the State Department had justified the export of arms to our potential enemies despite the treaty provisions.

From such liberals as Hull we need more protection than from avowed fascists whose aims are clearly understood.

JACOB MARK

Brooklyn, N. Y., February 7

No Wilder Than Babbitt

Dear Sirs: Mr. Edmund Wilson, in The Nation of January 30, dismisses the Joyce-Wilder controversy by stating that it can scarcely be controversial, since Mr. Wilder has so openly delved in the Joyce mine.

In the course of his remarks he writes that "the general indebtedness to Joyce in the conception and plan of Wilder's play is as plain as anything of the kind can be"; and that "what Wilder is trying to do is quite distinct from what Joyce is doing." Is there some mild contradiction in these two statements?

It would be perfectly easy to trace "The Skin of Our Teeth" back, not to "Finnegans Wake," but to Mr. Wilder's own work. Surely, to go as far afield than "Our Town," the general indebtedness is quite plain also. The characters of Gladys and Henry find exact prototypes in a one-act play entitled "The Happy Journey to Camden and Trenton," published as long ago as 1931. Mrs. Antrobus also appears importantly in "The Happy Journey"; but then she appears in almost every book and play that Mr. Wilder has written. Mr. Antrobus is, of course, rather an old type—Man. Some of his lineaments are quite distinct in most of Mr. Wilder's male characters; and George Brush, hero of "Heaven's My Destination," besides being Man, was also wanted by the police. Mrs. Antropus's letter, which smells so strongly to Mr. Wilson and others of the miner's pickax, dates back to a scene in "The Woman of Andros," published in 1930.

Mr. Wilson reproaches Mr. Wilder for using the cheap device of having Abel killed by Cain, instead of following Joyce, who kept both Shaun and Shem constantly alive. Mr. Wilder's model for this, as for others of his themes, is a Book considerably older than "Finnegans Wake."

Mr. Wilson also objects to Mr. Wilder's treatment of Sabina, as compared with Joyce's or even with Shaw's Lilith, who at least always breaks up the pattern and leads (natürlich!) to something different and higher. Mr. Wilder's Sabina, it seems, is conventional and even a little philistine.

Mr. Wilson seems not to realize that Mr. Wilder is preeminently philistine. He is George F. Babbitt turned poet. He has left the real-estate business and taken to the lyre; but his songs are only long nostalgias for those happy real-estate days. This is the true and hitherto secret explanation of Mr. Wilder's success with the philistine populace. In this he differs from James Joyce.

He differs in several other respects also. Joyce was the most skilful deceptor of our age. He stripped the secret flesh of man down to the last wretched ganglion; and left on the operating table a heap of bloody though fascinating pulp. If Mr. Wilder has used this pulp, it is in a rather remarkable fashion: he must have assembled the lumps of flesh, the broken bones, and the severed nerves, and, bursting into laughter, blown the breath of life back into the corpse. Mr. Wilson, perhaps hankering for the fresh breezes of the morgue, finds this Lazarus, as exemplified by the Antropuses, rather too cozy.

A long time ago Joyce wrote, at the end of a book more intelligible to the illiterate than "Finnegans Wake": "I go to forge a new conscience for the race." Mr. Wilder appears strangely content with the old conscience.

Mr. Wilson says that he does not consider "The Skin of Our Teeth" one of Wilder's very best things. We would be fascinated to learn which one of Mr. Wilder's other books or plays he does so consider. With the exception of "The Cabala," a boyish effort, Mr. Wilder, like most important writers, has written on one theme only. "The Skin of Our Teeth" is the most complete and moving treatment of that theme that he has so far produced. Is it possible that Mr. Wilson is unaware of Mr. Wilder's theme?

M. MCGRATH

East Orange, N. J., February 23

Liquor and Law

Dear Sirs: In the issue of The Nation of January 16 a contributor criticizes you for saying that conditions under prohibition were worse than before the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment, and that such a statement from a liberal shakes his confidence in his liberalism. In reply I would say that millions of people today are in accord with your statement.

We talk glibly about prohibition without realizing that no prohibitive law ever prohibits, and the pretense that it does only tempts the young and adventurous to violate the law just to show he can get what he wants, regardless of enforcement officers or the law. Under the Eighteenth Amendment we had what was much worse than the open saloon. We had bootleg, dark-alley, and dark-cellar grogeries, school-children's booze parties as well as adults' orgies, all for the sake of profits.

It has been my privilege to live in a city with dozens of wide-open saloons; yet there has never been the debauchery that obtained in an adjoining district afflicted with the privilege to sell while a nearby city had voted dry. Such conditions were found all over the country. Hence neither local option nor prohibition is a remedy for the evils of the liquor traffic. Any district can get whichever evils it wants by its votes. If it votes dry it will have bootleg and the speakeasy. If it votes wet it has the debauchery of the open saloon.

Probably not all of the evils of intoxicating liquor can be eliminated without generations of education. However, the major portion of the evils may be destroyed now, or whenever the people are willing to forgo profits to banish the vice.

A moment's reflection will convince any thinker that the sole motive for dealing in or manufacturing intoxicants is the profit derived therefrom. The federal government receives many millions of dollars from the traffic. Many millions more are taken by the distillers, wholesalers, retailers, bootleggers, and others.

If then the government would take over the manufacture and distribution of all intoxicating beverages and sell direct to the consumer, at cost, in limited quantity and in original packages, and if consumption on the premises where it was sold was prohibited, such an act could be enforced and would reduce the evils to a minimum. It is because of what I learned, before, during, and since the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, that I resolved never again to vote for prohibition or local option. However, if the people will start a movement as outlined above, they can count on me 100 per cent.

GEORGE HEFFNER

Pasadena, Cal., February 7

CONTRIBUTORS

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, Librarian of Congress, last month resigned as assistant director of the OWI. He has written several volumes of poetry, plays, and criticism; "Conquistador," a long narrative poem, won the Pulitzer prize in 1932.

JOACHIM JOESTEN, author of "Rats in the Larder," a study of Nazi influence in Denmark, is an assistant editor of Newsweek on the foreign desk.

JAMES G. PATTON is the president of the National Farmers' Union.

JAMES A. WECHSLER, formerly on the staff of The Nation, is in the Washington bureau of PM.

LYNN RIGGS, author of "Green Grow the Lilacs," "Russet Mantle," and other plays, is now a corporal in the United States army.

GAETANO SALVEMINI is Lauro de Bosis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard University.

ROBERT K. HAAS, lieutenant colonel on the General Staff of the New York State Guard, commanded the Headquarters Company of the 308th Infantry in France during the First World War.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE CRISIS IN WORLD FREEDOM

Readers are invited to participate in a discussion of present dangers in the American political front

Chairman:

Mrs. J. BORDEN HARRIMAN

Speakers: Louis Dolivet, Howard Brooks

Monday, MARCH 15, 8 P. M.

Labor Stage Theatre, 106 W. 39th St.

Admission: American Free World Association
W. 40th St., N. Y. O. Admission: 50c

A MEMORIAL MEETING

for

DR. HELENE STOCKER

noted German pacifist and feminist will be held on

Sun., March 14, at 4 p.m.

in the

Ethical Culture Society Auditorium

at

63 St. & Central Park W.
New York City

(Dr. Stocker, famous throughout Europe as lecturer and author, was founder and editor of the monthly journal, The New Generation. She was forced to leave Germany in 1933, immediately after Hitler came to power and had been living in the United States since 1941.)

OUR MEN
WANT BOOKS★

SEND
ALL YOU CAN SPARE

Help a man in uniform enjoy his leisure hours. Give your good books to the 1943 VICTORY BOOK CAMPAIGN. Leave them at the nearest collection center or public library.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 4

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Associated with a poet in a popular overture
- 5 Led a run to wash and iron
- 9 The French and the English are in this mythical river
- 10 It did for Cleopatra
- 11 Opposed to rural
- 12 A raid, or no raid
- 15 Confer
- 16 A solvent colonist?
- 17 That reminds me!
- 19 Welcome! but not in summer
- 21 Contempt when Dad is in for a change
- 22 Gasp, and you'll need a couple for your wardrobe
- 23 It sounds a weird lake
- 25 Seems to make me older
- 27 Damage started by a little devil
- 29 This fishing-vessel should be able to stick it
- 33 Solar helmet
- 34 Turns the vicar into his residence
- 35 The bull's neighbor
- 36 Here a red tale is unfolded
- 37 Rum finish to a fit of ill-temper

DOWN

- 1 Back seat often willingly taken
- 2 A flower in tears
- 3 Scenes of action
- 4 Don't tip this waiter
- 5 Cigarette holder
- 6 Extraordinary interest is shown in his books

- 7 Often mentioned with credit
- 8 Necessary in order to make a thing real new
- 13 What carriers do—and free, too!
- 14 Artists' workshops
- 15 In addition, little Sidney is among the bees
- 18 Better that the Sun should do it than the father
- 20 Is broadcast daily through itself
- 22 He is proud of his execution and likes to be hung
- 24 Is this responsible for head noises
- 25 The fruit which falls first
- 26 A great number, for example in the king of beasts
- 28 These bulls may fulminate, but they never bellow
- 30 Ocean greyhound
- 31 Placed face up, so to speak
- 32 An all-round supporter

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 3

ACROSS:—1 DASTARD; 2 TUGBOAT; 3 STROKES; 10 ESTATES; 11 ADELE; 12 USA; 13 STAGE; 14 RETINUE; 16 LARGESS; 18 ATHLETE; 21 SECONDS; 24 CARLE; 25 MOO; 27 AISLE; 28 SIT DOWN; 29 GUSHERS; 30 ROTTEN; 31 NONAGON.

DOWN:—1 DESPAIR; 2 SERPENT; 3 ANKLE; 4 DISPUTE; 5 TOENAIL; 6 GATES; 7 OUTRAGE; 8 TESTERS; 15 NEE; 17 ROC; 18 ACCUSER; 19 HABITAT; 20 ERMINES; 21 SLOW GIN; 22 NEST-EGG; 23 STETSON; 24 HLOPE; 25 ALSON.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 20, 1943

NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- The Eden Mission 397
- The Word and the Deed 400
- A New Bill of Rights 401
- An Old Abuse Is Ended 402

ARTICLES

- Battle Lines in Tunisia by Donald W. Mitchell 403
- Planning and Politics by I. F. Stone 405
- 50 Years Ago in The Nation 407
- The Return of Eduard Benes by Blair Bolles 408
- Okies Wanted by Selden C. Menejee 410
- Democrats Against the Party by Jonathan Farmer 412
- In the Wind 414

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Report Out of Spain. II. Prisons and Prisoners by A. del V. 415
- Something to Fight for by Jack Gerber 417
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 418
- File and Remember 419

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Cliché and the Classic by Irwin Edman 420
- Spain Under Franco by Louis Fischer 421
- The Honest Man . . . by Henry Miller 422
- Philadelphia in Franklin's Time by W. E. Woodward 424
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 424
- Drama: Henry Ward Beecher's Little Sister by Joseph Wood Krutch 426
- Films by James Agee 426
- Music by B. H. Haggin 427

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

- CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 5 by Jack Barrett 432

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic

Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 15, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE RECAPTURE OF KHARKOV REPRESENTS

a setback to the Russians which Moscow makes no attempt to minimize. It brings the German armies in the Ukraine back approximately to the line they occupied in the spring of last year, from which they launched their summer offensive. And it postpones indefinitely hopes of a Soviet advance to the Dnieper River, which would have enabled the Russians to regain the riches of the Ukraine. It is probable, however, that the Germans will not be able to extend their counter-offensive at this time. Russian reinforcements are said to be arriving in large numbers in the south, and the spring mud, which checked the momentum of the Russian winter drive, will now, in turn, handicap the enemy. Moreover, the German High Command may find it necessary to switch some of their reserves to the central and northern fronts, where the Red Army continues to make progress. The key centers of Smolensk, Bryansk, and Orel are all threatened, and a new drive has been begun toward Staraya Russa. Russian reports stress the fact that German reserves in large numbers are being transferred from the west, and it is not surprising, therefore, that the second-front question should be raised again. It is probable that the Nazis are gambling on the chance that there will be no invasion of Europe so long as Allied shipping and other resources are tied up in Tunisia, where Rommel's delaying tactics have had a considerable measure of success. On the other hand, the scale of the uprisings in France, which appear to be receiving practical encouragement from Britain, suggests that a cross-Channel attack may be fairly imminent.

★

CONFUSED BY PRESSURE FOR THE RUMI PLAN, the House Ways and Means Committee has thrown overboard the pay-as-you-go plan advocated by the Treasury in favor of a modified collection-at-the-source scheme for wage- and salary-earners. Although there is some merit in the committee's proposal as compared with the present system of delayed tax collection, it falls short of achieving the two main objectives of the Treasury's plan. It does not greatly speed up tax collection; nor does it provide a way for increasing this year's revenues so as to head off inflation. Meanwhile, the Republicans appear to be determined to make the Rumi plan a party issue despite its obviously dangerous inflationary possibilities. Some of this effect has already been felt. Treasury officials report that because of the uncertainty about the Ruml plan many fewer persons are paying their income tax in full this year than in past years. This means that less money has been withdrawn from the consumer market than had been anticipated, thus increasing the demand for scarce articles. Altogether an atmosphere has been created in which Congress will find it hard to crack down to the extent that is necessary if inflation is to be averted.

✱

IN THESE DAYS ONE CHALKS UP ONE'S victories—small or large. They are not frequent enough to be ignored. A small victory, but significant for its size, is the decision of the War Department to permit members of the Austrian Battalion—known officially as the 101st Infantry Battalion—to quit if they don't like it there. The background of the decision is as follows. Recruiting for the battalion, as our readers know, was put in the hands of Otto of Hapsburg. But Otto as a recruiting agent wasn't much more convincing than Otto as the future ruler of Central Europe. He signed up his two brothers and about seventeen other young men. To fill the battalion, the army called for volunteers from other units. The response was totally inadequate. Austrians in the American army were satisfied to stay where they were; they didn't choose to serve in Otto's battalion. The War Department shifted to compulsion. Not only men of Austrian birth or descent but Czechs and Yugoslavs and others whose forbears came from the states freed from Hapsburg rule were assigned against their will to the 101st Battalion. But force proved little more successful than Otto's powers of persuasion. So bitter was the resentment among the men in the battalion, so strong the criticism from democrats outside, that the department ordered a strategic retreat. Henceforth enlisted men who object to service in the Austrian Battalion will be permitted to transfer to other ground-force units upon submission of written application to the commanding officer. In other words, the department will return to the volunteer method which had proved a failure. From this as from every retreat, there is a lesson to be learned. In this war alliances with anti-democratic elements don't work. They also have a tendency to explode in one's face. This lesson could advantageously be applied in larger areas of action. Otto should be looked upon as merely a free sample.

✱

ALTHOUGH THE McKELLAR BILL WAS somewhat modified before receiving committee approval, it remains an outright bid for increased Senatorial patronage and a serious threat to war-time administrative efficiency. Despite exemption of the employees of the FBI and TVA, the President's staff of White House aides, and "technicians and craftsmen," the bill would still require Senate confirmation of some 25,000 to 30,000 federal employees earning more than $4,500 a year—employees who are now chosen almost entirely on the basis of merit. It would reduce the Civil Service Commission to the status of a secretarial employment agency, and open the top jobs in every office in Washington to the sinister effects of the spoils system. Existing friction between Congress and the executive branch might be reduced, but only through the unconstitutional method of placing administration directly under the thumb of Congress. Since administrative heads would not even be able to control the appointment of their assistants, discipline would be virtually impossible, and the problem of coordination within administrative agencies might become as difficult as the existing problems of coordination between the various executive branches. Fortunately, some Senators are already discovering that their constituents dislike the bill. We hope that this dislike will be vigorously expressed.

✱

NONE OF THE VOLUMINOUS OBITUARIES OF J. P. Morgan appear to have mentioned the dramatic coincidence between his fatal illness and the ICC's rejection of the Erie Railroad bond issue. Yet this action, which prevented a very profitable security deal for the firm of Morgan, Stanley and Company, constituted a new and significant blow at the tied-corporation system on which the power of the house of Morgan has been built. The Pecora investigation of private banking in 1933 brought out the fact that Morgan partners held 167 directorships in 89 corporations with total assets of $20 billion. These included many of the largest concerns in the country—railroads, utilities, and industrial giants such as United States Steel, General Electric, General Motors, Kennecott Copper, and Montgomery Ward. The actual interest of the Morgan firm in such companies was often relatively small, but it exercised effective control, nominating the management and deciding financial policy. Thus it was able to insure for itself the immense profits arising out of security flotations. In recent years the SEC has challenged this kind of control by insisting on competitive bidding for certain utility issues, and the ICC decision last week means a loosening of the ties between railroads and their "traditional" bankers. Thus the empire which J. Pierpont Morgan built and his son consolidated begins to crack as the third generation inherits it. As a man the late J. P. Morgan was undoubtedly more genial than his buccaneering father. The newspaper eulogists stress his love of children, flowers, country life, pig-breeding, and grouse-shooting. But so far as the record goes there is little indication that he ever developed a social consciousness. Directors of public companies, he once told a United States commission, are in no way responsible for labor conditions in the plants they control.

THERE IS NO QUESTION THAT RECORDS AND radio have created far more jobs—even for musicians—than they have destroyed. Yet James C. Petrillo claims that thousands of members of the American Federation of Musicians are unemployed because of "canned" music; and he has demanded, as a condition of his lifting the present ban on recording, that these unemployed members be provided for by means of a fund to be created by payment to the union of a fixed fee for each reproduction of records, transcriptions, mechanical devices, and library service of which the master record was made by members of the American Federation of Musicians. The recording and transcription companies, needless to say, have turned down Mr. Petrillo's proposal. The companies contend, with logic it seems to us, that such an arrangement would put a penalty on technological improvement, duplicate government relief, and probably be found to violate half a dozen laws, including the National Labor Relations Act. The companies maintain, further, that when Petrillo says a large number of his members are unemployed, he can only mean that they are unemployed as musicians, for a great many of them earn their living otherwise; and Petrillo has practically admitted that union membership is open to anyone who wants to earn his living as a musician. Thus a man who works in a factory and also plays the cornet can presumably join the A. F. of M. and qualify as one of the unemployed musicians in whose name Petrillo has prevented recording. Petrillo has done a good job in raising the wages and standards of musicians; but when he attempts to enforce his demand by taking a step which affects the public interest as gravely as the ban on recording he is performing a service, not for his members or for "music culture" in the United States, but only for the enemies of labor unions.

★

STEPHEN VINCENT BENET DIED ON MARCH 13 at the age of forty-four, and despite his youth his name was probably better known to a large public than that of any other contemporary poet of serious literary pretensions. His long narrative poem "John Brown's Body" is said to have sold a first edition of 70,000 copies, and more recently a moving-picture version of his prose tale "The Devil and Daniel Webster" carried his name to an even wider audience. At the present moment when dozens of young writers of every sort are hopping upon a bandwagon labeled "America, Americans, and Americanism," and when the whole aspiration toward a native literature threatens to degenerate into mere vulgarity, it is worth remembering that when "John Brown's Body" was published in 1928, the expatriate was setting literary fashions and Americanism was a term of derision. At the same time Mr. Benét deliberately resisted another current tendency, and despite his high seriousness made his appeal to the general public over the heads of all the esoteric cults. Less than a year ago a two-volume selection from his work afforded a convenient opportunity to assess his actual accomplishment. The best of the prose and the best of the verse seem thoroughly sound, vigorous, and enduringly interesting. No doubt it is hardly to be expected that "John Brown's Body," which is some hundred thousand words long, should take its place among the five or six poems of that length which continue to be read, but some of Mr. Benét's lines—for instance, the passage beginning "I have fallen in love with American names"—may very well become a locus classicus for certain sentiments, and one or two of his prose stories are quite possibly permanent parts of our legend.

The Eden Mission

MR. EDEN has arrived in Washington at an opportune moment, just as public alarm about our political relations with our allies has crystallized sufficiently to create an atmosphere favorable to building a new understanding. That is shown by the hostile reception of Ambassador Standley's calculated indiscretion, by the deep impression made by Vice-President Wallace's warning of the danger of World War III, by the overwhelming vote in Congress for the Lend-Lease Act shorn of all hampering amendments, and by the approval accorded to the bi-partisan proposal for a Senate resolution indorsing the idea of a United Nations organization placed on a permanent basis.

In the past few months, as hopes of military victory rose, ugly forces have emerged from the shadows and set about the work of sabotaging peace. Proponents of a new American imperialism have been sounding off in many directions. One group has been clamoring for American domination of the air to be secured by using lend-lease to extract bases and concessions from other members of the United Nations now, when their position is still too insecure for them to be able to bargain advantageously. Other proposals have been made for demanding permanent title to the Caribbean bases leased from Britain, for the acquisition of sovereignty over all Pacific islands, and for the creation of an international bank, with 51 per cent of the stock owned by the United States, which would control the strategic raw materials of the world. The crackpot nature of some of these proposals does not disguise the chauvinistic spirit which inspires them, and it is not surprising that they should arouse British imperialists to fierce counter-challenges. If reactionary nationalism of this kind is allowed to get a start, the end of the war must inevitably mean the beginning of new international rivalries.

It is a hopeful sign, however, that the Seventy-eighth Congress, in its first important vote on a foreign issue, decisively rejected both the idea that lend-lease is an economic lever and the notion that it is a charity for which the recipients ought to be most humbly grateful. And by so doing it rebuked not only the isolationist-imperialists—it is curious how nearly these two schools of thought coincide—but also our Ambassador in Moscow, who had just suggested that Russia might find lend-lease supplies cut off if it didn't say "thank you" in more fervent tones.

Admiral Standley's statement was promptly repudiated by Sumner Welles, and he was later forced to admit that he had exaggerated the lack of Soviet publicity for American help. Following the line of most commentators, we might, therefore, dismiss it as an old salt's attempt to match Stalin's famous bluntness. Unfortunately, there are grounds for suspicion that the Ambassador's indiscretion was inspired by people in Washington who have swallowed the Goebbels line about the "Bolshevik menace." Inside the State Department there are influential officials whose constant care is how to fill the vacuum which the defeat of the Nazis will create in Europe in time to prevent communism from rushing in. Obsessed by fears of revolution, they seek ways and means to bolster the forces which they consider "safe," to clothe with new flesh the skeletons of long-perished "legitimacies." Hence the constant flirtations with the Francos, the Peyroutons, the Hapsburgs.

When Mr. Wallace warned recently of the dangers of "double-crossing Russia," he did not specify the forms this danger might take. But we would hazard a guess that he was thinking of diplomatic maneuverings designed to lay the foundations of a cordon sanitaire in Eastern Europe, to organize a group of reactionary powers strong enough to balance the might of Soviet Russia. It ought to be obvious enough that this policy shows an appalling lack of understanding of the problems of Eastern Europe, that there is no economic foundation for such a group of states unless it includes a resurrected Germany, that it would positively invite revolution by perpetuating a condition of decaying feudalism which already smells to high heaven, and that it would fan the smoldering suspicions between Russia and the West into open flames.

We do not believe Mr. Eden has the slightest sympathy with this amateur Realpolitik, and his conversations with the President could do much to squelch it. For he represents those forces in the British government which, backed by the overwhelming majority of the British people, look to the building of a system of collective security which Russia could enter on a basis of equality. In his first press conference in Washington he hailed the Anglo-Russian twenty-year treaty of mutual assistance. "It is most desirable," he said, "that we and Soviet Russia should place our relations on an enduring footing of cooperation. That is what the treaty does. Premier Stalin said it was the turning-point in our relations. That is how we view it."

Mr. Eden's discussions in Washington are expected to cover a wide range of subjects. We hope they will not merely allay current misunderstandings between the United States and Britain but pave the way for definite agreement among the United Nations in regard to a common peace policy. The chances of this outcome would, we think, be improved by a definite statement of Congressional policy, and we hope that reports of Presidential discouragement of a debate on the issues involved are unfounded. The resolution which has been drafted by Senators Ball, Burton, Hatch, and Hill could no doubt be profitably amended in details, but it contains the roots of the matter. It advises that the United States take the initiative in proposing an organization of the United Nations with authority to assist in coordinating resources for the prosecution of the war, to establish temporary administrations for countries freed from the Axis and to administer relief, to establish procedures and machinery for the peaceful settlement of disputes between nations, and to provide for a United Nations military force to be used against any aggressor.

These are modest proposals, but they raise all the fundamental issues which we must face now or tackle under much more unfavorable conditions at the peace table. Of course, the Wheelers and the Nyes would put up a bitter fight, but we believe that a large majority of the Senate would support the resolution and, by so doing, would reflect the sentiment of the public, which is now looking fearfully at the abyss which lies before us. There is no time to be lost in building an international bridge, and it cannot be constructed without the aid of Congress.

The Word and the Deed

TWELVE sailors of the French battleship Richelieu probably did not hear last Sunday's speech by General Giraud. If they did, they must have been puzzled, because the General spoke eloquently about those Frenchmen who had never accepted the armistice; he predicted monuments to France's saboteurs and francs-tireurs who risked death at the hands of Pétain's police as well as Hitler's; and he denied the slightest validity to the Vichy regime. Here were exactly the ideas which these twelve sailors had entertained right along. That is why they mistrusted their officers, who had forbidden them to tune in on any but Vichy-Nazi radio stations or to read any but the Vichy press and who still consider themselves responsible to the hypocritical old Marshal. That is why they were restive when one of their officers assembled them on deck and told them to stop grumbling about the forced-labor decrees of the Laval regime because "the sending of our workmen to Germany was a very fine thing for France." That is why they were moved to anger when, on the occasion of the American landings in North Africa, another of their officers called President Roosevelt a guttersnipe and Churchill a clown. It is why they were moved to rebellion when their singing of the "Marseillaise" and their shouts of "Vive l'Amérique!" resulted in the arrest and disappearance of thirty of their number.

Yet here they were on Ellis Island, "twelve undesirable aliens," awaiting hearings on a charge of having entered the country illegally. They had made the mistake of abandoning their "Germanophile" officers to join those Fighting French with whom General Giraud was saying he desired "whole-hearted and effective" union.

Of course Secretary of the Navy Knox is right when he points out that these desertions, twelve or fifteen a day, can no longer be tolerated. "The vessels will be left so understaffed that they will be virtually immobilized." That is good hard sense, the same kind that induced us to "use" Darlan and Peyrouton and Noguès. Obviously the ships can't fight without a crew; therefore, coerce the crew. The only hitch is that impressed seamen under fascist officers wouldn't put up much of a fight either. And doesn't it occur to anyone that it would be more logical to replace Vichy officers with Free Frenchmen than to force Free Frenchmen to serve under officers who are still infatuated with the enemy?

The plight of the Richelieu sailors is a microcosm of the larger tangle in North Africa. It highlights the same discrepancy between the word and the deed. Giraud's speech, repudiating Vichy and its laws and promising reestablishment of the republic, is a notable advance, bringing him almost to the position held from the start by the Fighting French. Yet what confidence can be reposed in any program toward democracy carried out almost exclusively by anti-democrats? How can anyone believe that an anti-Semite like Governor Peyrouton will effectively scotch anti-Semitism in Algiers or that a fascist like General Noguès will hasten the return of the Third Republic? The sacking of General Bergeret, one of the most virulent collaborationists in the North African regime, is all to the good. But Bergeret is one of many.

We welcome the words of Giraud, with their invitation to unity. They should do some good, particularly if they are speedily followed by the elimination of more of the remnants of Vichy. Only such action can be a real token of better things to come. But the General's words can also do harm if they mean what the United Press reports they were taken to mean in some quarters in Washington—to wit, "an effort to bring into active collaboration with the Allies men like Admiral Georges Robert, French High Commissioner at Martinique, and Admiral René-Emile Godfroy, chief of the French fleet units interned at Alexandria." If that is the objective, we would advise the twelve French sailors to stay on Ellis Island, where they can at least see the Statue of Liberty from their windows.

A New Bill of Rights

THE Administration has given the American people a dramatic reply to the question: "What are we fighting for?" We are fighting, according to the long-awaited report of the National Resources Planning Board, for an America in which every citizen shall have "the right to work usefully and creatively . . . the right to fair pay . . . the right to adequate food, clothing, shelter, and medical care . . . the right to security . . . the right to live in a system of free enterprise . . . the right to come and go, to speak or to be silent . . . and the right to rest, recreation, and adventure. . . ."

This new Bill of American Rights might well serve as a statement of the war aims of the United Nations. It epitomizes, as no other statement has done, the contrast between the way of life of free men and the way of life in the dictatorships. It is a natural supplement to the Atlantic Charter, but it is far more specific, far more inspiring to the average man, than that document.

The National Resources Planning Board has given us much more than a general statement of principles. It has given us a concrete program for implementing them in the years after the war. This fact deserves the utmost emphasis in view of the concerted effort that is being made by President Roosevelt's political opponents, inside and outside of Congress, to characterize the program as vague and visionary. The opposition apparently assumes that few voters will take the time to wade through the 640 pages of specific detail in the board's report on "Security, Work, and Relief Policies," or its companion volume, "National Resources Development—Report for 1943," which sets forth a series of concrete proposals for meeting the problems of the transition period from war to peace.

Editorial writers on newspapers which have the facilities for getting the facts if they want them have complained that the National Resources Planning Board's report is less complete than Great Britain's Beveridge plan. Actually, the reverse is true. While the American program for strengthening the social-security system does not present tables showing how the cost will be distributed as does the Beveridge Report, the American plan deals at length with such problems as demobilization, post-war employment, public works, post-war industrial and agricultural rehabilitation. It is an integrated program covering all aspects of post-war adjustment—an area in which Sir William Beveridge is greatly interested but which is not included in his justly celebrated report.

The board's proposals for changes in the Social Security Act are, in general, those that have been urged by experts since the social-security program was first up for discussion in 1935. Specifically, the board recommends that the existing cumbersome federal-state system of unemployment insurance be replaced by a federal system which would cover seamen, the employees of non-profit corporations, and those of small firms. A separate system is suggested to take care of domestic and agricultural workers. Under these national systems it would be possible to standardize benefits and to extend the period of payments to a minimum of twenty-six weeks. Proposals are also made for offering old-age and survivor's insurance to groups now excluded from such benefits, and for providing at least partial protection against disability. The most significant change in the federal-assistance program is inclusion of the long-advocated suggestion that federal contributions to the states take into account their differing economic and financial capacities, and that the states distribute aid among their subdivisions in accordance with relative need and financial capacity. Such a change is clearly essential if the present wide disparities in the size of old-age pensions and children's allowances are to be ironed out.

To provide jobs for ex-soldiers and war workers who are not assimilated by private industry, the board proposes a broad federal works program based on very different principles from those which governed the WPA. The means test is to be eliminated as a condition for employment. Men are to be selected solely on the basis of their employability and need for work. They are to be subject to the same standards of performance as those governing private industry, and are to work the same hours and receive the same pay as if they were working for a private employer. This change in emphasis—taking public work out of the field of relief and stressing its creative possibility—is long overdue. It is the one constructive answer to the charges of boondoggling that were levied, not without some justice, against many of the work-relief projects of the depression.

Significant also are the board's proposals for meeting the acute problems of adjustment that are bound to face youth in the immediate post-war period. It is suggested that the federal government make it possible for talented young people to continue their education beyond the age of compulsory school attendance by means of grants distributed by the educational authorities. Young people who do not continue their education and are unable to find jobs are to be aided through special youth-training projects, where they will receive a living wage.

Sweeping though this program is, it falls short at three important points of the comprehensive security provided in the British plan. It contains no general provisions for the needs of married women comparable to those put forward by Beveridge; it makes no provision for children's allowances except on a means-test basis; and it offers no comprehensive plan for pooling the uneven costs of medical care. Although these are serious omissions, the need for such special types of protection is probably not as great in this country as it is in Great Britain. Against these defects can be set the fact that the National Resources Planning Board has presented a program that is thoroughly American in its emphasis on work, constructive enterprise, fair pay, and full freedom. It represents an abrupt break from the defeatist thinking that held us in economic thralldom through the thirties, when it was assumed that we could not afford full employment or full production in this country. The war has shown us the absurdity of this contention. The National Resources Planning Board has given us a plan whereby we may tackle the problems of the peace with the same emphasis on production and jobs that has characterized our war effort. The Planning Board has done its job; the responsibility for action now rests squarely on Congress.

An Old Abuse Is Ended

ONE of the oldest and most vicious abuses of civil rights is the police practice of arresting persons and holding them incommunicado, without counsel, until incriminating statements are extorted. Used time and again against labor and political minorities, illegal secret detention and inquisition have been denounced by the Wickersham Commission, by bar associations, and by civic committees; incommunicado detention has featured nearly every civil-liberties case of the last two decades. Now the Supreme Court, in two decisions by Justice Frankfurter, has read police and prosecutors a badly needed lesson on lawless enforcement of the law.

The first case was that of eight copper workers arising out of a strike in 1939-40 of the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers against the Tennessee Copper Company's mines at Copperhill, Tennessee. After the company forced open the mines by bringing in a number of special deputies in the company's pay, several of the company's power lines were dynamited under somewhat obscure circumstances. Two FBI agents arrived on the scene to investigate. The local sheriff then took a number of the strikers into custody, without warrant, and locked them into the company-owned Y. M. C. A. building in Copperhill, which was being used by the sheriff and his deputies as their headquarters. Six more FBI agents arrived to assist in the investigation.

The strikers were not arraigned, as is required by Tennessee and federal law; instead, in the copper company's rooms, there began a grilling which lasted almost a week until the men gave statements—repudiated later in freedom—which satisfied their inquisitors. "Unaided by relatives, friends, or counsel," says the opinion, "the men were unlawfully held, some for days, and subjected to long questioning in the hostile atmosphere of a small company-dominated mining town. . . . There was a working arrangement between the federal officers and the sheriff of Polk County which made possible the abuses revealed by this record." The Supreme Court heard the case because it presented "serious questions in the administration of federal criminal justice," and set aside the conviction obtained in the lower court.

The case of three Tennessee moonshiners was argued and decided at the same time as the labor case and involved the same kinds of federal lawlessness. The Tennessee mountaineers had been taken into secret custody after a federal agent had been shot by an unidentified assailant in the course of a night raid on a liquor cache near a cemetery. Instead of arraigning their prisoners, as the law directs, the federal agents held them for fourteen hours in a detention room and then in other isolated quarters, and held them incommunicado, hidden away from relatives and friends and deprived of the legal aid to which they were entitled. The period of clandestine confinement and questioning at the hands of the six federal agents lasted from three o'clock Thursday morning until two o'clock Saturday morning; on the basis of admissions thus wrung from the suspects—none of whom had had more than four years of elementary schooling or had ever left the mountain settlement—they were convicted of second-degree murder. The Supreme Court declared that the detention procedure revealed "a plain disregard of the duty enjoined by Congress upon federal law officers . . . a flagrant disregard of the procedure which Congress has commanded. . . ."

The words of Justice Frankfurter will be cited in the never-ending struggle to control what he called "the overzealous as well as the despotic" in their use of "the awful instruments of the criminal law." Emphasizing the vital statutory safeguard against secret detention and inquisition, he said that it "checks resort to those reprehensible practices known as the 'third degree' which, though universally rejected as indefensible, still find their way into use. . . . It reflects not a sentimental but a sturdy view of law enforcement. It outlaws easy but self-defeating ways in which brutality is substituted for brains as an instrument of crime detection."

Battle Lines in Tunisia

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE showdown campaign for North Africa has not yet been fought, but all signs indicate that it does not lie far ahead. Progress in the African war has not always been correctly assessed. The loss of all Libya to the Eighth Army was not in itself a serious matter for Hitler. It relieved the British of a threat to their position in the Middle East, but it did not spell defeat for the Germans. The American occupation of Algeria and Morocco aroused hopes of an instant annihilation of Rommel, but the failure to reach Tunisia ahead of Axis troops, together with weather difficulties and not too brilliant generalship, afforded von Arnim time to dig in and develop strong natural defenses.

Today, as four months ago, the total strategic situation favors the United Nations. Surrounded by the British Eighth Army on the south and by French, British, and American forces on the west, the Germans in eastern Tunisia are in a dangerous position. Inferior on sea, in the air, and on land, they would seem to be marked for destruction. Nevertheless, all the advantages are not with the United Nations. A large share of the troops which give the Allies a two-to-one superiority on land are on garrison duty in Morocco and Algeria. The British Eighth Army, the best striking force available, is still dependent on supplies shipped around Africa and has yet to clear the Mareth Line. Rommel, on the contrary, is now operating upon extremely short lines of communication and supply. His troops are more mobile, more experienced in battle, and better led.

The recent fighting in Tunisia was important in that it demonstrated the strength of the chain of armed men and fortified points with which the Allies have ringed von Arnim and Rommel and afforded the first trial of American troops under battle conditions. In his attempt to break the chain surrounding him Rommel wisely chose the weakest link, the American section. After their attempt to cut the Tunisian corridor and to separate Rommel from von Arnim had failed in January, the United States troops were left in a poor position. They were spread out very thinly over a long segment of line and had insufficient reserves. When French troops were withdrawn from the central front to be reequipped and Americans moved into the vacant sector, this problem was aggravated. Before the weak natural defenses could be strengthened or reserves brought up, Rommel struck with superior force in a two-pronged armored thrust at the center and the southern end of the American position. Both columns made rapid gains, and the Americans, threatened with envelopment, retreated, suffering heavy casualties but also taking toll of the German armored units. The air forces of both sides were active, but the Germans did the better job of coordinating their air and ground movements. They were also far superior in tactics, and they repeatedly and disastrously fooled their

In view of the significance of Tunisia in the defense of the European fortress, Hitler may be expected to give Rommel all the support he can afford and to try to maintain at least his nuisance value. There are two possible methods of doing this. The first, direct reinforcement by air and sea, has been employed on a large-enough scale to enable von Arnim to more than hold his own in brushes with the British First Army. But it has been extremely costly, for British submarines have taken a large toll of Axis shipping, short as are the convoy routes.

The other possibility, a blow against Gibraltar through Spain and an attempt to close the Mediterranean, represents a danger so serious that a large part of the American troops in Africa have remained in French Morocco to guard against it. For several years Spanish Morocco has contained an army estimated at 100,000 men. And in the appeasement era the Axis placed heavy-caliber guns directly opposite Gibraltar on the African shore. At least temporarily these could close the Straits. Were Franco's cordial cooperation in a German attack assured, the United States could quickly be placed completely on the defensive. Since, however, the war is global, with events on each front affecting occurrences elsewhere, an attack through Spain looks like doubtful strategy. For the moment Hitler must throw most of his forces against Russia, and it is at least questionable whether he has available for a new theater of operations the troops and especially the air power such an effort would require.

The original strategy of the African campaign, the planning and transportation, the coordination of forces, and the political fifth-column activities were handled with unusual brilliance. But the follow-up has taken too long and disappointed practically everyone. Making the original landings farther east in order to include Tunisia would have entailed extreme risks, but the results might have justified them. It was to be expected that our fighters, new to desert warfare, would make mistakes. Criticism should come only if they continue the same blunders. But the delay in the west while Rommel was being chased halfway across Africa affords no ground for satisfaction. Finally, it has been all too evident that no adequate plans were made either by the army or the State Department for dealing with the myriad problems which followed occupation. Economic and political problems of the kind we have fumbled in Africa are part of modern war, and they will arise in greatly increased complexity when we invade continental Europe. Before that day we must correct the weaknesses revealed by the African campaign if we are to achieve success without paying far too great a price.

Planning and Politics

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 15

THE so-called American "Beveridge plan" submitted to Congress by the President has been lying around the White House for some time. It is in two parts. One deals with security, work, and relief policies; the other with post-war planning. The first, a tome of 640 pages, was actually delivered to the President three days before Pearl Harbor. The second, a literary quickie of but 50,000 words, was sent to the White House a year later, on December 16, 1942. Thus one had been on his desk for fifteen months and the other for three when the President finally passed them on to Congress.

Mr. Roosevelt is a master of publicity, and it is interesting to speculate on his timing. The moment chosen by the President for the submission of this plan served to distract the press and Congress from Admiral Standley's quaint attempt to better our Russian relations by kicking the Soviets in the teeth. In longer perspective, as has been widely enough noted, the release of this post-war security program in the wake of the President's first coy trial balloons opens the 1944 campaign. The report may also serve several functions in Mr. Roosevelt's strategy for dealing with an unusually cantankerous Congress. The President is said to hope that Congress will overplay its hand, and this report may goad his opposition to greater follies. The report effectively contrasts the President's large and historic aims with the picayune and querulous fault-finding and scandal-mongering that is the principal characteristic of the bi-partisan anti-Roosevelt bloc in Congress. Mr. Roosevelt has set the stage for a campaign far more momentous than his two past triumphs—the original fight to enact the New Deal and the struggle to force its acceptance by the Supreme Court.

Some of the right-wing papers, with a kind of senile glee, assume that the President's plan is already buried. They draw comfort from the fact that it has no chance of being enacted at this session of Congress. They believe it will be safely interred by the coalition of conservative Democrats and standard-model Republicans which dominates the new special Senate Committee on Post-War Plans set up under the chairmanship of Senator George. They are entitled to the pleasures of self-deception. Roosevelt's strategy, in fact, depends on opposition. The George committee is made to order for his purposes. Mr. Roosevelt wants to be able to go before the country—and the armed forces, which will vote by mail—in 1944 and say, "I offer jobs and security. My opponents offer joblessness and insecurity." This is not a program which can be beaten by calculations as to budgetary cost or appeals to the virtue of private enterprise, Hoover fashion. American politics will revolve around this program for a good many years to come, and it can be defeated only by a new type of demagoguery in which fascist-style politicians will seek at one and the same time to outbid the President and to confuse the issues by appeals to the crasser forms of prejudice. Just as fascism in the Reich had to pander to the fundamental socialistic outlook of the German people, so in this country it must hide not only behind appeals to American feeling for liberty but also behind promises to satisfy a newer and equally deep, if not deeper, desire for security.

It is an indication of the President's stature and genuine vision that he has gone beyond the necessities of social politics in submitting this program. It would have been enough, politically, to promise cradle-to-the-grave security, along the lines of the Beveridge plan in England. To have stopped at that point would have been in accord with one of the basic tendencies of the New Deal. This is the tendency to solve our economic problems by cutting down real wealth and increasing real costs. Wealth is plowed under to provide the scarcity necessary for the profitable operations of the privileged, property-owning classes, business and agrarian, while costs are raised to provide doles to placate the underprivileged. The New Deal has never had the courage in the past to put idle men at idle machines to produce the means to feed and clothe themselves. This larger economic sanity has been beyond the realm of the political possibilities within which it had to operate as a middle-class reform movement. But a grandiose dole will not solve our problems, despite the naive theory—which runs back from Keynes to Sismondi—that our economic society is a kind of gigantic poker game which can be kept going by periodically redistributing the chips of "purchasing power." Nor is "Beveridge planning" a worthy goal for our youth, which must strive to release the great creative possibilities which still lie stifled, for all our past achievement, in the American land and people.

It is at this point that one notes the striking difference between the first and the second report sent to Congress by the President. The bulky report on Security, Work, and Relief Policies takes only faint and tentative steps toward the broader horizons of the Post-War Plan and Program. The germ of the second report is in the call of the first for "increasing emphasis upon policies aiming at the prevention of economic insecurity through a fuller utilization of our productive resources, including labor. . . ." But in the main the first report is only a comprehensive social worker's approach to our economy, deriving from the grimly realistic but defeatist and socially bankrupt premise with which its findings open. "The American people," the report begins its final summation, "should base public-aid policy upon the acceptance of the following facts: (1) The need for public aid will be both large and persistent for some time to come. . . ." Though I have not read the entire 450,000 words of this report, I do not think it does more than touch timidly on the basic principle that we can preserve neither our natural nor our human resources merely by letting the idle rake the leaves away from the unsightly edges of the profit system.

What is little more than implicit in the earlier report achieves explicit statement and bold development in the second, which bears the marks of its war-time origin. "Our peace aims," says an opening statement which finds only a perverted reflection in the conduct of our diplomacy, "are war weapons which in the end may determine the outcome of the military struggle in which we are now engaged." Freedom from Want has hitherto had an ambiguous exegesis, reflecting Cordell Hull's anachronistic Manchester liberalism; it was originally translated by the President into "economic understandings which will secure to every nation a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants." Here Freedom from Want is expanded into a new Bill of Rights, all of which may be derived from the first, the "right to work, usefully and creatively through the productive years." The italics are mine, but the emphasis pervades the entire report.

The report on Post-War Plan and Program has a two-fold purpose. It aims first to outline a program for the orderly transition from a war-time to a peace-time economy, and secondly to sketch the broad outlines of a plan for development of an expanding economy through the cooperation of government and private enterprise. Both purposes are likely to arouse opposition from the larger private units in our economy. So far as the program for economic demobilization is concerned, it provides, among other things, for aid to smaller business units, for free access by business "to the use of both old and new materials and processes unhampered by misuse of the patent system," and for vigorous enforcement of labor legislation in a period when standards will be endangered by the laying off of many workers. Measures of this kind are unlikely to be popular with those who stand to gain the most from a disorderly demobilization and deflation in which financially weaker businesses may be gobbled up, new monopolies established, and the bargaining position of labor weakened.

In dealing with the second purpose of this report, to achieve an expanding national economy, we enter for the first time into the realm of genuine social security, into the field of measures designed to effect the security of our society as against makeshift measures to protect the security of individuals. What is envisaged in the report is not socialism but that kind of mixed state in which alone capitalism can hope to remain progressive. The report looks toward work programs that would increase the nation's wealth by developing its resources of soil, water-power, and transportation; toward the kind of governmental interference that would clear obstacles to genuine private enterprise in business; toward government partnership in certain basic fields; and toward government intervention to maintain useful productive employment where these other measures fail to maintain it. It is impossible here to dwell in detail on the National Resources Planning Board's specific suggestions, but they represent a rich, diversified, and flexible program, free from dogmatism or arid theory.

From the standpoint of business as a whole, it would be far better to accept a measure of social planning and governmental partnership in the maintenance of employment than to bear the heavy tax costs involved in a high level of joblessness. But business is deeply anarchic in its instincts, and the bigger businesses have usually preferred either a dog-eat-dog policy or an unprogressive freezing of the economic status quo. The danger in this program, as in all planning under capitalism, is that it may become a means whereby the monopolies and the combines use the political power and financial resources of the state to solidify their own power. The most obvious example of this danger is in the board's proposal for a National Transportation Agency which would regulate all means of transportation and have access to public funds for improvements. The railroads, which have learned from the ICC how easy it is to control a public regulatory body for their own purposes, would like such a setup as a means of curbing competition from truck and plane and as a way to tap the Treasury. As the largest aggregation of capital in the field, the railroads would ultimately dominate the agency, as they do the ICC.

There are similar dangers in the proposal for mixed corporations in fields like aluminum and synthetic rubber, where government "could participate in the selection of . . . business units which are to continue to operate in these industries." But the situation could hardly be worse in these fields than it is today. Posterity may look back and see the Roosevelt plan as a mirage, but if it does, the fault will also be ours. Our task is not to ponder the spectacle from mountain tops but to do our duty by the future by fighting to achieve as decent a society as we can. Laissez faire capitalism is dying, and it is up to this generation to see whether the new controls will be democratic or monopolistic. Given the deep desire of the people for security and freedom, the outcome is not a foregone conclusion. The President has launched out on the greatest battle of our time.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

ON THE second of last month an afternoon performance of "Ghosts" was given in the Athenaeum Hall [London], with Miss Hall Caine as Regina. The play, notwithstanding the unflinching realism of its handling of a repellent theme, was received with marked favor by a house filled to overflowing.—March 2, 1893.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S inaugural address was brief and directly to the point on all the subjects to which he addressed himself. . . . The tariff is to be reformed in the interest of the masses of the people, and the trusts and combines are to be curbed in so far as the federal power can reach them.—March 9, 1893.

CAPTAIN MAHAN is . . . perhaps the most distinguished writer on naval warfare in existence. . . . When he points out the value which Hawaii would have to us as a coaling station, in case we were a great naval power at war with another great naval power in the Pacific Ocean, and the annoyance which our possession of it would be . . . to our rival or enemy, he speaks as a master. But his whole argument . . . is based on the assumption that we are on the way to have a navy as large and powerful as the navies of France and England put together. . . . What effect this policy of general annexation . . . would have on our domestic institutions, Captain Mahan does not consider at all.—March 9, 1893.

WHATEVER may be said of the attempts of the English parties to outbid each other for the labor vote, it cannot be denied that the new Department of Labor, organized by Mr. Mundella, the president of the Board of Trade, promises to yield valuable results to the student and the statistician, whether it pleases the workmen or not.—March 9, 1893.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK: Hudson, W. H., "Idle Days in Patagonia." . . . Pater, Walter, "Plato and Platonism." . . . Symonds, J. A., "In the Key of Blue and Other Prose Essays."—March 2, 1893. . . . Alger, Horatio, Jr., "Facing the World; or, The Haps and Mishaps of Harry Vane." . . . Weissmann, Professor August, "The Germ-Plasm: A Theory of Heredity." . . . Charles L. Webster & Co. have nearly ready a new volume of short stories by Mark Twain.—March 16, 1893.

A LADY who is an experienced teacher and holder of an advanced degree wishes for a mathematical professorship where her rank and salary will be based upon ability instead of sex. (Advt.)—March 23, 1893.

THE WORD Panama now suggests so universally a huge scandal that its association with an actual canal across an actual isthmus seems only a figure of speech. . . . If it results in a complete fiasco, there is an end for a long time of French prestige in America.—March 30, 1893.

The Return of Eduard Benes

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, March 9

THE four men who profited from the indecent Munich decision thrive no more. Chamberlain, dead, was discredited while he yet lived. Bonnet has slid down the Vichy drainpipe. Hitler hides, and the Duce shakes in the shadow of coming destruction. The man who survives is the man whom Munich seemed to ruin. "Silent, mournful, abandoned, broken," Eduard Benes, the Czecho-Slovak President, went into exile after the four had laid his country on the altar of Wotan. Now he is gloriously ascendant. As before Munich, he is the Czecho-Slovak President. Shining in adversity, a statesman in 1943 as he was in the thirties and the twenties, Benes today walks in the van of the wise sculptors of the world to be. As always for him, the goal is certain, and as always the road is hard.

Many of the pitfalls that have made his path hazardous since Munich were dug by the United States. The news from London is that Benes intends to visit this country shortly. If he comes, he will speed the reluctant State Department toward a difficult decision: Shall we plan for a world security after the war that is based on complete cooperation with the Soviet Union and Great Britain? Benes's foreign policy is hinged on Russia. The United States dilly-dallies about the place of Russia in America's post-war foreign policy. Should we trust Moscow? Should we fear Moscow and cling to the Hapsburgs? Stroking their chins, the foreign-policy makers in Washington debate the pros and cons. Those who lean toward fear and hate of Russia fear and hate Benes. The respect accorded the obstinate democrat from Bohemia has become a barometer of our attitude toward the Soviet Union.

Benes resigned the presidency of Czecho-Slovakia on October 5, 1938. The British rather early forgave him for the wrong they did him, but the United States, though it was not represented at Munich, has never quite ceased to treat him as an important debtor treats a small creditor. How many are Benes's sins! In a day when the United States thought appeasement was sound policy, he insisted that Germany was not to be lulled by bribes. In a day when the prop of appeasement was fear of Russia, he clung to Russia. And worse, in a day when appeasement of Germany has been proved a mistaken policy and when our friends the British hold that it is not merely incorrect but dangerous to fear Russia, it is remembered here against Benes that he was right when we were wrong.

Benes came to the United States some months after he left Czecho-Slovakia, and spent the spring of 1939 lecturing at Chicago University. He was deeply pained but not astonished by the Nazis' seizure of his country in March after they had accepted the Munich bribe in October. He saw the Crime of March as the sure forerunner of war, and in the summer of 1939 he went back to Europe. Before he left he made it known that he wanted to see President Roosevelt. He could not be received at the White House. After all, he was but an ex-President. He was given an audience at Hyde Park instead, and no announcement was made of it.

Neither the French, at their worst, nor the British have shown our genius for mistreating those who are essentially their friends. The French government in the summer of 1939 permitted the Czechs to establish a National Committee in Paris which could serve as a pseudo-governmental rallying-point for Czechs who desired to keep alive the idea of Czecho-Slovakia and who hoped that their country would be won back, in time, by them as well as for them. Benes himself found London more congenial than Paris, because Bonnet was not done with appeasement while Chamberlain and Halifax were beginning to realize that it did not pay. Other exiled Czechs, however, carried on for Benes in Paris.

An account of Benes's activities from that distant last summer of peace until now throws light on the events and emotions, policies and doubts, of men and nations over the past four years.

The French in September, 1939, began to show signs of regretting their stupidity of September, 1938, and on October 2 the Daladier government reached a formal agreement with the National Committee. The next month both the British and French governments recognized the committee, which was attending to the serious military business of organizing a Czech army on French soil to fight against the Nazis, who, though bought off at Munich, had refused to stay bought.

Benes thought it safer to remain in London because he suspected that the French, still under the dark spell of Bonnet, would seek a peace with Germany if it were offered. But he visited France in May, 1940, and quickly returned to London with the conviction that France would not play a leading role in the war. He was prepared for the armistice in June, and the National Committee evacuated the Czech army from France to England.

London now became the seat of the National Committee, and a smoother course lay ahead for Benes, the chairman. The French had made his position difficult by permitting Milan Hodza, former Czech Prime Minister, to set up a rival "National Council" in Paris. The British pursued a more honest policy. Churchill had replaced Chamberlain, and Churchill had publicly denounced the sacrifice at Munich of Benes's country. His government recognized the National Committee as the Czecho-Slovak provisional government.

Benes felt himself and his aims safe in England, but he continued to speak well of Russia at a time when the Soviets, by the pact of 1939, were tied to Germany. He regarded the August agreement as a piece of cynical diplomacy which Russia meant in time to reject. In the winter of 1940 the Czech military attaché in Rumania told him, and Benes told the British Foreign Office, that the Russians were sabotaging their agreement with Hitler by inventing transportation difficulties that delayed the delivery to Germany of oil from Rumania and food from Russia.

Doubt of Benes's acumen concerning the Soviet government disappeared in London when the Nazis invaded Russia. Less than a month afterward, on July 18, 1941, the British gave full recognition to the provisional government. Benes's strength by that time was undeniable. Hodza, his sole strong adversary, had had little influence since the evacuation of the Czechs from France. So the United States recognized Benes's government provisionally on July 31. But though this seemed an act of encouragement, Washington diplomats actually embarked at about the same time on a policy of discouraging and embarrassing Benes.

From the summer of 1941 on, individuals in the Administration have been Janus-faced toward Russia and Janus-faced toward Czecho-Slovakia. Those who feared the Soviets feared the Soviets' friend, and fearing that friend, they cast glances in the direction of his enemies. The first of these was Hodza.

Milan Hodza, a Slovakian Protestant, was a leading political figure in Czecho-Slovakia from 1918 to 1938. Through those years he opposed the Slovakian autonomous movement. Since the fall of Czecho-Slovakia, however, he has put behind him the old policies and become a friend of autonomy, which he prefers to call "self-existence." Thus he has placed himself at the opposite pole from Benes, who wants a strong and cohesive Czecho-Slovak state and who believes further that as long as his country is occupied by the Nazis, discussion of its internal political problems is dangerously beside the point.

Hodza reached the United States from England in November, 1941. Adolf Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, arranged to have him received warmly at the State Department, some of whose officers drank in his reports on the Central European political situation. Benes, Hodza said, was splitting the Slovaks of the world. Hodza was in the United States to unite the Slovaks—by splitting them from the Czechs. Whatever he may have heard at the State Department, he felt encouraged to begin a series of lectures in the United States by which he sought to undermine Benes and his recognized government.

While Hodza was planning his American campaign, the Russophobes in the State Department and the Office of Strategic Services took to their bosom another enemy of the democratic cause—the Hungarian Tibor Eckhardt. Under Eckhardt's leadership the American Hungarian Federation issued a pamphlet denouncing Benes and his friends as disturbers of the peace of Europe and the security of the world. Jan Masaryk, the Czecho-Slovak Foreign Minister, was in the United States at the time, and Eckhardt pleaded with some success in Berle's chambers that the pamphlet had been provoked by Masaryk's actions. Mr. Berle made no distinction between the position of the Foreign Minister of a government which we had provisionally recognized and the unofficial apologist for a government with which we had broken.

Public opinion in the United States, however, was against Hodza and Eckhardt, and Mr. Berle had to cast the two men adrift. They are both charming gentlemen, but it was not their manners that won them the Berle smile. They carried with them little plans for a European federation of a sort that would shield the Western world from the Soviets. The isolation of Russia, it is recognized, depends upon the destruction of Czecho-Slovakia. And the destruction of Czecho-Slovakia depends upon the erasure of Benes, the firmest proponent of a restored Czecho-Slovak state.

That Benes is able like a phoenix to rise from the ashes of his power was recognized by the British after Munich, but it is only slowly being understood in Washington. The United States government last October gave full recognition to the Benes regime. But this step was taken without publicity, and a month later Benes's hopes were shaken once more by the Stimson letter to Otto Hapsburg. Hapsburg himself told me that Eckhardt was his collaborator, and insisted that he had a "majesterial" responsibility for the Czechs and Slovaks in the

Drawing by B. F. Dolbin
Eduard Benes

United States. Hapsburg the federationist is one with Hodza and Eckhardt in contemplating federation as a wall against the Soviet Union. He is, in other words, an enemy of Russia, an enemy of Czecho-Slovakia, and an enemy of realism.

Such has been the strange course of the United States toward a friend of our country and a friend of our type of democracy. The Czechs learned their fundamental political lessons in the United States. Benes in Czecho-Slovakia, as Foreign Minister and President, guarded the country carefully from bolshevism. Liberal Social Democracy was his guide. Benes could help to dispel the fear of communism in American breasts in no more effective way than by reminding us of his own experience, which proved that an anti-Communist state can pursue a foreign policy based primarily on friendship with Russia without danger of Communist penetration. Friendship for the Russian nation, indeed, is one of the safest dykes against flooding by the Russian ideology.

Benes's Russian policy rests on considerations of security. Czecho-Slovakia is a small state, and a small state always stands in need of a large friend. The hope that France, Czecho-Slovakia's friend of the twenties, will play a leading role in the new Europe is dead. Czecho-Slovakia must depend on Russia. It would be dangerous, moreover, for a small state to irritate so powerful a neighbor as Russia. Benes, therefore, desires a European federation friendly to Russia. Cordons sanitaires, in his view, can only become ribbons on the funeral flowers of the states that compose the cordons. If Western diplomacy, bent on walling up Russia, tries to establish a new and more ambitious cordon sanitaire, it will simply be cultivating irritations that will surely become wars.

The fact that Benes told a newspaper correspondent in London of his plan to visit the United States suggests that he expects a good reception. If Washington gives him a good reception, it will mean that the United States government is approaching a decision in favor of friendship with Russia. The news of Benes's expected visit coincides hopefully with the speech of Vice-President Wallace at Delaware, Ohio, in which he warned that a third world war in the twentieth century would be the end result of an attempt by the United States to isolate the Soviet Union.

Okies Wanted

BY SELDEN C. MENEFEE

FOUR or five years ago we used to cuss the 'Okies.' Now when we see one we feel like rushing up and throwing our arms around him." A Madera cotton rancher was speaking of the changed attitude in California toward the dust-bowl migrants who thronged into the state's farming areas from 1935 to 1939. His words indicated that the problem of California's farm labor supply was entering a new phase. First the Chinese, then the Japanese, the Mexicans, and finally our own refugees from the Plains States were successively welcomed into California, subjected to prejudice and discrimination when they came in too great numbers, and tolerated when they settled down to become a part of the community. Now a new cycle is beginning, as the growers are demanding that Mexican labor be admitted into the United States without restriction.

Madera, a town of 6,500 people in the heart of the rich San Joaquin Valley, has experienced all the stages. The Japanese have of course been removed—despite the outspoken sympathy of many Maderans for the American-born children of Japanese parents. The Mexicans form a permanent and growing section of the town, and in some classrooms their children actually outnumber those of the "Anglo-Americans." There is a growing colony of Negroes, attracted to California from Oklahoma, Texas, and nearby states by the relatively high wages and the comparative lack of racial discrimination in the West. And there are the dust-bowl refugees.

In 1938 and 1939 the migration of the so-called "Okies" into Madera reached its peak. They had been attracted by the large-scale employment of cotton pickers; half of Madera County's 100,000 irrigated acres being devoted to cotton. The county's cotton crop was worth nearly $4,000,000 in 1940 and furnished more than three-fourths of all seasonal farm employment.

The migrants usually ended up at Madera picking cotton after they had gathered other crops to the southward in the summer and early fall. Since little work could be found anywhere after the San Joaquin cotton crop was in—the citrus crop farther south offered employment to a relatively small number—thousands of these people remained in or around Madera. Relief and WPA reached a high point early in 1939, when 5,000 families were dependent on government aid, most of them "Okies" who had no work from December until April. Their children filled the schools, which were expanded in one district until classes were held in the school-bus garages and even in the janitor's home. Certain of the taxpayers felt resentful, but Madera, unlike some other Western communities, did not "take it out" on the children.

In the fall of 1939 the C. I. O. agricultural workers' union ("UCAPAWA") invaded Madera County, organized a large proportion of the cotton pickers in a local union, and staged a short-lived strike. The pickers had been getting 75 to 90 cents per hundredweight and hoped to raise the rate to $1.25 by united action. But they did not reckon with the stubbornness of the growers, who were accustomed to deciding the wage rate at their annual meetings. On October 21, 1939, a mob of 150 angry cotton farmers gathered outside the County Park, where the strikers were meeting, and ordered them to disperse. The strikers refused, and a pitched battle followed. Sheriff W. O. Justice and his men did not interfere, but state troopers ended the riot by using tear-gas bombs. The sheriff then said, "The situation appears to be well in hand, with both parties dispersed." This meant, of course, that the growers had achieved their purpose. "We are not exactly proud of that day's happenings," one Madera business man told me.

The strike was broken, and to this day the farm workers of Madera County remain unorganized. Hundreds of the former Okies have now settled down to live in Madera, most of them on one- or two-acre plots on the fringes of the town. Shrewd farmers subdivided large stretches of grain land worth $20 to $25 an acre and sold it to the migrants, without improvements of any sort, for $125 to $150 an acre. As they had time, the settlers dug wells, built small frame shacks to live in, and planted vegetables and flowers. An occasional family prospered, sent its children on to high school, and came to take an active part in the life of the community.

At least half of the immigrants of five years ago have now left Madera County. Some have gone to the San Francisco Bay region to work in the shipyards, which already employ 165,000 workers. After Pearl Harbor a few started back to their old homes to escape possible bombing attacks, but the extent of this movement has been greatly exaggerated. A much larger exodus began when nation-wide gas rationing was first announced, and thousands of Okies who had been unable to get their roots down into California's soil headed back eastward while they could.

The resulting acute labor shortage dismayed the growers and caused some of them to regret their former toughness. At their 1942 meeting they increased the rate for pickers to $1.50 a hundredweight, or nearly twice the official rate for 1938. Local growers raised this to $1.75 and $2, some paying as high as $2.25 for the clean-up. Since a good worker can pick from 200 to 300 pounds of cotton a day, this meant a relatively high wage. But still there wasn't enough labor.

In the fall the Madera County Defense Council took a hand in the matter. Craig Cunningham, secretary of both the Council and the Madera County Chamber of Commerce (which is closely allied with the Associated Farmers), organized a "Food for Victory" drive which did a good deal to save the crops. Leading citizens, including school principals, teachers, and the district attorney and his wife, went into the fields to pick cotton, grapes, and tomatoes. The schools, except for the primary grades, closed for two weeks so that the children could help. One group of thirty-five children, organized as a sort of shock troop, went twenty-six miles to a farm near Firebaugh and picked eighty-five tons of tomatoes which would otherwise have rotted in the field.

The children worked under the supervision of the teachers, who called roll and kept an account of their earnings. Within two weeks the supervisors learned that four hours in the field was the optimum working day for children. After that the schools were put on a half-day basis, adjourning at noon so that the pupils could spend afternoons in the fields. The teachers saw to it that the proceeds went to the children themselves, not to their parents. As a result the 3,077 children who participated earned a total of $88,000, of which $74,000 was from cotton. They also enjoyed themselves, and their efforts saved nearly all of the cotton crop; only the clean-up was left to adults.

The situation next fall will be worse, not better, for farm workers are still leaving Madera. Moreover, some time this year the huge Friant Dam—fourth largest in the world, and second only to the Shasta Dam in the huge California Central Valley project—may be put in operation. Its prime purpose is to replenish the water supply in existing irrigated areas, not to reclaim new desert land. Madera gets only nine inches of rainfall a year, and deep wells dug for irrigation have lowered the water table until existing crop land is in danger. But when the dam and irrigation canals are finished, crops will be increased and more labor will be needed.

In 1943 Madera will again have to utilize school children and the rest of the community to get the crops in. The Chamber of Commerce and the Defense Council, however, are laying plans for the future. In the first place, they are supporting a move in the Legislature to modify the minimum 170-day school year, perhaps by giving credit for time spent in the field. This would undermine the state's high educational standards, even if it were limited to "the duration," and is therefore meeting opposition.

The second plan of the Madera County growers is to break down federal restrictions on the importation of Mexicans. "We shall need 50,000 pickers, not the 3,000 we had last year," a representative of the growers told me. "The minimum wage of 35 cents is O. K.—we paid more than that last year. But we can't afford to put up a $100,000 bond, or to take a chance on being responsible for the Mexicans. Furthermore, we can't furnish them new houses, with hot and cold running water and the like, because we can't even get the materials."

Some modification of federal requirements may be necessary to meet changing conditions. But if California beet growers were able to comply with the basic stipulations and import 3,000 Mexicans, the well-organized cotton farmers should be able to do the same. Further steps are up to the War Manpower Commission. Freezing of farm labor in critical areas and raising of farm wages are clearly indicated.

Eventually, mechanization may solve the present shortage of cotton workers. In February the Madera News reported the arrival of a mechanical cotton-picker in the county. While one such machine could not handle more than 1,500 acres in a season, thirty or forty of them could pick virtually the entire crop. In view of the limitations on the manufacture of farm machinery, however, it is not likely that many can be obtained. Madera County will have to rely on community effort for the duration of the war.

Democrats Against the Party

BY JONATHAN FARMER

THE pouter-pigeon posturing of members of the new Congress is one of those comic performances to which this body periodically treats a tolerant public. Their shouts of "See how independent I am," "Watch me take my rightful place as a coordinate branch of the government," "Down with bureaucracy" are only revelations of the vanity which is the predominant trait of politicians who have been the beneficiaries of a popular vote. This exhibitionism is common enough and ordinarily harmless. It delights the exhibitor, amuses the cynical, and fools a certain number of impressionable or uninformed people. But in the present instance it bodes ill for the Democratic Party. From a national point of view it looks as if the dominant Democrats in Congress were laying the groundwork for a long stay in the wilderness.

This expectation is not based simply on the expressed determination of Congressmen to assert the rights and prerogatives of the legislative branch of the government. There is nothing ill-omened in that. A sense of responsibility on the part of members of Congress regarding its legislative function would be an asset to the party, just as the extra-legislative activities of special investigating committees have often been wholesome. Signs of a bleak future for the Democratic Party are found rather in the boasts of these exponents of Congressional independence about how they intend to exemplify it. Evidently they propose to undo, as far as they are able, everything that has made the Democratic Party triumphant, everything that has won for it the confidence of the people, during the past ten years.

This trust was reposed in the Democratic Party of the New Deal because it showed its devotion to the people's welfare as opposed to that of special interests and the privileged classes; because it placed human values above property values; because it recognized that the distress of citizens was a direct concern of their government. It lived up to its convictions by passing various temporary relief measures in the depression years and by setting up permanent agencies for the advancement of social justice and security. That these efforts were heartily approved by a great majority of the people was amply attested in three national elections.

Even if they are indifferent to the humane, progressive, and just achievements of the New Deal, politicians might be expected to support a program which has proved so popular, and to be influenced by the purely practical consideration that a policy which landed them in office and kept them there was a good thing to cling to. That, indeed, was the case till lately. Democrats in name but not at heart supported the New Deal because they felt it meant their political life. But being by nature and conviction Tories and anti-social, they secretly waited for the day when it would be expedient to come out in their true colors. The gains made by the Republicans in the last Congressional elections have evidently convinced these lip-service Democrats that that day has arrived, and now we hear the Southern reactionaries babbling about doing away with this New Deal measure or crippling that one. Moves have already been made by them, or by others with their concurrence, to emasculate the Wagner Act, to abolish the Farm Security Administration, to weaken or nullify the Securities and Exchange Commission, to do away with the National Youth Administration, and so on down the line.

Since this Bourbon Southern group is the dominating element in the Democratic Party in Congress, especially in the House, its ability to lead the party out of office is great. In the Seventy-seventh Congress there were 118 Democratic Representatives from 12 Southern states to 147 from other parts of the country, and 24 Democratic Senators from 12 Southern states to 41 from other states. In the present Seventy-eighth Congress the 12 Southern states have 111 of the 222 Democratic members of the House and 24 of the 57 Democratic members of the Senate. In both houses, therefore, the proportion of Southerners among the Democrats was greatly increased by the last election.

Because of the seniority rule and their generally continuous service Southerners hold the chairmanships of the most important committees. In the Senate "Cotton Ed" Smith heads the Committee on Agriculture; McKellar of Tennessee is next to the aged and ill Carter Glass of Virginia on the Committee on Appropriations; Bailey of North Carolina heads the Committee on Commerce; Reynolds of North Carolina, the Committee on Military Affairs; George of Georgia, on Finance; and Connally of Texas, on Foreign Relations. In the House the Speaker is Rayburn of Texas, and on the powerful Rules Committee, which dictates what legislation shall be considered, after the chairman stand Cox of Georgia, Smith of Virginia, Clark of North Carolina, and Dies of Texas. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency is Steagall of Alabama, and heading Judiciary and Military Affairs are, respectively, Sumners of Texas and May of Kentucky, as reactionary a pair of gentlemen as were ever returned from Pennsylvania or New Jersey by the Republicans.

What chance has a humane or enlightened proposal among primitives of the type of "Cotton Ed" Smith, McKellar, Reynolds, and Martin Dies? How far would a modern or progressive idea get among such fossils as Byrd of Virginia, Bailey of North Carolina, and Cox of Georgia? It would be unfair of course to lump together all Congressmen from the South as reactionaries. The South has sent a number of able and enlightened men to Congress. The weight of influence, however, is with the bourbon; the progressives shine as exceptions.

The Republicans, of course, are cheering the reactionary Democrats on and, when a close vote makes it necessary, giving them just the required length of rope with which to hang their party. It's smart politics. Since there is a nominal Democratic majority in both houses, the Democratic Party will be held responsible for everything this Congress does, no matter how the vote on the various bills is divided.

Perhaps this Southern bloc in the Democratic Party correctly diagnosed the last Congressional election as meaning that the country has gone, or is ready to go, reactionary. When Herbert Hoover can lift the lid of his political tomb and peer around, it is a sign that others also believe there is a trend "back to normalcy." But if these Dixie Democrats imagine that a country ready to turn its back on progress is going to select the Democratic Party to carry out its mandate, they are deceiving themselves. If the people decide they want that kind of government, they will demand the simon-pure article. They will not want masqueraders or turncoats.

Furthermore, the leaders of the Republican Party intend to see to it that such a demand, if it comes, shall be fully and squarely met. They will stand no liberal nonsense from those in its ranks who aspire to high honors. Just the other day when Governor Stassen of Minnesota, who has been mentioned in connection with the nomination for the Presidency, uttered some enlightened views about world affairs, he got a good dressing-down from members of his party in the House. Their remarks ran all the way from a pained "Oh, Harold, say it ain't so" to downright denunciation of him as "a stalking horse for the Democratic Party."

If the country wants Republican doctrine to prevail, it will call on the Republicans. And if the reactionary element now in the ascendancy in the Democratic Party in Congress carries out its loudly proclaimed intentions as to policy, the party may as well apply now for its discharge papers.

The situation was correctly described by Monsignor John A. Ryan of Washington in an address delivered at the convention of the American Catholic Sociological Society in Cleveland last December. His theme was labor, but what he said about the danger of labor's losing its gains applies with equal force to all social gains made since 1933.

If the Republicans elect their candidate for the Presidency in 1944 [said Dr. Ryan], and if they are able, with the assistance of Democratic reactionaries, to control both houses of Congress, the status and influence of organized labor, and therefore of the whole body of wage-earners, will undergo a disastrous decline. As a matter of fact, this combination of Republicans and reactionary Democrats already dominates the House of Representatives, that is, the body that was elected the third of last month. Except for two obstacles the most important recent gains of labor would all be swept away within the next six months. Those obstacles are the Senate and the President, and we cannot be too confident about the Senate. So long, however, as the present occupant of the White House remains there, no fears need be entertained for the cause of labor or the cause of social justice.

After the beginning of the year 1945 the situation may be disastrously different, and labor may face the imminent peril of losing all that it has gained through legislation since 1933.

Dr. Ryan's topic was labor and he stuck closely to it, but labor is not the only target of the reactionaries. In their hatred of the true democracy that would assure to every man a square deal before the law, equality of opportunity, economic protection, and social security, they propose to destroy all progress made in this direction during the tenure of the New Deal. Whether President Roosevelt and other sincerely progressive leaders will be able to remove this canker from their own party remains to be seen. There should be enough people in the country who still appreciate the benefits brought by the New Deal to prevent the debasement of the party and also, if they are efficiently organized, to save the nation from being plunged again into such an era of greed and ignorance as followed the First World War.

The Republicans have seemed to be able to elect almost anybody President—witness the 1920's. But the Democratic Party to be successful has always had to live up to its highest professions and put up a candidate of outstanding character and attainments. That is the simple explanation of why Roosevelt was chosen for a third term.

It is the considered opinion of informed and unprejudiced persons that President Roosevelt was wholly sincere in his declaration that he did not wish to run for a third term. Without attempting to excuse the blundering methods by which his nomination was brought about, these persons believe that the reason he did run for a third term was that he finally realized he must if the achievements of his two terms were to be preserved. According to this view, President Roosevelt did not imagine that he was the only one capable of carrying on the New Deal policies. He probably had men in mind whom he believed able to do so and withheld a definite statement on his own candidacy till the very last in the hope that one of them might show the popular strength required not only to obtain the nomination in the convention but also to win the election. The New Deal gains would not have been saved by the nomination of a candidate who, though able and well-disposed, could not carry the country.

No one can say whether a like situation will arise in 1944. Nor dare a prudent person predict what President Roosevelt's response to it would be. His enemies are already saying that if peace is not here by convention time next year, he and his friends will be stressing the necessity of his remaining in office till the war is successfully concluded.

All that lies in the future. The immediate task of President Roosevelt and of all loyal supporters of the democracy of the New Deal is to save the Democratic Party from the reactionary elements that are sabotaging it. Otherwise the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1944 and for many years thereafter will not be worth seeking.

Many years ago, when the animosities engendered by the Civil War were still alive and the Democratic Party had suffered a disastrous defeat in a national election, a leading Democratic newspaper vented its disappointment on its own party in an editorial which said: "The party is without a future and without a hope. The malediction of the war has palsied its brain. The curse of slavery has poisoned its blood and rotted its bone." Reversion to the archaic policies and antediluvian leadership of poll-tax Southerners can well do the trick again.

In the Wind

EDDIE RICKENBACKER is said to be stunned by the hostile reception labor has given his speeches, and his advisers are worried lest it hurt his standing as a hero. . . . Labor organizations are backing a tour by John Bartek, who was on that raft with Rickenbacker. Bartek is a union man and a sergeant in the army. He says Rickenbacker is a good man personally but all wrong on labor.

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY, after protests by the Amsterdam Star-News, a New York Negro newspaper, has agreed to stop calling one of its brands "Nigger Head."

FRENCH SAILORS from the warships being repaired here report that the Fighting French newspaper Pour la Victoire, published in New York, is verboden aboard ship.

AT BROTHERHOOD WEEK services in Christ Church Episcopal Cathedral in St. Louis recently, whites and Negroes sat unsegregated. No one was visibly perturbed by the arrangement.

NOT WITHOUT FRIENDS are the thirty-four men and women under indictment for conspiracy to undermine the morale of the armed forces. The Citizens' Civil Liberties Committee has just been formed for the express purpose of defending them. Margaret Easton, New York state secretary of the new organization, tells why in a letter to the New York Herald Tribune: "Because the American Civil Liberties Union, that great 'liberal' organization, so-called, has continually refused to come to the aid of these anti-Communist leaders . . . and because we strongly suspect that the American Newspaper Guild through its membership has in some manner silenced the press."

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER was recently quoted in the press as saying in a public speech, "Conservatives dream of hemming Russia in behind a barrier of dwarf states." People who heard the speech insist that he said "Catholic states."

FESTUNG EUROPA: To become ineligible for military service many Hungarian men are representing themselves as Jews. . . . All athletic competitions in Norway are supposed to be directed by Quisling's Sports Association, but the nation's leading skiers recently held a secret tournament and proclaimed a champion without benefit of Quisling. When the Nazis found out about it, they arrested twenty-five prominent skiers. . . . Under Nazi rule the treasury of the city of Utrecht has become so depleted that a tax has been levied on public notices in newspapers to meet "steadily increasing municipal expenses."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $3 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Report Out of Spain

II. Prisons and Prisoners

THE night Rodríguez Vega* arrived in New York we spent together. He had brought his story from Madrid, and he had to tell it to someone. It was a fresh, intact story; the weeks he had spent in Portugal were not part of it. It was as though he had left Madrid the day before and had landed in New York after a non-stop flight.

I let him talk for hours. During the brief week that he was in New York before leaving for Mexico, I saw him often, and he did the greatest part of the talking. In order to get his full impressions of three years of Franco Spain, one had to understand his state of mind. One had to allow him to draw out all the thoughts that had been accumulating for so long. Physically he was in New York. Spiritually he was still in the Cárcel Modelo, the main prison of Madrid. To follow his story, one had to place oneself in the atmosphere of the Madrid prison. For any Spaniard of my background that was not a difficult task. I was perfectly familiar with its corridors and its cells.

The first night that we met here my interruptions were confined to questions about some friend or comrade about whom there had been no exact information. "Shot." "Twenty years." "Still waiting for trial." He gave no details, but immediately went on with his tale. It was in this way that I was able to record the story of the Spanish prisons. I made many notes, and I am going to reproduce some of them here, as I took them.

Salvation by the Crimea: D. was fifty years old. Until the outbreak of the Spanish war he was a sereno, a night watchman in the streets of Madrid. He was of no party but was known for his Republican sympathies, and, after Franco took power, was denounced by some elderly spinster in his neighborhood as an anti-Jesuit and a man without God. During the war he had rendered minor services in the rear guard. His one distinguished action was his help in the arrest of some paqueadores, franc-tireurs who in a blackout sow the seeds of panic in the city. That deed gave him a moment of glory in the neighborhood. Now he was going to pay for it with his life. He had been sentenced, but others had been, too; weeks had elapsed, and he had not yet been dragged out to face the firing squad. It gave him time to hope for a miracle, a miracle which was to come from very far away. Every morning when he woke, his first question was "How are things going in the Crimea?" He was not an educated man. Of Russia he knew only that it had helped Spain during the war. But now he felt Russia as an ally. He had made up his mind that when the war on the eastern front was won, the Axis would be finished—and then he would escape execution. "Nowhere else," observed Vega, "do people follow the war as attentively as they do in the prisons of Spain. For many it means not only victory but the hope of coming back to life."

Searching for Garbage: Vega received extra food from the outside. For three years the prisons of Madrid have been the centers, the gathering places, of the democratic sympathies of the city. If someone is still in a position to save a little food, he sends it to the prisons, either to family or friends. It is a kind of permanent demonstration of solidarity. Vega's extra food came mostly in cans. He shared it with his cell-mate, but part of it spoiled quickly, and he threw it into the garbage pail. Immediately another prisoner grabbed it. Vega warned him that it was not to be eaten, that it might poison him. He promised him that the next time he received food he would share it with him. Useless. The other took the spoiled food into his corner and ate it. Bad or good, it was the first thing he had seen in months that looked like meat.

A Voice from Heaven: For many days a small typewritten paper circulated through the prison. It was very much worn with handling. But the prisoners touched it with great care. It was part of the text of a sermon by Father Hevia, Catholic priest of the prison of Alcalá de Henares, and it was a warm denunciation of the mass-murder carried out by the military court. "Despite the promises of generosity made by the authorities, many honest fathers of families are being shot. An atmosphere of hate is being created that will provoke tremendous reprisals afterward." The whole sermon revealed a profound concern for the consequences that the Franco repression will have for the Catholic church. The lower clergy, it is true, have been against so much shooting and are in great part hostile to the regime. Catholic youth was represented in the prison by boys from Acción Católica, arrested for distributing leaflets considered subversive. These boys did not restrain themselves when they talked with the Republicans in the prison. They openly condemned the Phalanx. All this is true. But it is no less true that all through these three years the Catholic hierarchy has been unreservedly identified with the Franco regime. Spanish prelates, so eager to denounce "red atrocities" during the war, have since its end tolerated the execution of thousands and thousands of men and women without uttering a single word of mercy. One day things may take an opposite turn, and the Republicans may again come to power in Spain. It will be difficult then to reestablish the respect of the people for a Catholic hierarchy which has behaved in this manner. That was the fear expressed by Father Hevia in the sermon circulated in the prison, injecting an amazing note into the flood of literature that was passed around.

* Secretary of the General Workers Union who escaped from Spain and came to the United States via Lisbon. He is now in Mexico.

Beatings: Happily, T. is still alive. He has not been shot as was reported some time ago. But he had already endured his twentieth beating. He is a Socialist of fifteen years' association with the party. He has been in it practically since he was a boy. T. has tremendously broad shoulders that defy the brutality of the Phalangist gang. Vega saw him immediately after one of those beatings. He could hardly walk, but his voice and his eyes were as firm as ever. "If they believe that by breaking my bones they are going to obtain anything from me, they are silly, those boys," he said. He remained in a corner of his cell, taking no food for many days. The idea that he knows everything about the underground movement has saved him, until now, from being shot. Because of his extraordinary constitution he is, perhaps, the man who has survived more beatings than any other. For the rest, beating is daily fare in the Madrid prisons. In the handling of prisoners the influence of the Gestapo is very apparent. The Spanish police have adopted methods that were quite unknown in Spain before, and that can easily be attributed to Nazi Kultur. For instance, they beat prisoners in the presence of their families. Perhaps in a moment of breakdown the wife or the daughter may tell something—something which the prisoner has been stubborn enough to conceal. Vega tells of cases in which the judge and the attorney joined the police in beating the prisoners—a symbol of the high impartiality of Franco justice.

Singing in the Night: Larrañaga has been shot; so there is no need in his case to use initials to protect him. A Basque Communist, he escaped the fascists at the end of the Spanish war. He was safe in Central America when his party sent him to Spain to work in the underground and to help organize resistance in the eventuality of Franco's entrance into the war on the side of Hitler. With him was Dieguez, also a Communist and very active in Madrid organizations during the civil war. The two men had hardly landed in Lisbon when they were arrested by the police and delivered to Franco. The Christian dictatorship of Oliveira Salazar applies the droit d'asile in its own way. Every demand by Franco for extradition of Republicans who have succeeded in fleeing into Portugal is granted by the Portuguese government. In the case of Larrañaga and Dieguez, there had been no time for extradition. But the police, anticipating Madrid's wishes, hurried to turn over the two Spaniards to the Franco authorities. They were sentenced to death. All through the night before the execution Vega heard Larrañaga singing. From time to time he would call to Dieguez to join him: "Now you, Dieguez, let us see if you can beat this song." It was as though Larrañaga was afraid that Dieguez might fall asleep and that his silence would be interpreted as fear. Many prisoners, Vega says, have gone to face the firing squad singing. Usually they sing political songs, but some have sung flamenco. And there was one who, in order to irritate the Phalangist watchmen, went to his death singing the song of the Requetés—the rival faction in the present Franco regime and bitter enemy of the Phalanx. One night, when those who had been sentenced to death were singing, Vega heard one watchman say to another: "There is nothing to do. Those reds, they are not to be broken. To save the regime it would be necessary to shoot four-fifths of Spain. And I wonder. . . ."

Sentence Revised: Vicente Carrillo, Socialist mayor of El Escorial during the Spanish war, was condemned to thirty years in prison. He would have been sentenced to death but most of the conservative people of the fashionable summer resort interceded for him with the court. He went to prison. The local Phalanx protested. They demanded a retrial. Carrillo's case came up again before a military court. This time he was sentenced to death—and shot. Surely the counsel for the defense, appointed by the court, was at a disadvantage. Not only was he confronted with the farcical reality of fascist "justice." He was also overworked. Franco's murder machine worked fast, especially in the early days of the regime, and Vega reports that a single public defender prepared the cases of twenty-seven political offenders in half an hour. Most of them were sentenced to death.

The Unfinished Toy: Vega said to me, "If one day I should write the story of the Spanish prisons during these past three years, one of the chapters will carry the title 'The Unfinished Toy.' I shall leave the subject to Vega, but I cannot resist saying a word about it. In the gallery for those sentenced to death the prisoners kill time—sometimes weeks and months of it—by carving little wooden toys. They are sold outside the prison and often help the men to secure an extra ration of food. But those prisoners who have children always keep the best ones for them. There have been many cases when, in the midst of making a toy, a prisoner has been called to be executed. Before he goes, he gives the toy to another prisoner who sets to work on it so that he may send it to the child of his friend. In one case, the second prisoner was executed before he could finish the toy. It was passed on to a third. Three men shot—and a little wooden toy as a souvenir of the most cruel period in the history of the Spanish nation. A. DEL V.

[The first part of this article, Politics and War, was published in The Nation on March 6.]

Something to Fight for

BY JACK GERBER

DO you know what Europeans are hearing about us—us people of the United Nations? Here's an example. If you had been a European listening to your radio the day after Henry Wallace made his Delaware, Ohio, speech, you would have heard:

The differences of opinion which divide the Anglo-Saxon plutocrats and the Bolsheviks are most conspicuous when Washington or London or Moscow begins to scheme for the future. Their points of view are as far apart as the poles, not only in the ideological field but also as regards practical political problems. Confirmation of this delightful state of affairs was given by Mr. Henry Wallace, the American Vice-President, who has lamented that should no agreement be reached between the Anglo-Saxon plutocratic powers and Red Moscow at the end of the war, a third war would be inevitable.

If you had been a European listening to your radio during the recent border discussions between the Polish government-in-exile and the Soviet Union, you would have heard:

The Soviet terrorists have aspirations for Finland and Poland, and also the Soviets want to gain access to the Atlantic, either through the northern regions of Europe or across the Mediterranean.

Or suppose you had been listening to your radio in Europe while the necessity for post-war maintenance of naval and air bases was being discussed in the United States. This is what you would have heard:

According to Colonel Knox's wallings over the territories which the United States wants for naval bases, it is obvious that the United States is plotting to grab naval and air bases all over the world.

All the foregoing quotations are taken verbatim from German broadcasts directed to Europe and recorded in New York at the CBS short-wave listening station.

It is difficult for an American, used to free discussion of all sides of a question, to imagine Europe's intellectual isolation. Radios in every home and loud speakers in every public place tell just one story. The newspapers repeat it. At the present moment it is the story of Axis solidarity versus United Nations disunity.

Let us assume that you are a Little Man in Europe. You work in a factory under the eye of the Gestapo. When you get home at night you are desperately tired and you don't get much to eat. You blame your condition on the Nazis, and your only hope lies with the United Nations. But day after day you have drummed into you this story of United Nations disunity, imperialism, greed. You don't want to believe Nazi propaganda, but since you hear nothing else doubts are beginning to form in your mind. So you work up the courage, and the energy, to sneak out after dark to the house of a friend who has one of the few short-wave radios left. Blinds drawn, you and your friend listen to New York or London, hoping for words telling you that the Nazis lie, that the United Nations plan to build the kind of world you want to live in.

But you hear only generalities. You go home with the impression that the United Nations are going to win, but asking yourself: "After the United Nations win, will they merely haggle over the spoils; start the old imperialist game all over again? Is this worth risking my life for—now?"

The United Nations have little to say about their post-war plans because those plans are still hazy. It is false to assume that the Nazis tell nothing but lies. Dr. Goebbels's use of the repeated big lie is powerful propaganda, but more powerful is his use of the quasi-truth. The impression of United Nations disunity that Europe's Little Man is getting from Dr. Goebbels's propaganda is false, but it is based on the truth that we disagree on the shape of the post-war world. The distinction between disunity and disagreement is not one easily understood by a person whose mind has been perverted with distortions of the facts.

Where do we stand on the question of policing the world; by whom shall it be done, if by anyone? Where do we stand on the question of post-war boundaries? Where do we stand on the question of post-war trade? We have disagreed on these vital subjects and on many others; we have publicly argued about them in loud voices, and our disagreement has seemed to Europe's Little Man like disunity. We have not resolved our disagreements; so Europe's Little Man doesn't know what we want him to fight for—now.

It is no answer to say we should speak more quietly about our disagreements, or remain silent about them. Very rightly, millions of people in the United Nations are discussing them now, but too few of our elected leaders seem to be pointing the way to resolution. The six Senators who proposed Congressional action committing the United States to a share in planning and maintaining the peace have a hard fight ahead of them. If their proposal succeeds, they will have gone far to reassure Europe's Little Man and disconcert the Nazis. If it fails, the Nazis will be able to proclaim that the Atlantic Charter, vague as it is, is only an executive statement which has been refused Congressional sanction.

We may assume that Roosevelt and Churchill decided at their Casablanca conference to open a second front this year. The second front is going to require all the help we can get from inside Europe. A unified, official United Nations post-war plan, which can only be drawn up in a conference of the leaders of the United Nations, will recruit to our side the divisions that may be decisive in winning the Battle for Europe.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE Völkischer Beobachter reported on February 25:

Recently an unscrupulous business man who had been selling meat surreptitiously was sentenced to death by the Darmstadt court. This will serve as a warning to all who were toying with the same idea.

As you see, the risks of operating on the black market in meat are much greater in Germany than in the United States. Nevertheless, not even the scaffold, plus German "organization," plus dictatorship, plus three and a half years of rationing, have been able to prevent it entirely. Nor does its volume seem to be insignificant. The National-Zeitung of Essen carried this item on February 13:

Richard Kuhl, a butcher of Delitsch, was sentenced to death by the Halle Special Court for secretly slaughtering 100 pigs, 51 head of cattle, 115 calves, and 48 sheep.

A fair achievement for a single butcher.

Day in and day out it is hammered into the German people that the era of privileges for the well-to-do is past. The most touted of the virtues of the new "total mobilization" is the fact that it affects everybody, without discrimination.

The English will certainly say that it applies only to the common people and not to the rich. Do not believe them. There will be no more discrimination. No one will have a right to think that more is demanded of him than of another [Neues Wiener Tageblatt of February 21].

Such statements may be propaganda, but to take them for merely propaganda would be completely to misunderstand the German situation. On February 21 the Völkischer Beobachter printed an article entitled Education of Employers which reminds us of a little-known fact, though it is not anything new.

Not a majority but a considerable proportion of managers and the like wrongly think that increases in salary may still be demanded. Otherwise the Labor Commissioner's office would not receive so many applications for higher pay. The added burden the war has placed on managers in no way justifies a larger salary. Even if the manager of another firm, in a similar position, receives more, that does not justify the demand. If an engineer or an accountant is appointed manager, his right to an increase cannot be denied. But when the manager of an enterprise employing only eight persons thinks he is entitled to 11,000 marks [about $4,200] a year and makes a long journey to Berlin, taking up valuable space in trains and hotels, simply to obtain this increase, he is going contrary to the restrictions that are necessary at this time.

The interesting point here is that the income of a German employer is fixed by the state. Although nominally he has the profits of his own business, de facto he can take out only as much as the authorities permit.

The Gauleiter of the South German province of Franconia called together on February 11 the restaurant proprietors of Nürnberg, the capital city, and instructed them on their duty to the Fatherland. One of the points he emphasized was that they must frequently turn on the radio and let their guests listen. He said further, according to the account in the Fränkische Tagespost:

Restaurant keepers must consider themselves sentries for Germany. Therefore they must not allow guests in their establishments to engage in defeatist talk. They must report such persons to the police. . . . They must exercise especial watchfulness over persons who assert that they are good Germans but opponents of National Socialism. Every opponent of the party is an enemy of Germany.

News of the widespread defeatism in Germany leaks out also from other sources. In the North German province of East Prussia, the Königsberger Allgemeine Zeitung complained on February 12:

Nothing so oppresses German spirits as the memory of the unfortunate outcome of the First World War. The British have brought it about that many of the faint-hearted are troubled by the slogan "We shall destroy ourselves with victories." This fatally false conception dampens all joyful satisfaction in our great successes and seems to be insidiously confirmed by every unavoidable setback. The briefest reflection would supply these faint-hearted ones with a moral lesson. But faint-heartedness stifles all reason.

The same theme was discussed from a different angle by a Württemberg paper, the Alemanne. This paper attacked "objectivity."

Who does not know [it said] the presumptuous prattlers who, in this difficult time, undisturbed by the actual facts, express their "objective" views? Who does not know those impudent fellows who, whenever a word is uttered against our enemy, reply, "But they too are human beings"? They even try to justify on military grounds the criminal English air attacks on German women and children—for one must be "objective." They are the people who regret that the German newspapers and radio do not regale them with the so-called English, American, and Russian army communiqués, so that they might form an "objective" picture of the situation. They would like to have the German press sacrifice its precious space and set before them for breakfast Churchill's and Roosevelt's lying propaganda speeches. They think anyone is a hero for truth who, in spite of warnings and punishments, listens to a foreign radio. Yet that is precisely one of the most unhealthy occupations. Instead of bringing one nearer to the truth, it leads into a thicket from which the most practiced and experienced persons struggle out with shattered nerves. Regardless of the fact that a listener risks his head, let everyone be warned: keep fingers and ears away from such sources of knowledge.

Objectivity in any form is assailed at every opportunity. The German public, the Völkischer Beobachter discovered, liked the British General Montgomery far too well. So Hitler's own paper quoted him as saying, "Now is the time to drive the Boches out of Africa," but it translated the untranslatable French word Boches, quite falsely, as "German pigs." That showed how mistaken was any friendly feeling toward Montgomery.

Just as they laid the declaration of war at the Führer's door after he had worked for peace for six years [it went on] they now call us pigs to our face. From now on we must lay aside our peaceableness and the upright generosity we have always practiced. It will be hard for us, because we like to feel amiable and mild. They changed all that for us when they made us realize that Montgomery and Giraud think of us as "pigs." Let there be hatred, hatred, and again hatred! Remember, Montgomery called us "German pigs."

File and Remember

Berlin Reads the "Spectator"

ACCORDING to an English weekly, the Spectator, in its issue of February 12, there is no difference between Russian communism—as the Spectator calls it, or bolshevism, as I call it—and British capitalism, or plutocracy as one might say. "Even if such differences," says the Spectator, "had existed at the beginning of the war, they no longer do so now." —WILLIAM RODERICK DIETZE from Berlin (CBS short wave).

The contrast between Russian communism and British capitalism is not the last word in definition and distinction. Even if it were so when this war began, it is certainly not so today. Russia, after her revolution, went through a stage of fierce evangelism, but that was profoundly modified when, in 1927, Stalin established his thesis that a Communist Russia could exist in a capitalist world, and Trotsky, who held the contrary, went into exile. Too much emphasis can be laid on what is commonly called ideology. The Russian soldier today is fighting more for the Russia he loves than for any economic doctrine, though there is no doubt that the change in the individual's economic status has given him a new sense of, and pride in, citizenship. Emphasis on ideology indeed helps no one in this connection. Cooperation, free and unreserved and based on mutual trust, between Britain and Russia will be vital to the stability of Europe in the post-war period, but that is not going to be achieved by any shortsighted attempt to make Britain conform politically or in any other way to the pattern of Russia, or Russia to the pattern of Britain. Each country has its individuality and is the better for it.—The Spectator (London), February 12, 1943.

To Be or Not to Be

"All of you, men and women, without any exception must have but one thought: that this war decides whether our nation is to be or not to be."—Hitler, November 8, 1942.

You will fight in the marshes of Poland,
You will fight on the great German plain,
You will fight in the forests of Russia,
You will fight on the hillsides of Spain,
You will fight in the streets and the airfields,
Our Lebensraum you will defend,
If our frontiers are crossed, State and Party are lost
So you will hang on to the end.
The question is—to be or not to be?

For you as definitely as for me.
Your whole existence hangs upon this war,
So oder so! otherwise, either . . . or . . .
Either my military intuition
Secures your territorial ambition,
Seen in the greatest conquests of all time,
Or, felled by reptiles of the Russian slime,
Crushed in the pincers of the Allied drive,
No virile German will be left alive,
Ja, Volksgenossen, you will not escape,
Chains, slavery, extortion, murder, rape.
Bolshevik hordes, despite annihilation,
Propose your national extermination,
For German, Austrian, worker, townsman, peasant,
Disaster will be equally unpleasant,
No need another "Fourteen Points" to wait,
The least of you will share your Leader's fate.
Either I win, or else, you may rely on it,
As you have made your bed, so you must die on it . . .
Eternal triumph, or complete shipwreck,
You are all in it, right up to the neck.
My vast, decisive stroke has been prepared,
Stalingrad's fall has been by me declared.
I give in war, whatever be its length,
My infinitely radiating strength,
I personally take upon my shoulders
The winter hardships of my million soldiers.
Our foes their Teufelsplan already make
Your manhood, my existence are at stake.
The home front is a battle theater, too
Where all must toil and sweat—and this means you.
The faintest sign of night-life or complacency
I warn you will almost exhaust my patience.
Our ally Italy is on the spot,
She also asks—is she to be or not?
My infinite decisions now I voice,
You must fight on, because you have no choice.
And this is my intuitive conclusion
Either World Order or complete confusion!
You are myself, I you; it is for us,
To drive the juggernaut, or miss the bus.
World Bolshevism or German Victory!
Not be, or be? to be or not to be?

—SAGITTARIUS in the New Statesman and Nation (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE CLICHE AND THE CLASSIC

BY IRWIN EDMAN

WHAT is a classic? The best that has been thought and said in the world. Best for whom, by whom judged the best? There is a criterion of the classic, more vulgar but none the less significant: persistence—in those pieces of prose and poetry, often fugitive, often widely misquoted and anonymous in the memories of a wide public. A candid anthology of what has survived in that miscellaneous encyclopedia of popular recollection would and should include things deeply beautiful and true, for these have also been popular. It would include, too, some of the persistent "classics" which have survived because for one reason or another they have about them a gleam of false gold. They immortalize platitudes, eternalize the obvious in humor and the maudlin in sentiment. They are the cheap luxuries of the poor in spirit, and are dear to our hearts as the scenes of our childhood. Many of them were first learned in childhood, and merely seeing them on the printed page recalls the very smell of the freshly washed schoolroom floor in which we first heard them, or the days of some August of our adolescence when we were first greatly moved by them. Our tastes are formed, it has been suggested, by our first masters and our first loves. "A Treasury of the Familiar"* should include naturally passages of prose and poetry connected with both. Such an anthology as that before us does a very good job indeed. It is a rich goulash of the beautiful and the banal.

Two-thirds of it consists of the immortal third-rate. The paradox remains why so much that is clearly cheap, limp in expression, flaccid in feeling, cliché in thought, should survive. There is Kipling's "If" along with the "Ode to a Grecian Urn." Granted the purpose of the anthology, they belong here. For both are familiar and both have for generations brought tears to the eyes, sometimes to the same people, though at different stages in the history of their tastes.

Here, on two facing pages, are "Home Sweet Home" and Prospero's "We are such stuff as dreams are made on." On opposite pages, too, are the parable of the rich man and the kingdom of heaven, and "The Village Blacksmith." Wordsworth's "Ode on Intimations of Immortality in Early Childhood" is followed by Admiral Nelson's "I owe all my success in life to having always been a quarter of an hour beforehand." Thoreau's account of his going to live in the woods is followed by "Casey Jones." "The Man Who Broke the Bank at Monte Carlo" is followed by Clough's "Say Not the Struggle Naught Availeth." Housman's "Wake, the Silver Dust Returning" stares across the page at "Heaven Will Protect the Working Girl."

There is, I think, one curious consistent contrast in familiarity between the really classic passages, the great poetry, and the merely sentimentally persistent. Who besides John Kieran—who writes the Introduction—knows who wrote

"Little drops of water, little grains of sand"? I confess Julia Carney was news to me. Who wrote the Boy Scout oath? Even the editor does not tell us. Or "The Face on the Bar-Room Floor," whose title, by the way, is here given—I take it correctly—as "The Face on the Floor." Everyone who knows the "Ode to a Grecian Urn" knows who wrote it. "My Heart Leaps Up When I Behold" reminds everyone of Wordsworth. What explains the rapid anonymity of the universally known second- or third-rate? I can only guess, and I suspect that it is because the cliché and the stale sentiment seem like something everyone has said and might have said. They need no author because it is the mediocrity in each of us that speaks.

As one browses through these pages, other questions arise. What are the themes that animate most of the famous second-rate stuff in a volume such as this? What are the household words, and what are they about? This is a book of American household words, that is, of song and story and phrase familiar in the memories and in the mouths of Americans from their earliest childhood, the verses they were asked to recite at school, or the sentiments they early saw engraved on parlor walls or on pin cushions or on the stationery of business men's clubs.

Oh promise me that some day you and I
Will take our love together to some sky.

That sentiment, from "Robin Hood" (words by Clement Scott), animates how much of the popular song and popular story in this republic! Two hearts beating as one and beating their way to

No love less perfect than a life with thee,
O promise me, O promise me.

Omar Khayyam, also in this book because equally familiar, has in Fitzgerald's translation something to say more succinctly along the same lines. Love without lack and courage without doubt are beloved themes. "If you can be a man when all about you. . . ." "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again." "Lives of great men all remind us we can make our lives sublime." And nostalgic retrospect: "Sad memory, bring the light of other days around me." "Ah, that thou couldst know the joy, Ere it passes, barefoot boy." And filial affection: "Who fed me from her gentle breast, And hushed me in her arms to rest, And on my cheek sweet kisses prest? My mother." And the human touch: "And we find at the end of a perfect day the soul of a friend we've made." And the perpetual note of pathos creeping: "And one by one we must all march through the narrow aisle of pain."

H. L. Mencken used to remind us of the width of the Bible belt in this country. Browsing through this book, the reader will be not altogether surprised that half the misquotations epidemic in the country came from the Bible. There are, perhaps not surprisingly, about thirty quotations from Shakespeare. What is surprising is not that passages from Shakespeare should be so widely familiar but that nearly all the quotations here are from plays seldom studied in school. They are mostly from plays not even frequently acted, nor perhaps frequently read. But the passages quoted are none the less household words. The compiler of this hospitable volume is a one-man Gallup poll of taste in America. For it appears he did not compile what he thought other people liked but, from a long life of clipping collecting, pasted what he liked himself. If familiarity is a criterion, his taste is, I think, flawless. I suspect no one who has grown up in this country will find any surprise in the book, except to find all these things in one volume. And if this book contains the standard objects of popular taste in this country, what is one to say of that taste? Possibly that the heart of the country is sound, possibly that it is soft, possibly both. Clearly, as a people we love love and courage, we deplore the passing of youth, we praise God and pass the ammunition. We like our mothers; we cherish liberty and a house by the side of the road. Our favorite sentiments may be expressed with beauty, distinction, and dignity, or truth, by God or Lincoln or Shakespeare. They may be expressed tawdrily by Robert W. Service, or Ella Wheeler's "Laugh and the world laughs with you," with which the book begins. But apparently we care more about the theme than the manner. No one could accuse us of being precious or metaphysical if this Treasury of the Familiar is an index of our tastes or our lives. One finds no T. S. Eliot, and only one passage from Donne and that the passage made famous only recently by the he-man, Hemingway, who writes of Spain or anything else as others write of the West where men are men.

* "A Treasury of the Familiar." Edited by Ralph L. Woods. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Tolstoy once held that one should make the common man the judge of art and literature. Well, the common man in America, judging by what he remembers, has a pretty catholic taste. So long as it is sweet or noble or sad, or strong or cozy or optimistic, he'll read it and like it and take it to his remembering heart. And if it's Keats or Shakespeare, that's so much velvet. But Julia Carney is all right, too; her heart's in the right place and her words are on the tablets of our memory, even if her name is in oblivion. If it is doubt or perplexity we wish rather than comfort, if we seek not the simple "verities" but the complexities of truth, we must look elsewhere, among the saints and thinkers in their solitudes, not in the family circle of literature.

Spain Under Franco

APPEASEMENT'S CHILD: THE FRANCO REGIME IN SPAIN. By Thomas J. Hamilton. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE American expeditionary force under General Eisenhower started to land in North Africa on November 8, 1942. The Spanish Republican government in Madrid and its anti-fascist officials in Spanish Morocco were overjoyed. I mean—suppose this had been so. Suppose the American, British, and French governments and the Catholic church had not helped to kill the Spanish Republic. Eisenhower could now be fighting Rommel in Tunisia with the considerable forces he is wasting to guard the borders of Spanish Morocco against a possible Nazi-Franco attack. But what is the use of supposing? If the democracies had been wise, this whole World War might have been prevented, or at least postponed. As Thomas J. Hamilton, the author of this timely book, points out, Spain was the first battle of the present war. But blind statesmen do not win battles. So we lost this one. We started with that and other handicaps and are paying for them today.

Mr. Hamilton went to Spain in August, 1939—five months after the end of the civil war—as regular correspondent of the New York Times. He stayed for two years, then went to Chile, where he observed how Franco and the Spanish fascist Falangist Party sabotaged the cause of the democracies in Latin America. Mr. Hamilton has a keen eye and a sharp, able pen, and his character can be read between the lines. He has many principles and scruples, and he abhors dishonesty, double standards, corruption, and fascists. When he doesn't know he says so, and when he is merely giving his opinion he tags it as such. Consequently, when he states a fact as a definite fact I feel we are safe in trusting him. Now and then a pro-Franco partisan took him for an informational ride and told him what happened during the war against the Republican government. But this apart, and it is confined to a few paragraphs, the volume conveys Mr. Hamilton's personal observations and researches in the Spain which Franco conquered with the aid of Hitler, Mussolini, Chamberlain, Daladier, the Pope, and our own government.

Mr. Hamilton's report on conditions in Spain is harrowing. Although he found the destruction from the war less than he had expected—this was very instructive to me who had been in Spain during the war—the ruins are still there. Five years after Irun was destroyed in the 1936 fighting, "the work of rebuilding the town had not even started." This is typical. But not only has there been no reconstruction, there has been further deterioration since the war. Spain's excellent system of highways, Mr. Hamilton states, "has deteriorated considerably since peace came." In general, the "situation in Spain has steadily gone from bad to worse since the end of the civil war. Both material conditions and the morale of the people were worse in 1940 than they had been in 1939, and worse in 1941 than they had been in 1940, and worse now than they were a year ago." Spain is "a starving country." Worse: "in few countries of the world is there such a grinding, soul-destroying hunger and such luxury for the favored of fortune." "A Dante," he says, "would be needed to describe the hunger of the Madrid poor, living in wretched hovels . . . and not even soap with which to wash themselves." But later Mr. Hamilton and his wife "discovered that Madrid was a land of milk and honey by comparison with the incredible misery of Andalusia," and elsewhere they saw the same "famine." In Seville "the animation and gaiety . . . was gone." Even in food-growing villages "children with emaciated limbs and faces like skulls gathered around the car." As a result, according to the estimate of the head of the Spanish public service, "the death rate in 1941 was double what it had been before the civil war." That is probably why some reactionaries thought Spain needed Franco.

Franco's most fiendish crime is this: his "regime has set itself the task of keeping alive the hatred inherited from the civil war." "Seldom in history," Hamilton writes, "has a government so deliberately set out to infuriate the conquered." The conquered are the Spanish people. Most of the intellectuals of Spain, Hamilton declares, are "dead or in prison or in exile." He describes a meeting at which one young Spaniard dared to suggest that the past ought to be forgotten. "Every speaker attacked this proposal as a Communist device. . . ." After the fall of France thousands of Spaniards who had fled to France when Catalonia fell returned to Spain. "Many of these were imprisoned as soon as they came back, however, and few of the remainder were permitted to work," although Spain has been suffering from "a serious shortage of labor." Furthermore, "publications in either Catalan or Basque have been forbidden. Neither language [the language of millions, L. F.] is taught in the schools or used in the courts; priests are even forbidden to conduct services in the local language" in Catalonia and the Basque land. As a typical crime against the Franco regime, Hamilton cites a husband and wife who gave their children Basque names and talked Basque to them. "They were condemned in absentia to the loss of half their property." In addition to this perversity and political illiteracy on the part of Franco, "the incorrigible inefficiency of the Franco regime also has delayed recovery." Hamilton cites numerous concrete examples.

But let no man imagine that there are no compensations for the Spanish people; all this misery and woe has a brighter side. Franco's victories have brought great reforms in Spain: "divorce has been abolished," and so has civil marriage for Catholics. The Jesuits have returned and regained their "huge property holdings." Religious instruction has become "compulsory in state schools." King Alfonso, now dead, "got back his estates," and so did all the grandes and landlords. Teaching of contraceptive methods has been forbidden. Bathing suits must be worn longer. In other words, the civil war was worth the cost. Nevertheless, Mr. Hamilton reveals that "disillusionment with the results of the war was general" among Republicans as well as the Franco usurpers, and the latter "were beginning to feel that their sacrifices had been in vain and that Spain was worse off than she had been when the war began." Franco himself lives in the Pardo palace near Madrid; "his isolation there approaches that of the Grand Lama." He ventures out only under the heaviest guard.

The author feels that "the day of reckoning is inevitable." The population waits "for the day of revenge." Franco's regime, "despite its iron suppression of opposition, probably has been less popular than any other in the world today." Why? "The inherent cause of Spain's misery lies within the Franco regime itself." Franco has not won. He is merely in power, placed there by Hitler and Mussolini and the appeasing democracies. Within the regime there is "continuous wrangling." The Falanx is split within itself; the Catholic church has "a fascist wing"—which is surprising; Franco and Serrano Suñer and their respective partisans feud incessantly, and there is no peace or unity or plan or logic or sense of benefit in this governing group of murderers who waded into office through the blood of a million Spaniards. Let the foreign friends of Franco read this book and weep. They made him.

At home Franco has converted nobody; "the same people who fought Franco and Hitler for nearly three years are ready to do so again if only they are assured that they will obtain a democratic government as a reward for renewing the battle against fascism." Mr. Hamilton, oddly enough, thinks that the United Nations ought to give such assurances to the Spanish nation. Instead, Sir Samuel Hoare and Carlton Hayes, the British and American ambassadors in Madrid, have assured Franco that the democracies mean him no harm and that he could remain dictator if we won the war. As Hamilton shows, Franco rewards us with an energetic movement of his thumb to his nose and then relapses into his normal state of lethargy.

All this is the background against which Mr. Hamilton paints a careful, detailed picture of the battle that has been going on to get Spain into the war and to keep it out. I think Mr. Hamilton makes a good case against the Anglo-American policy of appeasing Franco now; he believes it does not alter the situation and only helps the fascists. The book contains many important historical facts on the Axis attitude toward Franco's participation in this war and the reasons Spain remains in a condition of suspended neutrality. It also contains good advice to our State Department, as well as sober and calm and therefore very telling criticism of the department's dealings with Franco.

Some of Mr. Hamilton's most valuable statements are those which throw light on Hitler's political and military strategy. Spain was a good vantage-point from which to see that.

LOUIS FISCHER

The Honest Man . . .

ANDRE GIDE AND THE CRISIS OF MODERN THOUGHT. By Klaus Mann. Creative Age Press. $3.

THE crisis which Gide's life and work epitomize has to do with the conflict between the individual and society. What happens to the honest man in civilized society?—that is the grand question. Somewhere the author quotes Emerson: "Society is everywhere in conspiracy against the manhood of every one of its members." Usually the man of genius begins as rebel; it is not always that, like Gide, Whitman, and others, he ends with acceptance. The frail ones are often crushed en route—maimed, blighted, scrapped on the dung heap. Yet in all of them, as Gide poignantly reiterates, was the desire to serve the community. But communities are not yet organized that permit this highest form of service. The true individual is harassed and persecuted everywhere, now as yesterday, and tomorrow doubtless as today, not only in the lands of our enemies but here at home in our midst. That is the cardinal fact, the ineluctable truth, which stares us in the face, today more than ever. André Gide was of tough fiber; he survived the ordeal. One wonders what would have happened to him had he been born in England, Soviet Russia, or America? One wonders what would happen to Thoreau, Whitman, Emerson were they alive today and still filled with truth.

One of the most interesting things about Gide's life is the wide circle of friends that surrounds him. What an illustrious list of names scattered throughout the pages of this book! Decadent France! What a privilege to have been born there, to have had in the space of one lifetime such friends—or enemies!—as Maeterlinck, Valéry, Proust, Peguy, Curtius, Bernanos, Daudet, Maritain, Wilde, d'Annunzio, Roger Martin du Gard, Bergson, Henry James, Anatole France, Rilke, Copeau, Rivière, von Hofmannsthal, to mention just a few. There are some names, such as Céline, Picasso, Cocteau, Aragon, Raimu, Breton, whom the author deals with slightly, contemptuously, even vituperatively—yet if we in America had produced only these six how incomparably richer would our lives have been! In Gide's life there was, apparently, room for all. His antithesis, the lifelong friend who was his most persistent and inveterate enemy, is Paul Claudel. Interesting commentary on friendship. Only a man of the utmost integrity could retain such a mixed coterie of friends, admirers, detractors, and enemies. It is this man who says, "Isn't it curious, this need to search for vile reasons for other people's opinions?"

A line from Baudelaire, a line which we are informed meant much to Gide, gives the clue to his particular caliber of honesty: "There are in every man, in every moment, two simultaneous tendencies—one toward God, the other toward Satan." (It is Gide who stresses the "simultaneous.") Toward the end of the book, commenting on the world débacle, Mann gives a long citation which is worth the strictest attention. "Why not admit it?" says Gide. "I too have sinned and have contributed my bit to the general disarray." "How is it possible," he queries, "to ignore the sinister qualities of modern man, after the bold and tragic revelations of Rimbaud and Dostoevski, Stendhal and Nietzsche, Flaubert and Baudelaire, Tolstoy and Kierkegaard? How could we indulge in euphemisms about man's intrinsic goodness and simplicity, in view of their cruel and admirable truthfulness?"

One of the saddest episodes in this rich life is Gide's adventure into communism. What irony that his "Back from the U. S. R. R." should have been his first best-seller! (Whereas the "Nourritures Terrestres" sold only 500 copies in twenty years!) Fiasco though it was, this endeavor to serve the cause, Gide does not emerge a ridiculous figure. Again his honesty and integrity save him. It is the others, those on both sides who wished to exploit him, that appear ridiculous. Gide simply avows that he made a mistake, that he had been drawn into the political inferno because the creative demon had temporarily deserted him. He does not lose his faith in man, in man's ability to improve. Toward the close of his career he reaffirms, in effect, what he said earlier in his life, that "it is here and now that we experience the real thing, the eternal life." To the younger generation he says: "If you drift or slip, don't think that everything goes downhill from now on. Life travels upward in spirals." His last message is full of calm and cheer. In part it resembles the language of Buddha himself. "Never cease to believe that it could be richer and finer—your life, and the lives of your fellow-men. Take nothing for granted! Question everything! . . . Some day you will understand that it is man—not God—whom we should blame for the disarray of our worldly affairs. From that day on you will no longer acquiesce in evil."

There is one baffling gap in Mann's account of Gide, and that is the subject of his love life. We have almost nothing on this, Mann points out, from Gide's pen. Though it was Gide himself who said that the imperative of the artist is to "communicate frankly what one may have found out about

YOU'LL WANT TO READ

freedom

A quarterly commentary on all aspects of liberty

PRYNS HOPKINS, Editor

Consistently fine articles by top-notch writers on all phases of freedom—genetic, aesthetic, psychological, industrial, political and intellectual.

SUBSCRIBE NOW

Single Copies 25 Cents 1375 S. Oak Knoll Avenue
By Subscription Dept. TN,
Twelve Issues: $2.00 Pasadena California

Just Off the Press!

GBM CURRENTS FOR SPRING listing "WE MODERNS" in Literature, Surrealism, Art, Theatre and Film; also many items reduced for clearance.

Appointed Agents for:

DYN—The Review of Modern Art published in Mexico	$1.00
TRIPLE V—Plastic Arts, Anthropology, Poetry, etc. Special double number edited by André Breton and Max Ernst	$2.00
VIEW—The Modern Magazine of the Arts	$1.50
HORIZON—The best "Little Mag." out of London	$2.50
LIFE AND LETTERS TO-DAY, edited by Robert Herring—Elizabethan issue. $.35; back issues at	$.25
CHIMERA—No. 2 best issue yet	$.50
POETRY OF LONDON—No. 7, with contributions by George Barker, Alex Comfort, Lawrence Durrell and others. $50. Also back issues including the best of "We Moderns" at	$.25
Accent, Crescendo, Canyon Review, Partisan Review, Poetry Chapbook, Townsman and other American and Foreign "Little Mags." Complete runs of Brief Lives and dead "Little Mags." including TRANSMISSION, MOUND AND MORN, PAGANY, BROOM and others.
WE MODERNS—Index to Living Literature	$.50
CATALOGUE ON FILM, ART, FIRST EDITIONS, CARTOONS AND CARICATURES—FREE ON REQUEST.

Gotham Book Mart, 51 West 47th, N. Y. C.

For a Democratic Against a Reactionary Europe

FIRST PUBLIC FORUM

on the

REBUILDING OF EUROPE

Organized by the European Council of the

Free World Association

Assembly Hall, Hunter College
Park Avenue at 68th Street

Thursday, March 25, at 8:00 P.M.

Speakers:

Count Carlo Sforza	Nahum Goldman
J. Alvarez del Vayo	Vojta Benes
Henri Torres	Patricia Strauss
Rustem Vambery	Julius Deutsch

Charles Davila

William L. Shirer

Discussion from the floor will follow the speeches.

Admission, 50 cents (reserved seats) and 25 cents, at the FREE WORLD ASSOCIATION • 55 West 42nd Street or at the door on March 25th.

one's inmost conflicts and condition," there is in his writings, nevertheless, an amazing reserve and discretion. Even the results of the Algerian adventure remain obscure. It is stated by a friend that Gide had even more need of women than of men, but where is the naked, revelatory account of these relationships? Even his wife, Emmanuèle, remains a veiled figure. Was it pudeur that withheld him? Could he not even confide in his faithful, portly diary? One would like to know. It is a serious lacuna in the life of such an outstanding autobiographical artist.

HENRY MILLER

Philadelphia in Franklin's Time

REBELS AND GENTLEMEN: PHILADELPHIA IN THE AGE OF FRANKLIN. By Carl and Jessica Bridenbaugh. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.50.

HERE is a book devoted to Philadelphia which is neither a history of the Quaker city nor a guidebook. It deals with the life, culture, arts, and achievements of the inhabitants of Philadelphia during the age of Benjamin Franklin—a period that runs approximately from 1730 to 1790.

I am sure that it will surprise most readers to learn that Philadelphia, at the time of the American Revolution, was the second largest city in the British Empire. So the authors say, and I have no doubt that they have taken pains to verify their assertion. At that time the population of the town was about 40,000, a number that was exceeded only by the inhabitants of London. Next to Philadelphia came Bristol in England, with 36,000 inhabitants, and even Bristol appears to have been more populous than Edinburgh or Dublin.

This American metropolis was, in Franklin's time, the center of colonial civilization. It was much superior to New York and Boston in the social qualities of grace, leisure, and elegance that surround and nourish the arts and sciences. Twenty years before the Revolution it had groups of literary-minded people who wrote poems, essays, and political pamphlets. Painting and the decorative arts flourished. Philadelphia was the home of Benjamin West until he went to England to live, and many of his early portraits are still hanging on the walls of Philadelphia homes.

All these evidences of culture and gracious living astonished visitors from England. They expected—or so it seems—to find in Philadelphia a backwoods people, chiefly concerned with clearing land, building cabins, and learning to read. But the Philadelphians of that period could read very well. By the middle of the century the city possessed several well-stocked public libraries and numerous bookstores. In 1776 the town had seven newspapers. None of them was a daily, but several of them appeared three days a week.

In other public-spirited ways Philadelphia led all other colonial communities. It had the best hospitals, and its provisions for taking care of the poor were unexcelled at that period. As early as 1752 the town had a system of public street lighting, while at that time the streets of New York were lighted by householders who placed lamps in their windows. Even more remarkable in the way of progress was the paving of the Philadelphia streets. That was done in 1771, when a paved street was a curiosity in any American community, and pedestrians who walked a few blocks in wet weather expected naturally to be splashed with mud from the wheels of passing vehicles. In this early paving in Philadelphia a hard roadbed was laid down for carriages, and a narrow footpath, made of bricks, was placed close to the houses on each side of the street.

Unfortunately this book, which contains so many facts of interest, is so ineptly written that it is almost unreadable. The authors have crammed so many items on a page that they have made it resemble the World Almanac—not in appearance, but in import. Omission of much of the data thus included would have improved the book.

Also the authors, who are undoubtedly among the world's best researchers, lack evidently the sense of inwardness. Hundreds of people are mentioned in the volume, but the reader never really meets any of them. In fact, the reader never gets beyond the outside of anything. That's a pity, for there is enough latent life and drama in these four hundred pages to make a great and memorable book.

W. E. WOODWARD

Fiction in Review

I FIND myself not only temperamentally antagonistic but theoretically opposed to a book like "The Voice of the Trumpet" by Robert Henriques (Farrar and Rinehart, $2). It is a novel about the war, and the reader approaches it with respect for the fact that the author is himself a commando officer—here, we think, is someone who has known the real thing, and it imposes a certain delicacy on us. But the book is so subjective that we quite lose the experience of war in the welter of the author's self-expression. The story opens at the zero hour in a raid, when an exploding shell kills Captain Smith and most of his men. In a dying vision Smith reviews the reasons for his own and the other men's presence on the "mountainside of war"; he is able to accept his death. This is the outline of "The Voice of the Trumpet"; the book is so amorphous and mystical that even this much of a clue to its content is come by with great effort.

It is explained that Mr. Henriques exactly set out to write "not primarily a report on a raid" but "a report on man's spirit"—I quote from Stephen Vincent Benét's brief introduction—but any good report on a raid, any good novel about anything whatever, is a report on man's spirit. The requirement is only that man in general be recognizable in the particular writer, or that man in general be more recognizable because one man has looked at him, or perhaps that the spirit of the particular writer shine so brightly that for the moment, we are satisfied to let him inhabit the world alone. My objection to Mr. Henriques is that he fulfils none of these requirements. He has intentionally not written a "realistic" novel, but neither has he written any kind of novel, or any kind of poetry—despite the introduction of many stretches of verse. His mood of solemnity and lyricism, his mysticism and his exaltation, all fail to disguise the simple fact that more than nine-tenths of what he writes is merely unintelligible. Even his relatively "easy" passages are pretentious and self-indulgent; the following is an example:

It is clear that the force of a happening is in its relevance; not in the cut stone, nor in the setting, but in the finished jewel aptly disposed; not in the kernel, nor in the shell, but in the whole fruit, together with the tree which it has grown to burden and the garden that surrounds the tree. This, a blatant platitude, in war time needs constant recollection; or a man may easily be misled into a false judgment of what is important, and an overestimate of the momentous event which is, in fact, quite trivial.

Prose like this, I feel, is closer to double-talk than to poetry, and evidence, what is more—if we examine it for its music apart from its meaning—of a poor ear.

As I read "The Voice of the Trumpet" I kept thinking of James Agee's "Let Us Now Praise Famous Men," published about two years ago. Mr. Agee was no more inclined to write a "report" on the share-croppers than Mr. Henriques is to write a report on the commandos, but his book was truly a report on man's spirit because, however subjective Mr. Agee's approach, his eye was always on the real, the tangible, and the objective. It may have been a fault of "Let Us Now Praise Famous Men" that the author was so concerned to create himself out of his experience of share-croppers (if you will, this is not the highest impulse of art: the point is arguable), but at least he gave the reader, too, the materials out of which to create himself: it is the artist's responsibility. In this sense irresponsible, Mr. Henriques may give proof, in "The Voice of the Trumpet," that he has a busy inner life, but he gives no proof that he is an artist.

There is a large amount of simple writing talent in Robert Easton's "The Happy Man" (Viking, $2.50), a first book by a young rancher out of Harvard who is now an officer with a tank-destroyer battalion. Its formless form (here are a group of men working together on a huge cattle ranch: this is the way their days are spent, this is what they are and were), its decent distance from its characters, the decent distance between its author and his audience, all in some sort remind me of "East of Farewell," a novel about life on a destroyer, by a young writer named Howard Hunt, which was published last fall and which should have received more notice than it did. "The Happy Man" even shares the chief weakness of Mr. Hunt's novel: in Mr. Easton's book, too, the characters, despite their colorfulness, are so much the same color that they all blend together, and it comes to be a matter of distinguishing them by name, not by personality. However, what "East of Farewell" had which "The Happy Man" conspicuously lacks was enough drama and action to keep the author from riding off over the rim of reality. I have admitted myself temperamentally ill-adapted to mysticism, and I found Mr. Easton's title chapter, for instance, irritatingly obscure and dull.

Whether or not Stuart Cloete had his tongue in his cheek when he wrote "Congo Song" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.50) I am unable to figure out. It is the story of a group of white people who live together on the African equator: a doctor, a botanist, a painter, a collector of wild animals, an American, a Woman—in short, a more or less standard collection for a microcosm. At the pop of a cork they gather in twos and threes to talk about science, art, or sex, mostly sex. It is just before the outbreak of the war. The woman, who is very beautiful and very immoral in a blond tropical way with lacquered toes, has a pet gorilla which (or whom) she has nursed at her breast; she is also a Nazi-hunting agent of the British Intelligence. Well, before the book is done, a couple of the characters not only turn out to be up to German no-good, but the gorilla has its (or his) share in the defeat of fascism—but this is not until we have gone through a considerable number of conversations about glands, witchcraft, hypnosis, botany, Picasso, Plato, or anything else you might expect to find in a bargain-basement version of the encyclopedic Aldous Huxley. But make no mistake about it: Mr. Cloete may be cheap, but he has his values. The only trouble is that, even eroticism being capable of becoming too much of a good thing, in the long run "Congo Song" is duller than it is titillating.

DIANA TRILLING

AMUSEMENTS

"Vivid and entertaining theater."—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.
THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY & ROWLAND STEBBINS present

THE PATRIOTS

by SIDNEY KINGSLEY
NATIONAL, W. 41st St. PE 6-6220. Evgs. 8:40, Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

DRAMA

Henry Ward Beecher's

Little Sister

HARRIET" (Henry Miller Theater) is a play about the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Like most of the new pieces seen so far this season it is no great contribution to dramatic literature, but the production as a whole most certainly does add one more to the few bright spots on a famous street now dimmed out in more senses than one. This is partly because the play itself is amusing enough and, under Elia Kazin's direction, plays well. It is even more because Helen Hayes gives one of her best performances and is likely to be remembered with a smile long after memory of the piece has grown dim. Quite possibly it was written with her talents in mind. In any event it fits them perfectly, and she plays with evident enjoyment.

Apparently the intention was to get something just enough—but not too much—like "Victoria Regina." The period is the same, and hence the atmosphere, stuffy but quaint, is the same also. Harriet was born in the royal line of Beechers, most of whom took greatness as nearly inevitable. She became a sort of queen; she was, like Victoria, "colossal in a small way," and she probably had rather more to do with the Civil War than Victoria had with either the Crimean mess or the consolidation of India. She even, as though to complete the parallel, married and cherished a pedantic nonentity who puttered about with high-minded ineffectuality. Whether or not the real Harriet was also a small woman I do not know; but if she wasn't she ought to have been. Miss Hayes's brisk little figure exactly fits the spirit of a woman who, while bearing a good many children—on occasion two at a time—and running a husband as well as a large household, nevertheless managed her spare time so well that, to everybody's astonishment, she ended up on a pedestal higher by several feet than even that from which the redoubtable Henry Ward was looking complacently down. In the first act, when Harriet has just returned from the honeymoon to her house, the stride with which she swings through her domain is something to remember. Without need of words it says clearly both how glad she is to get what she has now got and how much more she expects to have to be glad for in the future.

If "Harriet" had been written even a few years ago, the emphasis, I imagine, might well have been very different. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was, after all, an astonishing fluke. Its success would have been comic if it had not happened to touch off a powder keg, and its author might easily be debunked in the manner of Strachey or his more heavy-handed successors. But once you are given the present war and the need for voices capable of achieving what Harriet achieved, the somewhat different tone taken in this play is almost inevitable. To be sure, satiric touches are frequent, and there is no attempt to suggest that Mrs. Stowe had either the talent or the knowledge necessary to write anything more than a sentimental melodrama. "Harriet" is, in other words, a comedy. But the play ends with the heroine making a speech—a very good one by the way—to a patriotic assembly outside her window, and the curtain goes down as her audience breaks into the "Battle Hymn of the Republic." Moreover, that is a good and proper ending, since the whole course of the play has been to lead us from the level of period comedy toward that of historic solemnity.

On the historicity of the character as here written and interpreted I cannot pretend to know enough to pronounce. From what little I do know, however, I am inclined to suspect that Harriet has been idealized pretty well up to the permissible limit and that the version here presented of her mind and character is, shall we say, defensible without being exactly inevitable. The authors, Florence Ryerson and Colin Clements, are obviously determined to make her as completely sympathetic as is possible without forfeiting comedy's right to smile even at heroines. She is represented as a kind of Cinderella, one of the babies of the family upon whom the replet brother Henry and the earnestly crusading sister Catherine—she went in for domestic science and the rights of women—look down in kindly tolerance. She is here endowed with an almost Jane Austenish combination of sedate propriety and realistic wit, and represented as passing becomingly from delighted surprise to a sober sense of responsibility as the magnitude of her success grows upon her realization. The Harriet of the play would never be pompous enough to say as the real Harriet is reported to have said: "I did not write 'Uncle Tom's Cabin'; God guided my pen." This real Harriet was probably not quite so likable a person as Miss Hayes makes the fictional one.

But that is quite as it should be in a piece of this sort, and I am not complaining about a very entertaining play and a very delightful performance. The temptation to rename the piece "How Helen Hayes Wrote 'Uncle Tom's Cabin'" is strong, but the gibe is not really quite fair.

In several of its more serious passages "Harriet" is also as good patriotic preaching for the moment as anything I have seen. Perhaps that is another illustration of the fact that, at least except in the case of the very best writers at their own very best, an oblique or tangential approach to the most important topics of the moment is more likely to be effective on the stage than direct treatment. I should add that though Miss Hayes is and should be the star, the whole company is excellent and very well directed.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

THE HUMAN COMEDY" is an effort to create, through a series of lyrically casual, almost plotless scenes, the image of a good family in a good town in war time. Most of my friends detest it. A good many millions of other people, I suspect, will like it, as they liked the Andy Hardy films and Rupert Hughes's "The Old Nest," whose traditions it returns to rather more than improves on. I do not agree with either side. I think my friends are too frightened of tearjerkers to grant that they can be not only valid but great, and that the audience at large is too friendly, too gullible, too eager to be seduced. The picture is mainly a mess, but as a mixture of typical with atypical failure, and in its rare successes, it interests me more than any other film I have seen for a good while.

Many of its faults, and most of its virtues, are those of its author. What angers me is that Saroyan's original story, cut perhaps 20 per cent and sternly dry-cleaned, might have been the basis for a film which, though I might not wholly have liked or agreed with it, would have had a great deal of beauty and importance. That, of course, would have had to depend on every detail of its screen treatment; and in nearly every respect the treatment it gets wobbles between that stultifying kind of slick-paper competence which is worse than no competence at all and unforgivable errors of taste and judgment. The best one can say of it, with few exceptions, is that it tries on the whole to be "faithful" to Saroyan; not invariably a good idea. The worst, in my opinion, lies less in its active failures of taste or of plain sense than in its easygoing, self-pleased, Mortimer Snerdish neglect of some magnificent opportunities.

There are, as I say, exceptions. Most of them involve the one sound piece of casting and performance, that of Jack Jenkins as the four-year-old Ulysses, who, I fervently hope, will not be used again; otherwise he will become just another actor. When Ulysses is trying to learn "My Old Kentucky Home" from his brother, or is asking his mother what the man meant when he sang weep-no-more—adding another weep-no-more with exquisite quickness and quiet—or when, watching an also well-played store-window robot, he first learns the meaning of terror, something perfectly limpid, true, warm, and powerful comes alive which gives Saroyan and this film, for all their lapses, a rare and honorable right to existence. There are other very good bits: the gentle leavetaking of three soldiers who have picked up two nice girls; the sound, filled with death and enigma, as they recede along a rainy night sidewalk; the beautifully timed, very moving sound, late in the film, of the first two horseshoes as they hit the dirt in the dusk. I am sorry Mickey Rooney was cast in the leading role, but I was touched to see how sensitive and earnest an actor this usually unfortunate young man can be. I thought he did almost as well with the part as an "actor" could.

It would be hard, I grant, to find anyone beyond childhood who might be capable of purity and directness of performance, which are hopelessly unavailable to most actors; but I wish it had occurred to everyone to try. The Hollywood traditions of acting, to say nothing of those of the stage, are incapable even at best of convincing one, except in the frankest kind of myth. I like some of the myths very well and some of the actors in them, but when there is any pretense whatever of portraying "real" people—as in "The Grapes of Wrath"—and in this film—such actors are painfully out of place. Acting, even in the films I would like to see made, must inevitably develop a tradition, a style, which must as inevitably, in the long run, stultify and destroy itself. All I am urging here is that the present tradition be recognized for worse than dead, except within its limited and also half-dead bounds, and that new sources be drawn on, new styles—drastically new ones—developed. Some time I hope to make some suggestions on this matter, at length. Here, there is time to say only that nearly every performance in this film, from the skillfully well-intended but traditional (Frank Morgan's) to the hopelessly unfortunate but also traditional (Fay Bainter's, Van Johnson's, Ray Collins's), strangles at birth every hope of a truly vivid reality. And surely there are enough Mexican mothers in California to make unnecessary the use, for a Mexican mother, of a sexy young actress with flour all over her hair who can't even make the accent convincing.

Saroyan's brand of Christian anarchy I find about equally genuine, sympathetic, professional, and muddled. I think his all but glandular inability to take evil seriously not only limits his world but leads him sometimes into foolishness and unintentional deceit; but I do not question, as some of my friends do, his right to make a story which is not "class conscious," nor do I disapprove of the film for its failure to rectify this presumed lack. I do notice, however, that MGM has used exactly as much of Saroyan's feelings (or ideas) as it pleases, and no more; which is only too liable to be the fate of men of good-will who are capable of good-will alone.

What annoyed me much more was the neglect of opportunities which, one would think, would be only too obvious to film-makers with a grain of cinematic sense. Take three salient examples.

A premental child hears a freight train coming, runs up close to it, waves, is answered by a singing Negro. Made, with any imagination, from the point of view of the child—and of plain fact—this could have been a roaring and miraculous half-minute. Not one thing in it is taken advantage of. To make the shame complete, the Negro himself has the fruity vibrato of a "well-trained" singer.

On another train, deep in the night—here referred to as "an American night"—crowded troops, on their way to war, get tired of talking and of dirty songs and by gradual stages take to singing a Moody-and-Sanky-style hymn. I think it is perfectly conceivable, or properly inevitable, that they would. But if they did, it would take some doing, and if we got it, it could be unforgettable. Here, all we get is a few mushy salon shots of a night train; the well-groomed, well-rested faces of about nine in the evening; an obnoxiously emphasized Chinese and Filipino (?) to prove that, despite the absence of Negroes, this is the century of the common man; one excellent face, that of a big-eared prep-school type of child; aside from this, about a three-point-two amount of sensitiveness to faces; the song starting, unreal, much too soon; the soldiers getting into it with the overswift, disgraceful "informality" of a musical-comedy chorus, and sounding like one; a total absence of the complexity, the weariness, the power, the pity, the great beauty which it seems incomprehensible not to have imagined, and which one night's ride in a contemporary day coach could so richly have taught those who made, and were presumably content with, this scene. Or could it have taught them? Are Hollywood "professionals" so engulfed in their "profession" that they are incapable of seeing beyond the ends of their cameras? I rather suspect that most of them are.

I suspect it all the more in their general and specific failure to realize that here they might for once have used a real town in all its intricacy, individuality, and beauty. In the closing sequence a young man, an orphan, arrives who has never seen the town before but has heard much of it. He wants to look at it, tenderly and at leisure. He might have been the vehicle for as fine a summation as an American town could ever get. What does the camera do instead? Close-ups of his face, while his stream of consciousness murmurs that there is the library, and the Presbyterian Church, and so on.

Why did they bother to make the film at all? Why, for that matter, do they bother to make any? Surely, not twice in any hundred thousand feet can they flatter themselves that they qualify to.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

THE fourteen New York Philharmonic-Symphony players whose contracts have not been renewed have admitted the deterioration in the playing of the orchestra which Toscanini, when he was its conductor, said was the greatest he had ever conducted; but they have charged that they were being made the scapegoats for the errors which had caused this deterioration—the management's errors first in engaging "a young and talented man" who could not handle "the tremendous burden of a complete season's work," then in trying "a bewildering variety" of guest conductors, each with his "pet hobby horses and . . . modern works" that could not be adequately rehearsed. And on the other hand they have charged the management with "premeditated and cultivated terrorism for years, with waves of firings anticipating any demands for betterment of contract," and have contended that the present dismissals are part of the management's tactics in its attempt to cut the length of the season. By the management I take it they have meant both the board of directors and Arthur Judson, the business manager; and Mr. Judson specifically they have charged with neglecting the best interest of the orchestra for the best interest of Columbia Concerts Corporation, through which he manages conductors and other concert artists. As for Artur Rodzinski, the newly engaged permanent conductor of the orchestra, they have contended that he recommended the dismissals "for reasons of intrigue and politics and not for the good of the orchestra," and that the recommendations represented "the arbitrary caprices of a man . . . well known . . . as completely unstable temperamentally." And as protection against all this they have demanded a committee of the orchestra empowered to review these and future dismissals.

It is true that in engaging Barbirolli, in giving a minor English conductor of a provincial Scottish orchestra a three-year contract as sole permanent conductor of a great orchestra that had been headed by Toscanini, in doing this not merely after he had been here a few weeks on trial and had exhibited his undistinguished achievements but even, secretly, before he had come here, in re-engaging him for two more years even after those three years of amply demonstrated mediocrity, in passing over Beecham while it engaged ■ Mitropoulos and even an Efreim Kurtz as guest conductor—in all this the management has proved its unsuitability to control the orchestra's affairs. Nor has it proved its fitness now in my opinion, by engaging a man whose work has shown him to be a good drillmaster but a coarse-grained musician. By the management I too mean both the directors and Mr. Judson; for I think it reasonable to assume that where the directors' qualifications for their posts are their money, business standing, or social position, Mr. Judson's activity has not been limited to issuing stamps and petty cash. And with no knowledge of particular incidents which the fourteen players may have in mind I think it reasonable for them to contend that the man who has conductors and other artists for hire should not have anything to do with the hiring of conductors and other artists for the orchestra.

On the other hand the charge of waves of firings to terrorize the men is untrue: there have been, since the 1928 merger, only the few replacements that are normally made in an orchestra each year. And if one examines this year's list one finds that seven of the fourteen men have been playing in the New York Symphony and Philharmonic for periods long enough to make it credible that they are being retired and pensioned for age and lessened competence; one has been associate solo horn for the past two seasons, and presumably made his contribution to the sour notes I heard in Berlioz's "Queen Mab"; and one was tried as solo trombone this season, and may also have proved unsatisfactory. That leaves five, including the concertmaster: hardly a mass firing, and not without possible explanation.

At the time when the Philharmonic-Symphony was conducted by Toscanini and was a great orchestra there were men who liked to play under him; but there were also men who disliked it and who were glad to see him go. They could tell you of his rages; but he could tell you of their enraging indolence and unwillingness to put into their work the intensity of effort that he put into his. What with his personal force and rages and disciplinary power he compelled them to play like a great orchestra; but the next week one attended a concert at which they were conducted by a man with less personal force and no disciplinary power, one saw the concertmaster relax comfortably in his chair and the others behind him do likewise, and one heard playing in which one could not recognize the orchestra that Toscanini thought so great. This illustrated the conflict of wills that is involved in the conducting of any orchestra—but also the lack in these particular men of the pride in their standing that has caused the Boston and Philadelphia men to maintain a minimum excellence under other conductors than Koussevitzky and Stokowski. In this conflict the Philharmonic-Symphony men lost to Toscanini, but won over the others, and continued to win over Barbirolli and some of the recent guest conductors; and they are now trying to win over Rodzinski. They talk of the management's errors; but the men who were glad to see Toscanini go in 1936 were glad to see Barbirolli come; they had a grand time with him, and continued to have a grand time with the guest conductors, and would like to go on having a grand time with Rodzinski. Faced with a conductor who has been given disciplinary power and has begun to use it, they are executing a manoeuvre to deprive him of it. If they are successful and he surrenders on these and future dismissals I can't see him achieving much with the orchestra; if he wins he will have to work with a sullen orchestra; but even in the best circumstances his achievements would be limited by his capacities. In the best circumstances we would not get another Boston or Philadelphia Orchestra; for that we would have to have a different orchestra, a different conductor, and—while we were at it—a different board of directors and a different business manager.

B. H. HAGGIN

The World's Finest
PHONOGRAPH NEEDLE

The STAR SAPPHIRE

Enjoy living, breathing music in your own home, with the Duotone Star Sapphire. Its highly polished genuine sapphire point, unique construction, and 5 patented features eliminate distortion and needle scratch. Assure your favorite records gem like reproduction with the Star Sapphire. Acclaimed and used by the world's most critical musicians! At better record shops, ■ Duotone, 759 Broadway, N. Y. C.

$5 PATENT No. 2,276,582 Other patents pending

IN CANADA: BRIDGES LTD., MONTREAL

FOR YOUR TONE Say Duotone
THE WORLD'S FINEST NEEDLES

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5. Two years $8. Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1. Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Letters to the Editors

Mason and Dixon's Line

Dear Sirs: An incident occurred on one of the coach cars of the Sun Queen to Florida which deserves, I think, the attention of your readers.

The coach was of the old-fashioned, unventilated, green-plush variety resurrected for the duration. The seats were occupied to capacity; baggage which overflowed the racks was piled in the washroom or along the aisles; stops were frequent and interminable.

Good-naturedly accepting a war emergency, we passengers made the best of it with a spirit of solidarity that reminded me of hunger marches and sit-down strikes. General discomfort inspired camaraderie, and the morale in that car was high. Or at least I thought so until the incident occurred which prompts me to write this letter.

I was returning from an unsuccessful attempt to get anywhere near the dining-car when I found myself bucking an inexplicable influx of jostling, perspiring, exasperated people. Since the train was under way, and these passengers could not have boarded it at a station, I asked one of them where they had all come from.

"We've crossed the Mason and Dixon Line," she said, "so they're clearing us out of the Jim Crow car."

By the time I had reached my seat, those who had submitted to this unseasonable eviction had occupied the places of the colored people scattered the entire length of the train, and the latter were streaming toward the segregated car.

I was unhappily reflecting on the contradictions inherent in American democracy when an animated Negro voice behind me attracted my interested attention. I turned around. A colored girl was addressing the conductor: "I paid for this seat," she was saying, "and I will sit in it. I am only asserting my rights as an American citizen in refusing to give it up."

I noticed that there was a Negro man beside her and a Negro woman across the aisle. The three were apparently sticking it out together. I promptly joined them, introduced myself, expressed unqualified admiration of their courage, and promised them active support if things got tough. They thanked me, and I returned to my seat. Presently

I ventured another foray on the diner. The matter of waiting in line, and then again waiting to be served, consumed some two or three hours of my valueless time. When I got back, I noticed that the colored trio had disappeared.

Since lights were off and the three soldiers who shared my seat were all sound asleep, I had to wait until morning to learn what had happened. A woman who loaned me her soap in the washroom informed me, with what seemed like very belated indignation, that a deputy sheriff had come into the car at Raleigh and put the three colored people off the train. "You should have seen their luggage!" added my informant, "They had the nicest-looking luggage." I assured her with some impatience that one didn't need to see their luggage to realize the high caliber of the three. They had the courage to protest, under humiliating circumstances, a general inconvenience which should have been protested unanimously by the more submissive white ticket-holders in the Jim Crow car.

I'm sorry I wasn't there when the deputy sheriff boarded the train. I'm sorry I failed to support the Negro girl, as I promised to.

I hope anyone going South in a sit-up car will keep alive the issue she and her two companions raised by refusing to cooperate when the authorities undertake their mass-relocation of passengers, to the greater glory of Hitler, at the Mason and Dixon Line.

POLLY BOYDEN

Miami, Florida, February 24

Jim Crow in the Camps

Dear Sirs: I just read the article The Novel Case of Winfred Lynn in your issue of February 20. The facts complained of are generally prevalent throughout military training camps in the Southern area. Take our own camp here. We have separate colored training detachments. These detachments are located at the extreme ends of the camp. Mingling of white and colored troops is distinctly frowned upon. The USO shows visiting camp always stage an extra performance "for colored only" at one of the post theaters. It is considered something of a misdemeanor for a white private to fraternize with his colored comrades in arms.

Thousands of Northern boys undergoing training here unconsciously acquire the habit of Jim Crow—a habit it may be hard to break down at the end of the war. Nothing is being done by the army to help break down the barriers of racial misunderstanding in order to pave the way for interracial harmony in the post-war future.

PRIVATE, U. S. ARMY

Somewhere in the U. S., February 28

Open Letter to Governor Stas-en

Dear Sir: I have been interested in world organization for over forty years. Your plan strikes me as one of the most comprehensive and best balanced. Combined with large regional understandings like Western Europe and Eastern Asia, it would provide excellent preliminary blueprints for a saner world.

The time for definite action is evidently at hand. It would have come two generations sooner if practical men had placed their ability at the service of forward-looking ideas, instead of sneering at "crackpots" and "Utopians." It is hard to realize that only yesterday foresight was called folly.

There is one very practical question which you do not face and which will have to be faced. When your World Parliament convenes, when your World Council assumes power, when your World Court is organized, when your World Legion starts patrolling the lanes of sea and air, what language are they going to use?

Democratic solution: all languages will be recognized as equal; and that will mean chaos.

Oligarchic solution: only the major languages will be taken into consideration. But how are you going to draw the invidious line between major and minor? Before the last war, English, French, and German enjoyed privileged positions which were hardly challenged. But will it be possible, tomorrow, to treat Russian, Spanish, Portuguese, without counting the Oriental languages, as inferior in status?

Imperialistic solution: we shall impose English as the administrative language of the World Federation because Great Britain and ourselves happen to be richer and more powerful than any of our competitors. Do you believe that our supremacy will be accepted whole-heartedly and permanently by Germany, Italy, France, or Russia? A well-organized world will frown upon any claim to privilege, predominance, hegemony; for there can be no genuine liberty for all without full equality of status.

Is there a fourth solution? Yes, one which is indicated by the experience of centuries. There is one international organization which has been a going concern for nineteen hundred years, and that is the Catholic church. It uses an international language, and that is Latin.

This is the century of the common man, and classical Latin may be too intricate for his daily needs. Why not then adopt as an international auxiliary language, as a lingua franca, a drastically simplified form of Latin, simpler, more regular, than Italian itself?

Respectfully submitted,

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Stanford University, Cal., March 10

Finland and the Four Freedoms

Dear Sirs: I wish to congratulate you on your honest and fearless attitude toward the French African muddle and its handling by our State Department.

I agree in the main with your attitude on home-front questions. As a member of the Farmers' Union I support your stand on Farm Security, etc. I do, however, question whether you realize that in order to supply cheap food we farmers must accept a lower standard of living than, for instance, skilled labor. Many of my neighbors and acquaintances are working in the shipyards at Frisco and Portland and are making more money than I am, though I work longer hours. You say farm income has gone up. True, but where was it to start with? The average living standard hasn't been too high for us farmers in the past.

I want to bring up another question. You quite rightly criticize British imperialism; however, the very same attitude when it is displayed by our other ally, Soviet Russia, is either excused or ignored. For instance, on the question of Finland. The Finns have had every reason to hate and fear Russia for centuries. The Stalin regime has certainly not done anything to dissipate this fear. Yet in your editorial in the issue of February 6 you blandly inform us that Finland must once more surrender territory immemorably hers. Why? Does not the Atlantic Charter apply to her also? After all, if the Russians had not forced them into the war the Finns would certainly have remained as neutral at least as Sweden.

There has, of course, been much propaganda of a questionable nature about fascist Finland. I happen to be of Finnish parentage; so I probably am a little better informed about the people and government of that country than the average American. I could wish that The Nation would be very certain of its facts before it joins in the chorus of defamation against a small nation struggling against odds for actual physical survival. I believe the Four Freedoms should apply to all peoples, even those we or our allies might wish to subjugate.

ARNE KERO

Frederick, S. D., February 11

Vigorous Dissent

Dear Sirs: Sidney Hook, reviewing Alexander Meiklejohn's "Education Between Two Worlds" in your issue of February 27, quotes a sentence in which Mr. Meiklejohn had said his whole argument could be summed up. That sentence reads: "All the activities which give a man dignity are done 'for the state.'" "This is as false as anything can be," pontificates Mr. Hook, "and its falseness is not mitigated by the converse proposition which Mr. Meiklejohn throws in as a sop to liberalism." I am sure that Nation readers deserve to hear the converse proposition which Mr. Hook, scorning argument, has suppressed. It is this: "The test of any government is found in the dignity and freedom, the equality and independence, of its citizens. It exists through and for them, just as they exist through and for it."

Mr. Meiklejohn reached these two propositions after many pages of reasoning which Mr. Hook has systematically misunderstood and—with possibly tragic consequences—misreported. Or so it seems to one careful reader of Mr. Meiklejohn's book. It is a book about education. It begins with the assumption that education, in order to be excellent, should have something to teach. It notes that we no longer have a theology to tell us what this should be; and goes on to inquire whether politics might be restored to a dignity sufficient for the purpose. A fresh analysis of Comenius, Locke, Matthew Arnold, Rousseau, and Dewey convinces Mr. Meiklejohn that this is so; and two hundred pages of candid inquiry leave him in a position to recommend universal education in the interest of a world state which such education would progressively make possible. Mr. Hook, reporting this recommendation, says it is merely tacked on "in the disguise of a deduction." Since Mr. Hook approves the recommendation itself, it can be only the reasoning of Mr. Meiklejohn that he calls in question. And since that reasoning satisfies me, I ask your permission to suggest that as many of your readers as are interested in human happiness should go through Mr. Meiklejohn's book by themselves. For the book is concerned with as important a theme as any I can imagine today, and its author does not hesitate to urge upon us the kind of order which consists with freedom—which, indeed, creates it.

Mr. Hook dogmatically prefers what Mr. Meiklejohn calls disorder; nor does the manifest personal slur in the next to the last paragraph of his review invite confidence in his power to consider arguments on their own merits. I suppose another review is not to be asked for. Failing that, I suggest once more that Nation readers see for themselves whether it is not Mr. Hook who is "false," "foolish," and "dangerous." Those are his words for Mr. Meiklejohn. But Mr. Meiklejohn has proposed that we labor to secure the major goods of reason and peace, whereas Mr. Hook grows lyric over the stoic virtues of "courage against odds, of contained grief, of detachment, and of renunciation so complete that it transcends the state." These virtues he quaintly arranges in a series beginning with "incorruptible scholarship," which of course no man belittles. They are beautiful but minor virtues, and the perfect setting for them is that tyranny which Mr. Meiklejohn is so manfully desirous of preventing.

MARK VAN DOREN

New York, March 7

And Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: I am content to leave it to critical Nation readers who repair to Mr. Meiklejohn's book to judge whether I have "misunderstood" his views or "scored argument" in rejecting them. I cannot, however, recognize Mr. Van Doren as an authority in this matter, for his letter shows he is deficient in logical sense. First, one cannot be guilty of "suppressing" a proposition to which one explicitly refers. Second, the "suppressed" proposition has no logical bearing upon the falsity of the statement under discussion. That statement, on which Mr. Meiklejohn rests the whole force of his argument, still remains false. Third, Mr. Van Doren concedes it is false, although he is blithely unaware he is doing so. For he grants that some activities have dignity that are not "for the state." That on his scale of values they are minor is logically irrelevant. Fourth, from the fact that although critical of Mr. Meiklejohn's position I agree with some of his practical proposals, it does not follow, as Mr. Van Doren mistakenly infers, that "it can be only the reasoning" I call in question. I question the basic premises of Mr. Meiklejohn's political philosophy.

The issue between us is fundamental. Mr. Meiklejohn adopts the fateful line of Rousseau and Hegel on the existence of the General Will, which leads to the exaltation of the state over the individual. For me the state is an instrument of social action, good or bad, depending on whether it furthers or frustrates the growth of persons, who are alone the carriers of value. I characterized the position based on the General Will as "false" because it distorts the facts of political behavior; "foolish" because it leads to consequences that are literally absurd; "dangerous" because it can be used, and has been used, as a justifying mythology for totalitarian practices. In the short limits of a review I established this.

Mr. Meiklejohn himself is aware that his ideas suggest those of totalitarianism, but he assures us this is only seeming. On page 266 he says that he only half agrees with the political philosophy of Hitler and Mussolini. I have shown that, unfortunately, he cannot, in logic, stop at half agreement. This means that his theory of democracy is hopelessly confused; not that he isn't personally a good democrat.

To return to Mr. Van Doren. I find mildly amusing his attempts to lecture me about argument. But the insinuation in his closing paragraph that while Mr. Meiklejohn labors for reason and peace, I am concerned merely with glorifying stoic virtues that have their "perfect setting" under tyranny, I regard as a piece of impertinence.

SIDNEY HOOK

New York, March 12

Realism?

Dear Sirs: The following extraordinary statement was published by the Museum of Modern Art in connection with its exhibition of "American Realists and Magic Realists" and widely quoted by the press.

Many of the masterpieces of European and American art have been painted in this mode, which in the past few years has enjoyed a strong revival of interest on the part of a number of artists. The public, of course, has never lost its interest. No other style of painting appeals so naturally to the great majority of people, and in this sense it is a truly democratic style, offering no barrier of technique between the artist and the untrained eye. Now, after periods of impressionist, abstract, and expressionist art, it is once again of interest to the cultivated taste, as it has always been to the general public.

It is a gross misconception of democracy to say that something is democratic because it panders to ignorance. On the contrary, the basis of democracy is a universal free education that qualifies each citizen for democracy. "Realism" as a term—lately abused both politically and artistically—is too often used to justify philistinism. Its meaning, particularly as applied to art, is being distorted. Realism through the ages meant a depiction of the truth. A painting does not become real because of its "sharp focus and precise representation."

THE CULTURAL COMMITTEE OF THE FEDERATION OF MODERN PAINTERS AND SCULPTORS

New York, March 10

Another Hopeful

Dear Sirs: I have just finished reading Eight Hopeful Congressmen by Richard H. Rovere in your issue of February 27. I cannot understand why he left out Chet Holifield of Los Angeles. I wish you could reprint Holifield's speech in favor of killing the Dies committee.

I have known Chet Holifield for about fifteen years. He is now and always has been a liberal and friend of labor. Let Mr. Rovere keep his eye on Chet; he won't be disappointed.

JOSEPH BROWN

Los Angeles, Cal., March 3

Landon's Line

Dear Sirs: In a Lincoln Day address delivered at Omaha Alfred M. Landon, former Governor of Kansas and 1936 Republican Presidential nominee, while first admitting that his remarks "might seem a mere partisan blanket attack," asserted that they were "really an effort to spur a win-the-war policy." With that he launched an all-out scurrilous attack on the Administration, characterizing it, among other things, as "a small but dominant group of Nazi New Dealers" and as "fascist New Dealers." The speech was published in the Milwaukee Sentinel and presumably in numerous other journals. Such language at this critical time makes for disunity at home and moreover tends to impair the morale of our armed forces.

The harangue ended with the following: "We must be willing to cooperate with the world, not on the sacrificial basis that Vice-President Wallace proposes, but on an intelligent self-interest of a world free from repressive high tariffs, managed currencies, unstable monetary systems and monopolies."

It is inconceivable that the Honorable Alfred M. Landon does not know that the American protective tariff is not only the offspring but also the pride of his own political party, and that managed currencies and monopolies flourish when enjoying the benefit and sanction of Republican administrations. That is common knowledge. College freshmen imbibe it in copious doses in their debating societies.

Verily, Alf, "none so blind as those that will not see."

JOSEPH H. DOCKERY

Milwaukee, Wis., March 1

CONTRIBUTORS

BLAIR BOLLES is a diplomatic writer for the Washington Evening Star.

SELDEN C. MENEFFEE, a writer on labor problems, contributes regularly to the Washington Post and the Christian Science Monitor.

JONATHAN FARMER is the pseudonym of a veteran political correspondent in Washington and elsewhere.

JACK GERBER runs the short-wave listening station of the Columbia Broadcasting System. He has worked for Time, the Literary Digest, the San Francisco Examiner, and the National Youth Administration.

IRWIN EDMAN is professor of philosophy at Columbia University and author of "Arts and the Man," "Four Ways of Philosophy," "Philosopher's Holiday," and other books.

LOUIS FISCHER, for many years Moscow correspondent of The Nation, was in Spain during the civil war. His books include "Men and Politics," "The Soviet in World Affairs," and "A Week with Gandhi."

HENRY MILLER, one of the transition writers, has published in this country "The Cosmological Eye" and "Wisdom of the Heart."

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "George Washington," "Lafayette," and "A New American History."

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES:

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

DISPLAY
ADVERTISING RATES:

By classification, on request

THE NATION
55 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

OUR MEN
WANT
BOOKS★

SEND
ALL YOU CAN SPARE

Help a man in uniform enjoy his leisure hours. Give your good books to the 1943 VICTORY BOOK CAMPAIGN. Leave them at the nearest collection center or public library.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 5

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 This race official always gets left as the post
- 5 This is the dog to beat the favorite!
- 9 Gasoline, in France
- 10 Man o' war?
- 11 Three cheers! and just one more
- 12 Starter of the first race
- 13 Just right
- 14 Clothing with a purpose in it
- 16 Common ones rebel if you treat them kindly, the philosopher tells us
- 18 Her cubs make beautiful children
- 21 Everybody's pain-reliever
- 24 This fish did if kept too long
- 26 She introduced St. George to the dragon (Faerie Queen)
- 27 How trade may be estimated
- 28 "That no ----- priest shall tithe or toll in our dominions" (King John)
- 29 New in America, old in France
- 30 Bit gently, but get the point first!
- 31 After fifty all learners become this

- 7 May hold a boat or a brush
- 8 In the soup? No, the soup's in them!
- 15 A foreign coin gives you a cue
- 17 A hint worth waiting for
- 18 Though in the chair is often sat upon unmercifully
- 19 Poor man's one possession (hyphen, 3 and 4)
- 20 Drove away with the foot
- 21 Fashionable beef
- 22 Might be caterer or terrace, but a third arrangement is demanded
- 23 Exposure is the last thing they fear
- 25 This fabric sounds positive
- 27 Will help to keep you straight

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 4

ACROSS:—1 PEASANT; 5 LAUNDRY; 9 LETHE; 10 ASP; 11 URRAN; 12 INROAD; 15 RESTOW; 16 SETTLER; 17 NOTE; 19 HAIL; 21 DISDAIN; 22 PANT; 23 ERUB; 25 REMODEL; 27 IMPAIR; 29 SEALER; 33 TOPEE; 34 AGE; 35 INNER; 36 RELATED; 37 TANTRUM.

DOWN

- 1 When re-spelt is zinc
- 2 Hardly a point of peaceful penetration among Zulus
- 8 He must have a ear for music
- 4 Return to office (hyphen, 2 and 5)
- 5 Occidental
- 6 You may get let in for this

DOWN:—1 PILLION; 2 ASTER; 3 ARENAS; 4 TRAY; 5 LIPS; 7 USURER; 7 DEBIT; 8 RENEWAL; 13 DELIVER; 14 STUDIOS; 15 BESIDES; 18 TAN; 20 AIR; 22 PAINTER; 23 EARDRUM; 27 RIPST; 28 LEGION; 28 PAPAL; 30 LINER; 31 LAID; 32 BELT.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 27, 1943

NUMBER 13

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

433

EDITORIALS

- Approaches to Russia 436
- Feed Europe's Children 437
- Wages and Prices 437
- The Battle of Martinique by Freda Kirchwey 438

ARTICLES

- The Farm Bloc Goes to War by I. F. Stone 440
- What Eden Is After by Blair Bolles 442
- 25 Years Ago in The Nation 444
- Nazis Can Be Made Over by Hiram Motherwell 445
- Canada's Rising Socialists by Frank Underhill 447
- Vox Populi, Inc. by Robert Bendiner 449
- In the Wind 450

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- The Second Front by J. Alvarez del Vayo 451
- Russia's Baltic Frontier by Vassili Soukhomline 452
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 454
- File and Remember 455

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Mr. Mencken and the Good Old Days
by Joseph Wood Krutch 456
- Man and History by Denis de Rougemont 457
- Flight from Self-Made Terror by Hans Ernest Fried 458
- Strawinsky as Critic by Jacques Barzun 459
- The Great Theme by Diana Trilling 460
- Douhet on Air Power by Donald W. Mitchell 462
- In Brief 463
- Drama: Killing Germans by Joseph Wood Krutch 463
- Art by Jean Connolly 463
- Music by B. H. Haggin 464

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

465

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 6 by Jack Barrett

468

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors:

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

THE VOICE WAS THE VOICE OF HITLER; THE sentiments expressed those which have become boringly familiar; but the manner of delivery was unusually subdued. Radio listeners report that the Führer spoke in a low monotone with none of the ranting eloquence to which he has treated his audiences in the past. He expressed confidence in victory but offered no hint to the German people that the day of triumph was near. The best news he could give them was the fact that the day of disaster on the eastern front had been staved off, and the appeal he made was to the strength of despair rather than to renewed hope. The tremendous dangers overcome in the past winter, he said, were a reminder of the depths of horror into which Europe would have been plunged but for National Socialism. Ascribing to his adversaries the crimes he himself has committed—a psychologically significant habit—he painted a picture of "bestially murdered masses of people" falling victim to "an Asiatic flood." This warning against the perils of Bolshevism was twice repeated for the benefit of "the so-called neutrals" and the Western powers. Interwoven into the speech were several references to the Anglo-American aerial offensive, which appears to be giving Hitler cause for anxiety. That is not surprising, for recent reports from inside Germany offer little backing to his assertion that "fires in our towns and villages will strengthen more than ever the determination of our people."

✕

IN HIS LATEST RADIO ADDRESS WINSTON Churchill responded in some measure to the vehement demands of the British people for reassurance about post-war domestic policies. This demand has been intensified since the debate on the Beveridge Report, which occurred during the Prime Minister's illness. On that occasion ministerial spokesmen created the impression that they were merely paying lip-service to the principles of the Beveridge plan and were intent on using financial and administrative excuses to emasculate it. The solid Conservative majority of the Commons, which has long outlived its mandate, voted its approval, but many younger Tories expressed as much disquiet as Labor and Liberal members. Churchill evidently felt the need of meeting the drive toward social and political reform halfway. He carefully avoided specific commitments, but the post-war domestic policy which he outlined was broadly progressive. He spoke approvingly of a four-year plan covering "five or six large measures of a practical character," including "national compulsory insurance for all classes from the cradle to the grave." Other questions which he indicated would have to be tackled by the government after the war were the improvement of agriculture, public health in all its aspects, education as the basis of equal opportunity for all, and reconstruction and replanning of towns and villages. American listeners to his speech probably noticed a distinct similarity between his proposals and those recently put forward by the National Resources Planning Board.

✱

THE TROJAN TAX HORSE FASHIONED BY Dr. Beardsley Ruml has been adopted by the House Republicans. Ruml by its Gallup form, the steed is a hot favorite with the public, but we hope that before the taxpayers place their bets they will tap its flanks and look it carefully in the mouth. Above all they should ask its sponsors one simple question: If 1942 taxes are forgiven, just what tax rates do you propose for 1943? There has been so much debate about methods of levying income tax that the urgent necessity of increasing its total yield has been almost forgotten. But the fact is that current taxes cover less than one-third of current expenditure, and heavier rates must be levied to reduce the inflationary potential of swollen national income. One of the strongest supporters of Ruml, the New York World-Telegram, has met this issue by declaring editorially that "once on the sound basis of taxing current earnings, rather than last year's earnings, Congress can legislate whatever rates are necessary to obtain whatever revenue is required." The question is: On whom would the increased rates fall? At current rates taxes on 1943 individual incomes will yield about $13 billion, while the President has asked for an increase in revenue of $16 billion. We cannot attain this goal simply by doubling everybody's rates, since the upper brackets are already paying more than 50 per cent. It follows, therefore, that the lower brackets will have to pay more than double rates, losing more than they would gain by forgiveness, while taxpayers with really big incomes would suffer but a slight increase in their tax bills, which would only diminish slightly the benefit incurred by the cancelation of their 1942 liability.

✱

IN PASSING THE BANKHEAD BILL TO DEFER all farmers from the draft, the Senate has struck a body blow at the War Manpower Commission's effort to work out an integrated man-power policy. Under the law as it now stands, farmers are deferred if they meet certain reasonable production quotas, but these quotas have been set high enough to prevent men from dodging the armed services merely on the pretext of being engaged in farm work. By seeking to extend draft deferment to an entire economic group, the Bankhead bill violates the basic democratic principle of equality of sacrifice upon which our Selective Service system rests. Since essential farm workers are already deferred, the bill cannot even be defended as an aid to food production. Politicians who are more interested in getting reelected than in winning the war will naturally support a bill such as this one, or the Kilday bill for exempting fathers, on the theory that the exempted men will remember them at the next election. For this reason deferment questions would be safer in the hands of the Manpower Commission.

✱

A FEW DAYS AGO THE SPANISH DICTATOR redoubled his persecution of the growing political opposition within Spain. A new decree imposes the death penalty for any kind of criticism of the Franco regime. A few days later, as Hitler had done with the S. S., he incorporated the Blue Division, a privately financed volunteer organization, into the Spanish army. He has now delivered to his puppet Cortes a speech of unexampled aggressiveness. It is a speech which every democrat and every State Department official should analyze. The key to its meaning undoubtedly lies in these words: "The war of today is set in terms of long duration . . . but the presence of Russia in one of the groups gives the war in Europe the character of a war unto death." The Spanish Quisling's view is identical with that of Goebbels. He means that Germany is fighting a war in defense of civilization, in defense, that is to say, of Franco. But there is a further meaning to this speech. While he recognizes that his only sure guaranty of survival lies in an Axis victory, Franco is nevertheless appealing to the United States and to Britain. In effect, he is asking as the price of his temporary neutrality that we help him maintain his regime. Taking all this into account, it seems futile to follow a policy of hopeful conciliation of Franco. It seems even more ridiculous, not to say cowardly, to demand of him as the New York Times has done, that he earn our help by "leaning a little toward the democratic . . . method of dealing with his people." The essence of Franco's position is that he is a fascist, that he is thoroughly pro-Axis in his foreign policy, and that he is deeply hated by the Spanish people.

✱

THE STATE DEPARTMENT HAS MADE A NEW offensive move against the French sailors; it has stopped issuing exit permits with which the "deserters" from the Richelieu were hieing themselves to Canada in order to join the Free French navy. Meanwhile the twelve sailors who were taken into custody as "undesirable aliens" are still sitting on Ellis Island waiting for a hearing on the farical charge of having entered the country illegally. But there is at least a possibility that they will have the last laugh. According to Arthur Garfield Hays, who has taken over the defense, deportable aliens may leave of their own accord for the country of their choice—in which case the French sailors will head as one man for Canada. But even if they wait for the immigration service to direct their departure and their destination, the only country to which they can conceivably be sent is—Canada. The one hitch is that the State Department, which ordered them picked up in the first place, may not flinch at ordering them “deported” back to the Richelieu. Secretary Knox, for his part, has not flinched at insinuating that the “deserters” were partly responsible for the sinking by enemy action of one of the Dakar ships just after it sailed again from New York. This ship, he said, lost eight or ten of her gun crew and was later sunk with her American war cargo. The fact is—and the Free French have the names and figures to prove it—that though five gunners left the ship, seven others, from the Richelieu, were taken on.

✱

THE MAJOR ISSUE OF DEMOCRACY AGAINST reaction in the post-war world has been sharply raised in two meetings which are being held this Thursday in New York. In European terms they sum up compactly the conflict of interest and attitude which brought Anthony Eden to America. One meeting, called by the European Council of the Free World Association, expresses the demand for a settlement based on the recognition, first, that “no European reconstruction is possible without the active collaboration of Britain and Soviet Russia,” and, second, that “no Nazi, fascist, or semi-fascist state in any form shall be tolerated.” The council represents a union of democratic leaders of most of the European groups in exile—including Rustem Vambery of Hungary, Count Sforza of Italy, Charles Davila of Rumania, J. Alvarez del Vayo of Spain, and others of similar outlook. The second meeting is the Fifth Pan-European Conference, officially sponsored by New York University and presided over by our former ambassador to France, William C. Bullitt. But its real motivating force and permanent director is Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, who apparently hopes to revive in this country the pan-European movement he headed on the Continent before the war. In normal times this movement would be unimportant. In the context of the present struggle it presents a challenge which democrats can hardly ignore. For it aims at the exclusion of Soviet Russia from any Continental post-war federation and assigns to Great Britain the role of benevolent spectator. Its leaders talk the language of democratic reconstruction, but their general position is reactionary. The conjunction of the two conferences provides a dramatic pre-view of the coming struggle for power is post-war Europe.

AN EFFORT TO GIVE REAL EQUALITY TO Negroes has backfired in the National Federation of Business and Professional Women at a most unfortunate moment. The federation's Midtown Club of New York has brought suit against the New York State Federation charging that the club's charter was revoked because it had the temerity to admit two prominent Negro professional women to its membership. Although the executives of the federation declare that the issuing of the charter was a “clerical error,” the fact that the “error” was discovered immediately after the Midtown Club had refused to exclude its Negro members has not been denied. Pressure is also known to have been brought against another of the federation's clubs to persuade it to exclude Negroes. How a great national women's organization, presumed to be established on democratic principles, could permit Hitler-like doctrines of racialism to intrude themselves in the midst of a war against just such doctrines remains to be explained.

Notice to Our Readers

SOME weeks ago I announced the reorganization of The Nation as a non-profit membership corporation. I described the financial difficulties which war-time prices had created and the need of raising funds to secure the journal's life over the next few years. This week I want to make a brief progress report. Following the paper's reorganization a letter was written to our full-term subscribers asking them to become members of Nation Associates and appealing for contributions. Not all the letters have yet been mailed, but the response to those already sent has been so generous and so prompt that I feel certain even now that The Nation's immediate future is secure. And our subscribers have demonstrated their feeling of partnership in The Nation by something more than contributions. Hundreds of letters have brought messages of confidence and support that will be a continuing encouragement to the editors. This experience shows clearly that The Nation is recognized by a large proportion of its readers not only as an old and valued journal of opinion but as a necessary weapon in today's political fight.

To all our readers I want to say: The Nation will come through its financial difficulties. To those subscribers who have so generously contributed both encouragement and funds, I want to express the deep appreciation of The Nation's staff and to assure them that they will hear from me individually as soon as we are able to catch up with the deluge of correspondence our campaign has happily created. Upon those who have yet to fill out their membership blanks and send their checks, I urge prompt action, since The Nation's sustaining fund is still far from complete. As soon as we know the final results of the appeal, a full report will be published in this column.

FRED A. KIRCHWEY

Approaches to Russia

EVENTS of the past two weeks have put an end to the curious notion that it would be wise to sneak through the war without ever coming to grips with the peace; that it would somehow be healthy to dodge divisive issues—as though they would be less divisive if unmentioned—until the last shot is fired and chaos confronts us. In the sudden ferment of concern for the peace a resolution has been introduced in the United States Senate calling for effective collaboration with the other United Nations after the war; the British Prime Minister has devoted nearly the whole of a major address to the post-war problems of his country; a blueprint for an American peace-time economy drawn up by the National Resources Planning Board has been sent to Congress by the President; a proposal for a series of international conferences in the near future has been presented by Sumner Welles; and Foreign Minister Anthony Eden has arrived in this country to pave the way for political understandings among the major powers of the United Nations.

Now that the peace of the world is no longer the almost exclusive concern of Vice-President Wallace and Wendell Willkie, certain fundamental issues have emerged and may be dealt with in the open instead of being allowed to fester in the dark. Towering above all other questions and in a sense dictating their solution is the question of Anglo-American relations with the Soviet Union. The problem has many facets, and for the moment the issue is being presented to us as a choice between a system of "regional responsibilities" and the kind of collective security implied in the Atlantic Charter. Things are seldom what they seem, however, and a glance at the opposing forces will show that the terms are probably misleading.

Precipitating the question is the growing dispute over Russian boundary claims as set forth in the article by Vassili Soukhomline elsewhere in this issue. Putting aside for the moment the specific merits or fallacies of the Russian claims to the Baltic states and parts of Finland, Poland, and Rumania, let us look at the conflicting approaches to the problem. The London Times, spokesman for a large section of British opinion, official and unofficial, taking the position that "security in Eastern Europe is unattainable unless it is buttressed by the military power of Russia," calls for "the joint and continuous vigilance of Britain and Russia" on the Continent and concedes to Russia "the same right as her allies [enjoy] to judge for herself of the conditions which she deems necessary for the security of her frontiers." In short, say the critics of this view, Russia would dictate the political pattern of Eastern Europe, with England and the United States performing similar functions in their respective spheres of influence. This position, whether or not it is an extreme interpretation of the Times editorial, has been repudiated by Mr. Eden. But there is no doubt that so far as any redrawing of the map of Eastern Europe is concerned, it is the position of the Soviet Union—and Eden is here primarily to promote a better understanding between the Soviets and the United States.

In general the Times editorial has had a sour reception in this country. Some of the opposition has come from legitimate champions of collective security who see in the Times thesis a revival of the balance-of-power doctrine, with Russia replacing France as England's ally on the Continent and any real international mechanism for maintaining peace already headed for the drainpipe. However, the most significant, meaning official, opposition, we believe, comes from those who would oppose to the regional approach the idea of a cordon sanitaire about the Soviet Union. This would be achieved by fostering anti-Soviet and anti-democratic groups in the Baltic countries and in Central Europe which with the coming of the peace would organize their states along reactionary social lines and would together form an anti-Russian bloc—all in the name of self-determination and the Atlantic Charter. As Blair Bolles points out in another article in these pages, this is the view which Mr. Eden encountered in the "Berle corner" of the State Department, and it is perfectly in keeping with the department's traditional attitude toward Russia. Sumner Welles, it is fair to say, is reliably reported to be in sharp dissent.

If "regional responsibility" and "collective security," then, have become blinds respectively for balance of power and cordon sanitaire, what hope is there for an equitable solution of Russia's boundary problem? We think that Mr. Soukhomline simplifies the question by merely advancing Russia's historical claim to the Baltic states. It is true that they were wrested by force from the Soviet Union after the First World War, but so was Alsace-Lorraine from Germany. The principle of right by previous conquest is hardly valid under the Atlantic Charter. The military case made out by Mr. Soukhomline rests on firmer ground, but that brings us to the heart of the question. If the world is to be organized on a basis of genuine collective security, Russia need have no great concern for bases at Reval, Riga, and the islands of Oesel and Dago. That "if" is the all-important word. It means that only those who are prepared to see this country go all out for international machinery, complete with armed force as well as economic weapons, can ask the Russians to forgo whatever strategic boundaries they can attain by force of arms. Russia's interests, as the Times points out, "will be best served if the lands between her frontiers and those of Germany are held by governments and peoples friendly to herself," and "that is one condition on which Russia must and will insist." Whether we like it or not, Russia is going to be in a position to do some insisting in that part of the world. With or without collective security, the only chance these border states have to preserve their integrity is to forget their scheming little diplomats and come to terms with the one power that can offer them, if it will, a Good Neighbor relationship. As Walter Lippmann suggested more than a month ago, such an arrangement would be their salvation, while for Russia it would be "the wisdom of the strong."

Feed Europe's Children

THE time has come to do something for the hungry children of Europe. Everyone is hungry in Europe, but the peril of hunger to the children of occupied nations has reached monstrous proportions. Poland, where the need is undoubtedly greatest of all, is unfortunately beyond the reach of our aid. Greece, fortunately, is now obtaining a modicum of help. Belgium, Norway, and France are probably in greatest need at the moment. Belgium imported 70 per cent of its food in peace time. It has not only lost these imports but has been despoiled by the Germans of some of its home-grown food. According to reliable authorities, the food rations of Belgium are but a third of minimum health requirements; and even these rations are only theoretical since many families are unable to buy the amount allotted. Tuberculosis has consequently increased eightfold in that unhappy country. The condition of the children is appalling.

It will be remembered that Herbert Hoover proposed to feed occupied Europe as early as 1940. At that time those who believed in the necessity of an Allied victory opposed his proposals, almost unanimously. They quite understood the cruelty of the choice which the conditions of war forced upon us, but they also knew that occupied Europe could not be fed without giving a lion's share to the Nazis, thus robbing hard-pressed Britain of the weapon of the blockade. Since that time conditions have changed. Britain is no longer so hard pressed, and we have become a full partner in the conflict, thus obviating the peril to Anglo-American relations which the proposal involved at the earlier date. It is nevertheless inadvisable to support Mr. Hoover's current plans, for they still envisage a general feeding program which not only the shipping situation but the total strategic requirements of the war render dubious if not impossible. This is not the only case in which the necessities of war run counter to generous impulses.

But the situation is so desperate that a way must be found to offer such aid as will not contribute to a prolongation of the war. In this exigency certain church leaders of Britain and America, all of whom have consistently supported the war from the beginning, have united in an appeal to their respective governments that limited quantities of dried milk and vitamins be shipped to the children of the occupied nations and to the nursing mothers. In the case of Belgium the proposal involves 500 tons of milk a month and 500 tons of vitamins a year. The distribution would be in the hands of the International Red Cross. There is reason to believe that sufficient ship tonnage can be made available for this enterprise, and the money is also at hand. What is required now is the consent of reluctant but not unsympathetic governments. The sympathy of high government authorities on both sides is prompted by both humanitarian and strategic motives. There is, however, still some reluctance, due to various factors, of which the chief seems to be nothing more than tactical inflexibility.

In this situation the public should take a hand and prod the government by expressing the general sentiment in favor of relief for the children. Since, in this case, what we can do is bound to be little, it is important that it be not too late.

Wages and Prices

FIGHTING on the inflation front flared up with unusual intensity this past week end, with the complete defeat of the anti-inflation program a very real prospect. As if by prearrangement by the enemy, attacks on the program have come simultaneously from three quarters. Seizing the opportunity when many members of the House were absent, the farm bloc pushed through the Pace bill for increasing farm prices by including farm labor in calculating "parity" prices. The Senate Finance Committee, meanwhile, approved a measure designed to rescind the President's executive order freezing salaries, after taxes, at $25,000. And John L. Lewis pushed his demand for a $2-a-day rise in the wages of bituminous miners to the point where federal intervention in the dispute seemed inescapable.

The plain fact of the matter is that inflation is already here. Prices are rising steadily at the rate of at least one-half of 1 per cent a month. Price Administrator Brown has frankly recognized this fact in several statements, and has said that his efforts will be confined to slowing this advance as much as possible and to preventing any one set of prices from getting wholly out of hand. Should the Pace bill be enacted into law, food prices—already far ahead of other prices—would skyrocket, and the demands for wage and salary revision would be so numerous, and so violent, that it would be impossible for any government agency to handle them. It would then become imperative for the War Labor Board to reverse its decision to stand by the Little Steel formula. Even now some adjustment to the rise in prices seems overdue.

John L. Lewis is not bluffing when he declares that unless some sort of agreement is reached, his miners will not "trespass" on mine property after April 1. Although his demand for a $2-a-day increase is excessive, the failure of the Administration to stabilize living costs plays into his hands. Moreover, there is some merit in the United Mine Workers' demand that miners be paid from portal to portal, instead of merely for the time spent after arriving at the mine face, although today's hourly scale of mine wages presumably takes this system into account to some extent.

It would probably be fairly easy to work out a compromise with Lewis on the matter of the U. M. W. demand for a change in the basis of pay if it were not for the necessity of integrating the settlement into a permanent wage policy applicable to current wage demands. A method of adjusting the Little Steel formula must be found quickly. The revised prescription—which may come to be called the bituminous-coal formula—would have to be elastic enough to permit a fair increase in mine wages without opening the way for an immediate increase in all wage scales. The A. F. of L. members of the War Labor Board have asked a "realistic wage policy" which would involve adjusting the 15 per cent allowance for increased cost of living to a figure "based on the actual cost of living to the worker." The employer delegates object to this approach to the problem on the ground that weekly wages, not hourly wage rates, ought to be taken as the basis for comparison with cost-of-living figures; and in fact the worker's economic well-being is determined by his total income rather than his hourly rates. But as most of the increase in weekly wages is due to overtime work, labor firmly insists that the hourly rather than the weekly wage rate is the only fair standard of comparison. Some reconciliation between these two points of view is highly desirable in revising the formula.

Although the specific terms of the new wage formula will have to be worked out in negotiation, the principles on which it should be based seem fairly obvious. An effort should be made to revise the Wages and Hours Act to provide as much protection at today's prices as was provided by the minimum-wage scale in effect before the war. This would provide a "floor" for real wages. So that no section of the working population shall suffer unfairly at the expense of other sections of the population with greater political influence, provision might also be made for automatic increases in pay every time the cost-of-living index rises five points. But as a basis for this computation, equal weight might be given to changes in the weekly and the hourly wage rates. While the working out of a precise formula embodying these principles will be one of the most difficult tasks that the WLB has yet faced, we do not believe that it is beyond the demonstrated capabilities of Chairman William H. Davis and the other "public" members of the board.

The Battle of Martinique

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE story begins soon after the fall of France, when the new Vichy government established as High Commissioner of all French possessions in the Americas Admiral Georges Robert, a good solid reactionary and follower of the Marshal. The Admiral set up a dictatorial rule in Martinique and suppressed with ruthless efficiency all pro-Ally or De Gaullist agitation. Opponents were put into concentration camps on Martinique and Guadeloupe or shipped off to the prison colony in French Guiana. Refugees from Europe were interned.

The State Department's first agreement with Robert was made in 1940. Its details have never been published, but apparently it provided that in return for our guaranty that Vichy control over American French possessions would continue undisturbed, Admiral Robert was to immobilize the three French warships in the harbor of Fort de France, a considerable quantity of French gold, and a consignment of American planes which, when the armistice was signed, had just reached Martinique en route to France. Since our warships constantly patrol the waters around Martinique, and our planes the sky over it, this concession was perhaps less the result of good-will than necessity. Robert was hardly in a position to challenge the American Caribbean fleet.

Then in July, 1941, came the surrender of Indochina to the Japanese. This demonstration of Vichy's thralldom to the Axis provoked the State Department to the extreme step of opening new negotiations with Robert. Rumors that Nazi submarines were being fueled from the French islands were denied in Washington, and since our navy was on guard it is not likely that they were true. But it is easier to blockade the shores of an island than the air waves that flow from it. All the time Robert was holding conversations with our representatives, his radio station was pouring out anti-British, pro-Vichy propaganda; it was straight Axis stuff, and it reached all the French-speaking areas of this hemisphere. If we tried to stop this poisonous flood, we failed. And we also failed to win from the Commissioner General a single new concession. The warships and planes and gold remained immobilized, but the fleet of merchant ships which we hoped to get hold of remained immobilized too.

Then came the incident of St. Pierre and Miquelon. When those islands were taken out of Vichy control by the Fighting French, Mr. Hull angrily protested the coup. And it became clear that the basis of his opposition was to be found not only in our Vichy policy as a whole but in our deal with Robert. We had pledged ourselves to back his control of French possessions in the Western Hemisphere, and the Free French had forcibly turned that pledge into the scrap of paper it deserved to be.

A new flurry of negotiation blew up in May last year, after Laval took power in France. Our government, in the words of the New York Times, "distrusted" Laval, and it expressed this bold attitude by opening new conversations with Robert, conducted by Admiral Hoover. We asked only such terms as could be accorded by Robert "with honor." But at the same time we apparently made it clear that we would deal only with Robert himself, not with Laval. Since all previous negotiations had also been with Robert, this proviso made sense only if it was to be observed by both sides. But Admiral Robert referred all our proposals to Laval and declined to give any answer until they were approved in Vichy. Our defiance was strictly a one-sided affair. And the agreement was obviously not approved in Vichy because negotiations were still going on five months later when our troops landed in North Africa and we finally broke off relations with Pétain's government.

We didn't break them off with Martinique, however. On the contrary, Mr. Hull told a press conference just after the American landings that negotiations "had reached a point where announcement of a comprehensive solution could be expected at an early date." This happy prospect was momentarily clouded by a proclamation issued by Robert appealing to all people in his domains to obey Marshal Pétain and attacking Darlan, who had just moved over to our side, for "exceeding his powers."

But no sour notes were allowed to break the harmonious accord with which the State Department and most of the press greeted the triumph of appeasement. While skeptics like ourselves were invited to eat their words, the State Department officially announced on November 21 that a satisfactory agreement had at last been reached in Martinique between Samuel Reber, the department's representative, and Admiral Robert, who had at last "detached himself wholly" from the Vichy government. (It was now admitted for the first time that hitherto the Admiral had "gone through the motions" of reporting negotiations and submitting proposals to Vichy.) The text of the "satisfactory agreement" wasn't published, but Mr. Hull announced happily that it marked the successful culmination of the negotiations initiated the previous May.

But even the most optimistic assertions couched in the most ponderous prose have a hollow sound when nothing ever happens to bear them out. Nothing happened in Martinique. Nothing. And the extent of the nothingness was treated as a diplomatic secret for another three months or so. Then, very casually, Pertinax mentioned in an article in the New York Times on February 19 that "at the eleventh hour in November Admiral Robert refused to append his signature to the treaty that Samuel Reber of the American State Department had been discussing with him for fully six months." Admiral

Robert, Pertinax pointed out, considered that the United States had invaded French North Africa, that Darlan was a traitor, and that he, Robert, was more than ever obligated to support his Marshal. Robert's obvious calculation, said Pertinax, was that no forcible steps would be taken against him by the United States.

But perhaps in the end they will be. Mr. Welles says that owing to Admiral Robert's uncooperative attitude no food has gone to Martinique since last November—when the State Department announced the definite conclusion of the "satisfactory agreement." Mr. Welles's statement, however, is denied by Representative Morrison of Louisiana, who insists that only the other day sailors on the French ship Guadeloupe went on strike rather than carry more foodstuffs to pro-Vichy Martinique. The food situation there is desperate. Natives who can escape are leaving for neighboring islands in small boats, and discontent is rising. So far the diplomatic situation is unchanged. "Conversations" are still going on—presumably at the same crisp pace as during the past nearly three years—and the State Department is still waiting for some "affirmative program" of cooperation with the United States in prosecuting the war. No threats have been made. But the heart has gone out of the affair.

And now, to complete its collapse, French Guiana has suddenly, and peaceably, broken away from Admiral Robert and announced its adhesion to Fighting France. After a first announcement that the colony had declared for Giraud, word came that a De Gaullist acting governor had been chosen, to be replaced by Maurice Bertaut, now chief administrator of Free French colonies in Africa, as soon as he arrives from the Cameroons. It is not expected that the United States, at this hour of crumbling faith, will try to dislodge the rebels against Robert. The story of St. Pierre and Miquelon will not be repeated. We may even hope that the remaining supporters of appeasement will finally surrender and allow decency and common sense to take charge.

Martinique and Guadeloupe guard the southern approaches to the Panama Canal. There are no more important islands in the whole Caribbean chain of defenses. They have remained long enough in the hands of our enemies. The time has come to call off the hypocritical pretense that we were slowly winning the cooperation of their Vichy ruler. We have won nothing we needed to bargain for. Robert has yielded nothing he hoped to keep. Pro-Allied political prisoners are still in jail; anti-Allied political propaganda still goes out over the Martinique radio; Robert still holds the merchant ships, the warships, the planes, and the gold. The endless negotiations have been a farce. The claims of success issued by the State Department have been a series of deceptions. The time has come to call the game off.

The Farm Bloc Goes to War

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 22

THE farm bloc is on its way to wrecking both Selective Service and price control. The Senate last week passed the Bankhead-Johnson bill to provide blanket deferment of farm workers. The House approved the Pace bill to include in parity prices all increases in farm labor costs since the base period 1909-14. The latter, if it is passed by the Senate, as is probable, will add another billion dollars to the nation's food bill. The former will certainly pass the House, and probably run into a Presidential veto. Unless the veto is sustained by Congress, the Bankhead-Johnson bill is likely to open the door to a series of special deferment measures that may have serious consequences for the conduct of the war. The farm problem is here again.

At the outset it is useful to correct a few misconceptions. The farmer, by and large, is not so badly off as he is said to be. Whatever the woes of the smaller farmer, for the man or corporation with capital agriculture has never been a more profitable business than it is today. Studies made by the OPA show that from 1939 to 1942 farm prices increased two and a half times as much as wage costs per unit of output and four times as much as total costs per unit of output. The big farmer and the middle farmer can well afford to give the hired man a raise. In agriculture as in industry there has been increased mechanization, and labor costs per unit have fallen. In 1942 the output per farm worker was 23 per cent greater than in 1939 and 78 per cent greater than in the base period 1909-14. The man with the hoe is receding into the past with Longfellow's smith.

The year just past was the best year in the history of American agriculture. Production was 13 per cent better than in 1941. Per capita farm income was 116 per cent above 1939 in terms of dollars and 72 per cent above in terms of purchasing power. In the same period the farmer's share of the consumer's dollar rose 27 per cent, and the rate of return on the farmer's investment went from 4.2 per cent in 1939 to the highest on record, 13.4 per cent, in 1942. Government bounty kept pace with the upward curve of war prosperity. Government payments to farmers in 1942 were $697,000,000, or almost one-fifth more than in 1941.

The farmer has done much better in this war than in the last. In the last war rising prices for the things the farmer had to buy took back his increased income from the things he had to sell, and he was left to face the post-war deflation with a greatly expanded indebtedness. From 1914 to 1919 farm indebtedness rose 60 per cent; from 1939 to 1942 it rose 1 per cent. The farmer's cash income in 1942 was 7 per cent greater than in 1919, the best year of the last war period, and net income of farm operators was 46 per cent greater. These percentages are based on figures in dollars. When the dollars are translated into terms of purchasing power, one can see how greatly the farmer has benefited from the price control he is doing his best to destroy. In terms of purchasing power, cash income in 1942 was not 7 but 40 per cent over 1919, and net income was not 11 but 46 per cent greater. By contrast, the price increases in the last war were largely illusion. Between 1914 and 1919 the rise in net income per capita on the farm was 128 per cent in terms of dollars but only 13 per cent in terms of what the dollar would buy. The farm bloc seems intent on putting the dollar on the toboggan again.

These figures are intended to refute the Weeping Willies of the Farm Bureau Federation, the stuffed shirts of the Grange, and the puppets of the great dairy co-operatives. They are not intended to give sustenance to complacency. For behind the rising profit curves and the glowing averages are hidden wide areas of rural misery. Our growing army, military and industrial, has been reducing the quantity and quality of farm labor at a time when we must prepare to feed the world. The farm problem is far from being synthetic, but the real problem is only in part the one over which the farm bloc is exercised. The big farmer—the dairy business man, the planter, and the corporate grower-processor—with whose welfare the so-called farm bloc is primarily concerned, are out to do exactly what their counterparts in manufacturing and mining want to do—sell the idea that the way to get increased production is to allow increased prices. The farm bloc is more successful because a corporation looks more appealing in overalls than in a silk hat.

Unfortunately, in agriculture as in industry experience has demonstrated that we cannot rely on the price mechanism of the classic free market to mobilize facilities for a total effort in a total war. In the last war, for example, farm prices rose 111 per cent in 1914-19, but production increased only 6 per cent. It takes planning and direction to expand output on the farm, as it does in the mine and factory, and it takes social vision. Left to itself, big agriculture will gravitate naturally to the profitable rather than the useful crop. There is a boom in tobacco; returns to the tobacco farmer last year were almost twice the 1934-38 average, and expanded cigarette production eats into supplies of sugar, glycerin, and diethylene glycol. Government warehouses are providing a rich market for short-staple cotton, of which we have a huge surplus. Last August the government owned 10,455,000 bales. Maybe we can sell it to Japan when the war is over.

Kilgore of West Virginia, in an able address on the floor of the Senate last Tuesday, indicated what a little planning could do for the farm problem. On the basis of our 1943 production goals, we will devote 1,024,000,000 man-hours on the farm to short-staple cotton and 308,000,000 man-hours to tobacco. By comparison we will give 228,000,000 man-hours to wheat and 1,300,000,000 to corn. Of total man-hours in agriculture, only 2.7 per cent will go to truck and garden crops; 1 per cent to sugar beets; 2.4 per cent to white potatoes; 1.5 per cent to soy beans; 3.4 per cent to peanuts. The production of munitions has cut into the production of fertilizer. Tobacco and cotton are using a third of our fertilizer. "I have frequently been told," Senator Kilgore said, "that we must grow short-staple cotton and plenty of it, in order to obtain the necessary vegetable oil from the cotton seed . . . it takes more acreage to produce oil from cotton than from any other crop which is oil producing." It takes one and one-third to one and one-half acres of cotton and 132 man-hours of work to produce 100 pounds of oil from cotton. It takes from five-tenths to six-tenths of an acre and $6\frac{1}{2}$ man-hours to get the same yield from soy beans. The farm labor shortage is in part a shortage in social planning and social intelligence.

There are three solutions to the farm problem. One is to stop raising high-labor-cost crops we don't need and switch to low-labor-cost crops we do need. This would cost the farm bloc money. The second is to provide the poor farmer, who now does little more than scratch the earth for subsistence, with the capital that would make it possible for him to produce for the market. This is the FSA's function, and the FSA is marked for the guillotine. The trouble with the FSA, as Lambertson of Kansas said very frankly on the floor of the House a year ago, is that it turns farm laborers—and potential farm laborers—into independent farmers. The third solution is to better the condition of farm labor. This also finds no favor with the farm bloc. The Farm Bureau-inspired Cannon resolution to recruit labor for the farm provides dourly that nothing shall be done under it "directly or indirectly to fix, regulate, or impose minimum wages or housing standards, to regulate hours of work, or to impose or enforce collective bargaining."

The mind of the big farmer and the mind of the brass hat work the same way, though their function and interest push them in different directions. Both would substitute compulsion for intelligent planning. The big farmer wants a compulsory deferment of all farm workers, whatever the cost to the war effort; the brass hat wants compulsory service, at whatever cost in morale. Better utilization of labor and facilities is the real answer. But this answer requires the subordination of private interest and judgment to the necessities of the war.

"It seems to me," Pepper of Florida said to the Senate Wednesday in his lonely fight against the Bankhead-Johnson bill, "that the great difficulty with our whole war program is that too often we have approached it piecemeal." This is, indeed, the basic defect of our war effort, and it springs from the habits developed in an over-individualistic society. The farm-labor problem is only one aspect of the man-power problem, and the army chiefs have helped create it by grabbing for men in the spirit of a manufacturer grabbing for markets. Concentrating on their immediate problem, the heads of the army and navy have allowed the man-power program, as Maloney of Connecticut said, "to grow like Topsy on one side of a Chinese wall" while the production program grew up on the other. "Either," Senator Maloney urged, "we must merge them harmoniously into one program to keep the civilian economy working—and feeding and supplying our mammoth army—or the conflict between the production and the man-power programs will tear the economy apart and prevent us from supplying our army."

Lack of such an over-all program and war authority, with definite policies on occupational deferment, is a threat to the armed services, though they have been the chief opponents of such a program. Bankhead wants to defer all farmers; Downey all transportation workers; Kilday all fathers. Bankhead and Bushfield have a new bill which would go farther and furlough farmers now in the army so they can plant and harvest their crops. With wise planning, the large army the War Department wants is within our power; lack of planning is finding a reflection in defeatist thinking. Pepper and Kilgore sought unsuccessfully to head off the Bankhead-Johnson bill with an amended and simplified version of the Pepper-Kilgore-Tolan bill which would make over-all planning possible and give the war effort centralized direction. But though they won the support of such Republicans as Vandenberg, Austin, and Danaher, the Administration leaders gave them the cold shoulder, and there were but nine votes—the others were Murdock, O'Mahoney, Thomas of Utah, and Tunnell—for their substitute measure. Though planning of this kind is the only hope of fighting off these disastrous blanket deferment measures and supporting a great army, a curious cabal in which the military bureaucracy and Administration leaders joined hands with Reynolds and Wheeler was formed last month to fight the Pepper-Kilgore-Tolan measure. It took the bill from the Senate Labor and Education Committee and handed it over to the unfriendly Military Affairs Committee. Of what use to talk of post-war planning if we cannot bring ourselves even to plan the war?

What Eden Is After

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, March 20

A RELIABLE report from the British embassy says that Anthony Eden is pleased with the way his talks in the United States are going. This is good news. Eden came here seeking, above all, a permanent basis for American-British friendship. From the British point of view, this requires that America should be willing to play a role in world politics when peace ends its role in the world war. Eden pleased means that Eden has found reason to hope that the permanent basis will in time be established.

It has been possible lately to apply to United States diplomacy the epithet Winston Churchill invented for Russia—"an enigma wrapped in a mystery." In working for the smooth development of Anglo-American relations Eden has been hampered by ignorance of this country's intentions: did it want continued close co-operation with Britain after the war? Words about post-war aims flowed from Secretary of State Hull, Under Secretary Welles, and Vice-President Wallace, but deeds did not follow words. The Administration preached global morality, but did it want global responsibility? Was President Roosevelt satisfied with enunciating the Four Freedoms and the Atlantic Charter, or did he view those great statements as the foundation for an active American internationalism? Eden hoped, it is reported, that by going to Washington he could lure American foreign policy from its dim shadows.

Washington's vagueness in foreign policy is the vagueness of indecision, and Eden in the 1930's learned that indecision was calamity's herald. The dictators knew what they wanted, but the democracies could not make up their minds about how to keep the dictators from getting what they wanted. International political action invariably was postponed until political action was too late. For five years Eden observed from the inside the results of indecision in foreign affairs. Now he believes in action taken in time. He believes the United States should make a decision for the coming days of peace.

It is known that Eden came with many items on his agenda. He has seen Secretary of War Stimson and Secretary of the Navy Knox on military affairs. The groundwork has been laid for concrete discussion later of American use of island bases under British control in the Pacific. The first steps have been taken on the long road toward an understanding about commercial air routes. American-Chinese relations, excellent as they already were, have been bettered by an improvement in British-Chinese relations brought about by Eden's sincere assurance to T. V. Soong, the Chinese Foreign Minister, whose headquarters are in Washington, that Great Britain means to reopen the Burma road and free Chinese soil from the enemy. For the past twelve years Great Britain has been steadily falling in Chinese esteem. Now Eden has set about reversing this process.

In the White House Eden and President Roosevelt have talked about the questions on which American policy has been most enigmatic—Russia and France. The British Foreign Secretary wants a strong France in the post-war world so that England will have a useful friend in Western Europe. He has adopted a formal plan for cooperation with Russia. On these matters Great Britain and the United States diverge somewhat, though they are not definitely at odds. Within the Administration there are a dozen opinions about Russia, ranging from the advocacy of friendship by Harry Hopkins and Henry Wallace to the apprehension of the Office of Strategic Services and the Berle corner in the State Department. The only policy followed has been that of sending up trial balloons. Washington has been afraid to come to grips with the problem of Russia.

The Eden conversations about Russia have turned on the current difficulty of the Polish-Russian border. The British, out of gratitude to the Red Army, are said to be willing to let the Soviet Union have the Baltic states and eastern Poland, while the United States maintains that the future status of those regions is a problem to be decided on principle when the war is over. The praise President Roosevelt gave the Chinese in a press conference for their renunciation of territorial claims against Thailand was a mild warning to Russia on Poland and the Baltic. In the disagreement between the United States and Russia about what territory Russia should claim now, the Russophobes see reason for haughtiness toward Moscow. This is the summit of illogic. The only way the United States can uphold its views respecting Poland and the Baltic states is by establishing a system of lasting cooperation with Russia. An aloof America will not be heard in Moscow. The British regard Russia's territorial claims in Eastern Europe as reflections of its concern about security and defense. The question posed for Washington by Eden's presence is whether the United States will give Russia the better assurance of security that would come from a friendly understanding.

From the day General de Gaulle arrived in England, the British and American governments have had their separate views about him and about France. Washington embraced Vichy and since 1940 has smiled on every variety of Frenchmen except the tough breed that followed De Gaulle. The British, though they found the General difficult, came to admire him and have treated him fairly. In Washington, however, for more than a year the De Gaulle representative was admitted to the State Department only after dark; quarters for the De Gaulle delegation were found by the British embassy; the niece of Ambassador Halifax obtained publicity for it.

By the time Eden decided to visit the United States this strange American attitude was hindering the orderly development of his hopes for the post-war world. Distaste for De Gaulle made it easy for Washington to welcome Admiral Darlan, Marcel Peyrouton, and General Noguès as American allies in the job of beating the Germans and freeing France. French fears and dissensions threatened all Eden's planning. The strong France Eden wants when peace comes is a distant prospect so long as Frenchmen outside their country quarrel. Washington and London disagreed even about why the French quarreled. London thought all honest Frenchmen were naturally protesting against the Allies' dealings with dishonest Frenchmen. Washington insisted that the clamor was the work of a De Gaullist clique.

The British view, since it was the correct view, was gaining acceptance at the White House and State Department even before Eden's arrival. The Administration had secretly sent to North Africa an agent who was largely responsible for inducing General Giraud to relax the Vichy laws and thus prepare the way for a meeting between him and De Gaulle. Still mysterious, however, the Administration conceals the identity of this agent and refuses to admit that it was wrong in encouraging relations with the Vichy system in Africa and in raising Vichy men to power. The chastisement of the Richelieu sailors is further evidence of the Administration's determination to remain enigmatic in foreign policy; evidence, too, that while it may learn to dislike the heirs of Vichy it will only slowly, if ever, come to like De Gaulle.

The enigma of American policy toward France and Frenchmen is inherent in the enigmatic policy of "expediency." Here, again, London and Washington diverge. London learned after Munich that lives saved by expediency today are sacrificed a hundredfold tomorrow. Having apparently learned nothing from expediency in Africa, the Administration has been toying with the idea of laying the groundwork for expediency in Italy and Central Europe. One of Eden's jobs over here has been to point out the dangers of such a course. Hungary is an excellent test-tube for expediency, and some officials active in foreign affairs have been tempted by it. Nicholas Horthy, the Regent of Hungary, is an accomplished despot who saved his skin by going to work for Hitler. The strongest man in Hungary, he looks attractive to naive officials who think that realism in international relations has its best expression in deals with such toadies. The channel from Horthy to Washington is open; the American Hungarian Federation, praised in Horthy's Hungary, has its place in a program to explain Horthy's Hungary to the outside world. When the federation held a meeting in Bridgeport, Connecticut, on January 31, the big moment was the reading of a letter of praise from A. A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State.

THE PATIENT IS IMMUNE

Expediency really only mirrors the general indecisiveness that chains Washington. England is better able to make political decisions because it has Anthony Eden as Foreign Secretary. The Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States both devote almost all their attention to the conduct of the war. They can give small thought to political matters unrelated to today's campaigns. The British Foreign Secretary, however, has seized the initiative and evolved his own plan of political action for peace. He has reason to believe that he will become Prime Minister, and this belief gives him the courage to be independent. The Secretary of State in the President's Cabinet, on the other hand, must wait for a word from above before launching a policy, for Mr. Hull is a hesitant man. Under Secretary Welles is a man of action but too low in the official hierarchy to inaugurate major policy. The President makes his own contribution to America's mysterious diplomacy by including Myron Taylor among his regular advisers on post-war problems. What Myron Taylor says when he visits the Vatican as the President's special envoy has always been carefully withheld from the American public. Perhaps Anthony Eden in his many talks at the White House has been able to learn the facts about Taylor. At any rate, those talks must have forced Mr. Roosevelt to consider the need for definite post-war political thinking now. And he must have received another push in this direction from the public applause for the famous resolution of Senators Ball, Burton, Hill, and Hatch.

The British are not without fault in foreign relations. They invented the Spanish policy which the United States assiduously follows. They are stubborn on India, where the State Department, without saying so publicly, thinks they could take steps which would allay some of the political passions disturbing India. But they are headed in the right direction.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

RUSSIAN SIGNATURES have been attached to a treaty of peace at Brest-Litovsk, and the Allies confront a situation which calls for the highest wisdom, caution, and resolution. Not that we need special insight to understand the German purpose. This is now as plain as day. The disappearance of Russia as a military power is to be followed by the crushing of the Revolution. The Revolution is to be encompassed on all sides by fortresses of reaction garrisoned by German influence. German militarism has flung a challenge to the moral sentiment of the world. . . . Russia must be saved for the community of free nations.—March 7, 1918.

IN REAFFIRMING Mooney's death sentence the Supreme Court of California evaded what looks to the outsider like its responsibility by basing itself on a question of jurisdiction. . . . With the nation aroused over what seemed palpable evidence of persecution in the original trial, with large sections of labor so bitter that Secretary Wilson's commission recommended some interference with the sentence as almost imperative, with opinion in Russia vehemently protesting, the court has spent its time looking for "errors in the record."—March 7, 1918.

UPTON SINCLAIR'S—A Monthly Magazine—For a Clean Peace and the Internation. (Advt.)—March 7, 1918.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION [of Los Angeles] has unanimously condemned the debating of peace in the . . . schools. A group of seven high schools . . . on March 1 debated the subject: "Resolved, that the nations of the world should adopt the program of the League to Enforce Peace." This so incensed the members of the school board that they passed the resolution above mentioned and gave the Superintendent of Schools power to suppress peace discussion.—March 14, 1918.

GERMAN AIR RAIDERS attacked London and Paris during the week. In London eleven were killed and forty-six wounded on the night of March 7. . . . On the night of March 8 German aviators raided Paris in the greatest raid of the war there. . . . In this attack thirteen were killed and fifty hurt. The British bombed the Daimler motor works in Stuttgart and dropped bombs on Tourcoing.—March 14, 1918.

THE BOOK SENSATION of the Year: "Oscar Wilde, His Life and Confessions," by Frank Harris, with "Memories of Oscar Wilde," by Bernard Shaw. "An excellent biography, intimate, sympathetic, yet rigidly honest."—H. L. Mencken, in Smart Set. "A candid, revealing, and noble piece of literature. A book more important than anything Wilde ever did."—Floyd Dell, in the Masses. (Advt.)—March 28, 1918.

PRESIDENT WILSON has asked boys to enlist for farm work, while the Departments of Labor and of Agriculture are making every effort to remove the labor shortage that may endanger the spring crops and later harvest.—March 28, 1918.

Nazis Can Be Made Over

BY HIRAM MOTHERWELL

CAN the world reasonably expect the German people to become free and responsible before the present generation of Hitler-educated youth has become aged, or died off—many decades from now? Can the millions of young men and women who have been scientifically shaped to Nazism's mental and emotional requirements ever be de-educated? I believe they can be, and that they will be much more swiftly than one might fairly expect. Nor is my belief, or hope, based on any wishful misapprehension concerning the thoroughness of the indoctrination.

Hitler youth has been drilled to Nazism in brain, heart, and muscle—especially muscle. The basic technique of Nazi "education," capturing the child at the age of four or earlier, appears to have been to condition his primary physical reflexes to automatic obedience. At the command "Heil Hitler," his right hand shoots upward. Judgment and reflection are by-passed; the habit of muscular response actually fixes patterns of thought. The purpose of the mass athletic drills to which the young people are subjected is to build not only pliable bodies but pliable minds. Hitler education of youth has been imposed with the methodical thoroughness which the skilled animal trainer uses in teaching the "high school" horse or the circus seal.

But emotions are bound to bob up somewhere to disturb the mechanical process. So Nazi education has sought to seize one of the primary infantile loyalties and divert it away from the natural father toward the Ersatz father, Hitler. The basic emotional loyalty of the boy to his first hero is methodically directed away from the family to the tribal father, the symbol of the state. The girl, equally deprived of her father, is early offered a substitute in the image of a future handsome Nazi warrior with whom she shall lie on the hillside under the stars to produce new warriors for the Reich. She becomes, almost from babyhood, a mystic spouse of Hitler in the best medieval manner.

Where Mütterchen fits into this picture is not clear. In Hitler's symbolism it has apparently not been easy to find an Ersatz satisfaction for the mother-longing. It would seem that Nazi education has been obliged to dodge that challenge, with results terrible for Germany's victims and probably for all German youth.

German primary education, with its rigid order and physical punishments, has long been held chiefly responsible for the widespread German masochism, which expressed itself in the highest child-suicide rate on earth.

Hitler, while intensifying the rigidity, appears to have tried to release the resulting emotional tensions in an official sexual morality of "animal freedom" which makes emotion a minimum nuisance to the Nazi state. The soldier is encouraged to visit the brothel as regularly as the latrine, and for comparable reasons. There is less romance in such a "natural" life than on the stud farm, where at least some selectivity is observed. Süsse Gretchen and holde Kätzchen, romantic projections of the mother-image, exist no more in Germany—not if the Nazis can suppress them. Perhaps the psychiatrists will decide that the tortured peoples of conquered Europe have paid fearfully for Hitler's attempt to exclude "mother," except as a brood mare, from the official scheme of things.

The problem of disciplining the brain—or rather of providing Nazi outlets for the ambitions of the personal ego—does not seem to have presented the Nazi "educators" with similar perplexities. Between rigid walls marked verboten each Nazi youngster can march straight ahead toward a career that is open to his talents. Controlled by an almost muscular response to orders and undisturbed by the primary pressures of sexual emotion, his mind without question devotes its high technical aptitudes to the service of the Nazi state.

This Nazi-manufactured education may appear on first consideration to be proof against antidote. But I venture to suggest that just because it is so scientifically thorough it will on armistice day cease to control the German mind. All systems of automatic obedience dissolve when the expected commands cease to be transmitted in perfect detail. The trained seal flops helplessly when a stranger attempts to put it through its routine. German education of youth has been built upon Hitler's personal authority. When Hitler vanishes, therefore, the average Hitler-trained German will be a lost individual. Because he has been conditioned solely to automatic response he will not know what to think. Instead of a nation of young goosesteppers we shall probably see a nation of bewildered anarchists.

Hitler's success in regimenting the minds and emotions of the German people has of course not been uniform. Remember that he has had formal charge of the educating business for only ten years. For convenience we may divide his pupils arbitrarily into several categories: those who were four to ten years old when he came to power and are now fourteen to twenty; those who were ten to seventeen and are now twenty to twenty-seven; those who were seventeen to twenty-five and are now twenty-seven to thirty-five; those who were twenty-five to fifty-five and were actively promoting their careers; and finally those over fifty-five who had acquired a "settled" attitude toward life. Let us do a little guessing as to the degree to which Hitler has succeeded in fixing the muscles and hearts and brains of each age-group in permanent patterns.

The littlest ones, those who in 1933 were four to ten, have doubtless achieved a fairly complete emotional transference from father dependence to Hitler dependence. We hear gruesome stories of kids denouncing their fathers and mothers to the Gestapo for "treachery" to the Führer. And their Hitler dependence probably has a fairly chronic infantile character, since they are not permitted to acquire the adult liberty of independent judgment. Hence, it is fair to conclude, when Hitler vanishes—when father, so to speak, walks out on them—they will blindly seek to return to their own fathers. But these they have betrayed emotionally—and in many cases politically and criminally. They will therefore almost certainly form a "lost generation" mentally and morally, burdened with psychopathic guilt.

The next age-group provides today precisely the front-line fighters, the cream of Hitler's army. These are the men whose adolescent emotions and erotic ambitions were diverted away from home with Käthchen toward romantic death on the battlefield. And exactly there they lie—hundreds of thousands of corpses before Stalingrad, Rostov, Vyazma, and Schlüsselsburg. This age-group, which is the one on which Hitler has most depended for thick-and-thin support, is also precisely the one which has been killed off at the highest rate by the war. It may continue to cherish its romantic aberrations in perverted forms after the war. But a full half, perhaps, of its members will be permanently missing, or helpless cripples, in the new Germany. What the women of this age-group—two for every man—will think of their Hitler-spouse and the ways in which they will express their contempt for his impotence are matters upon which the psychiatrists are doubtless now pondering.

The seventeens to twenty-fives had their emotional patterns fairly well fixed by the time Hitler took charge of them. They were already working in the grooves of the old Prussian-Weimar, aristocratic-industrial society. Hitler bullied and blackmailed them. Some went into concentration camps; some into Nazi service. But the subconscious behavior habits of most of them could not have been greatly affected by any adult education Hitler imposed. When the Nazi pressure vanishes, they will seek escape from the failure in which they have been imprisoned and attempt to rebuild their shattered egos.

Those who were twenty-five to fifty-five when Hitler began issuing orders were probably not emotionally indoctrinated by Nazism at all. They merely made the best deal they could with life, and when they realize that this deal was disastrous for them they will hunt desperately for a new place in the world. Those who were over fifty-five were fixed in their habits, and the Führer never seriously bothered with them.

The conclusion would seem to be, then, that the original four-to-ten group will be emotionally helpless and anarchic when the war ends. The ten-to-seventeen group—potentially the most dangerous—will have been in large measure killed off and will be numerically the least influential of all. The seventeen-to-twenty-five group will be mainly preoccupied with the search for new jobs and opportunities. The twenty-five-to-fifty-five group will be disposed to grasp any means of survival offered. And the over-fifty-five group will be politically meaningless.

All these groups have depended, in their several ways, on "certainty" for their emotional foundation. The German craving for certainty is not entirely peculiar; our Puritan forefathers had it. But when certainty vanishes, Germans are emotionally lost. Since the entire Nazi system of education is built upon the certainty that Hitler is supremely wise and incarnates the satisfaction of all human desires, his departure from the syllogism will, I believe, bring about the de-education of Nazi Germany almost overnight. On armistice day and for months thereafter the effects of Hitler education will be moral and emotional chaos.

The practical political conclusions which can be drawn from this are fairly obvious. First, reeducation of German youth cannot be done by school teachers with textbooks in classrooms. Second, it cannot be done by punishment inflicted from outside, simply because such punishment would appear petty in comparison with the vengeance wreaked on the German people by the war itself and the slaughter which will certainly be perpetrated by the outraged victims of the Nazis. Third, it cannot be done by early encouragement of democratic processes of government. One of the sacred duties of democracy is to vote for whom you damn please. The Germans, if told that, simply would not know what you were talking about. They would ask, "But whom should we vote for?" Dr. Egon Ranshofer-Wertheimer, in his book "Victory Is Not Enough," has emphasized that the German appreciates orders, not negotiations. We must give commands to this bewildered, post-war Hitler youth, and especially to the middle-aged groups. Only with commands that lead to emotional satisfactions can we begin the reeducation of the suddenly de-educated.

But we must give those commands in the spirit of the new age, or else we must take the consequences. What the German wants, and has always wanted, is a useful place in an intelligible plan of life. He found a fanatical and perverted expression of this longing in Hitler's New Order for Europe. It is up to modern technology to offer him a place in a completely different order, a place of lasting usefulness which will open a career to his superb talents. In other words, the way to reeducate Germans is to give them useful jobs. If we have not the will or the wit to do it, there is another agent of history that can. That is Soviet Russia.

Our problem, then, is not, can Hitler youth be de-educated? but how can it be swiftly reeducated to co-operation with the civilized twentieth-century world? If we do not do that job, or if Russia does not do it, it will not be done at all, and Germany will remain the political plague center of the world.

Canada's Rising Socialists

BY FRANK UNDERHILL

Toronto, March 15

IT WAS in reference to Canada that the "good-neighbor" phrase now so popular was first officially used. You can find it in Jay's Treaty of 1794. Between that time and our own day the two North American neighbors enjoyed a century of "peace with friction" before their good neighborliness became much more than a noble experiment. But today the relations of the two governments have become so intimate that the only real threat to a continued good understanding is the persistent assumption by the southern neighbor that friendship can be maintained without his taking the trouble to make himself acquainted with what his northern neighbor is doing and thinking. Since national policies are carried out by party politicians, Americans might benefit from a knowledge of what is happening in Canadian party politics.

The two North American democracies have been distinguished from other countries in the modern world, including all the other English-speaking countries, by their persistent adherence to the two-party system. In both Canada and the United States the two parties differ from each other very little in the appeals they make to the public or the policies they carry out; both collect votes from all the major interest groups in the community. The long-continued agrarian protests against the control of government by big business have never led to the emergence of a successful national agrarian party. Industrialization has not led, as in every other country in the world, to the rise of an effective labor party. Through their constant practice of compromise and adjustment the two old parties have managed to frustrate all new third parties by taking over enough of their policies to quiet any threatened storm. Age could not wither this peculiar North American two-party system, nor custom stale its infinite variety. Or so it seemed.

In the United States it still seems so. Today, in the 1940's, there is apparently less possibility than ever of a real progressive or liberal party, representing in its philosophy and in the groups which support it a clear challenge to the forces of the right. Progressives have to get what they can from one or the other of the old parties; and the only thing that seems certain about the 1944 election is that the successful party will, as usual, collect from 50 to 60 per cent of the votes and the unsuccessful party from 40 to 50 per cent, with the other parties nowhere.

The Canadian party scene no longer presents this traditional political pattern. In fact, the classical two-party system has been disintegrating in Canada ever since the last war. Canada was in the last war from 1914 to 1918, and the strain upon its whole social system was much more severe than was the case in the United States. As one can see now, we never got back to a state of "normalcy" after it. Since 1918 no party in our federal general elections has won a majority of the votes cast, except, strangely enough, in the last election, in 1940, when Mr. King's Liberal Party got 55 per cent. The reason for this has been the appearance of new political groups whose attacks have prevented the two old parties from regaining the monopoly of politics which they enjoyed before 1914. In 1921 a rising of farmers in Ontario and the West, with the help of small labor groups in some of the Western cities, sent sixty-five "Progressive" members to the House of Commons, more than a quarter of the House. The Progressives could never quite make up their minds whether they were a new political party or not, and by the end of the twenties they were reduced to about a dozen members. For a moment it looked as if Canada were returning to the old two-party alignment of Liberals against Conservatives.

But the great depression of the 1930's led to other political upheavals. In 1932 the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was launched by a group of Western farmers and labor men, led by the stubborn remnant of the Progressives, and it came out with a definitely socialist program. A little later, in Alberta, Mr. Aberhart swept into office with his gospel of Social Credit. The C. C. F. in the two elections of 1935 and 1940 was not able to elect more than 7 members in a House of 243, although its popular vote entitled it to a good many more; and Social Credit made little progress beyond Alberta. But the present war has unsettled things still further. Conservatism had sunk by 1940 into a sectional group recruiting its supporters mainly in Ontario and New Brunswick; it was almost dead on the prairie, and Quebec never forgave it for the imposition of conscription in 1917. The Liberals remained the only national party, in the peculiar North American sense of a party which succeeds in collecting votes from all sections, classes, and religions in the country. But the Liberal government has offended both agriculture and labor in this war by its refusal to take them into a genuine partnership in the war effort, and it has failed to convince Quebec that under its leadership Canada is fighting the war as an independent nation rather than as a British colony; in consequence the long Liberal hold on the French Canadians, dating back to 1896, is breaking.

Gallup-poll figures show what has been happening in Canadian political opinion during recent months. In the next column the figures for 1940 show the percentage of votes cast for the different parties in the general election of that year. Later figures represent the samplings of the Gallup questioners. The New Democracy Party is Mr. Aberhart's Social Credit movement in its national incarnation. The Bloc Populaire Canadien is the most significant of the French Canadian groups which have emerged out of the confusion in Quebec.

	1940	Jan. 1942	Sept. 1942	Dec. 1942	Feb. 10, 1943
Liberals	55	55	39	36	32
Conservatives	31	30	23	24	27
C. C. F.	8	10	21	23	23
New Democracy	3	—	6	7	7
Bloc Populaire	—	—	—	—	7
Others	3	5	11	10	4

For Quebec and Ontario, the two largest provinces, the Gallup percentages were as follows in the survey of February 10, 1943:

	Ontario	Quebec
Liberals	32	39
Conservatives	35	14
C. C. F.	27	8
New Democracy	3	8
Bloc Populaire	0	26
Others	3	5

The two most noteworthy facts revealed by these figures are the remarkable growth of the C. C. F. in Canada as a whole and the rise of the Bloc Populaire in Quebec. In December, 1942, the C. C. F. had more popular support in the West than either Liberals or Conservatives. Its great growth in Ontario dates from the resounding South York by-election in February, 1942, in which it defeated the Conservative leader, Arthur Meighen, and drove him into private life. It has won notable by-elections in three Western provinces since then and has elected candidates in a good many municipal contests.

WHO IS FIT FOR THE ARMY?

SOURCE: SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM

GRAPHIC BY PICK-3

The Conservative Party, in a convulsive effort to escape death, resurrected Mr. Meighen as its leader in 1941, and thereby almost committed suicide. Last December it held another convention in Winnipeg and chose John Bracken, Prime Minister of Manitoba, as its leader; at the same time it drew up a new platform in favor of social security, collective bargaining, $1.10 wheat, and other policies which good Tories have always held in abhorrence. Mr. Bracken also induced it to adopt a new name, and it is now the Progressive-Conservative Party! Some simple-minded souls think that this transformation is genuine. The Liberal government has also—in the Speech from the Throne in January—begun to talk about health insurance, and has announced a parliamentary committee to study social security in general along the lines of the Beveridge Report. The fact is that both the old parties have been alarmed by the growth of the C. C. F. and are getting ready for the next election with platforms which on social questions will be hard to distinguish from the tenets of the C. C. F.

Both Liberals and Conservatives are spending a great deal of time denouncing the "regimentation" which a C. C. F. regime would produce and proclaiming their faith in private enterprise. Obviously the Conservatives hope that by dressing themselves up in progressive garments they will be the party to profit from the inevitable unpopularity of a war government when the first post-war election comes. If Liberal strength in the country is declining at the rate shown by the Gallup figures, the temptation to spring an election before the rejuvenated Conservatives are properly organized and before the C. C. F. has grown any stronger will probably be too much for Mr. King to resist. Americans, watching the flexible British parliamentary system from afar, seem to imagine that elections are brought on when a critical situation calls for consultation of the people. In fact they are brought on when the leader of the government thinks that his party is most likely to profit from them.

An election which failed to give a majority to any party would create a situation in which Liberals and Conservatives would have a strong inducement to form a coalition government—to save Canada from the horrors of socialism. There is such a coalition in office at present in British Columbia, with the C. C. F. as the official opposition. Such a realignment in national politics would produce a new two-party system with some reality in the difference between the two parties. But there are too many variables in the Canadian situation for one to be sure of anything as yet, and there is the enigma of Quebec. And perhaps one should add that for Canada to go leftward at a time when conservative hopes are reviving in both Britain and the United States would be a development without precedent.

Vox Populi, Inc.

BY ROBERT BENDINER

YOU needn't worry any more about the men at the front having no war aims. They've been quiet about the subject up to now, but that's only because they naturally wanted to wait until their chosen spokesman considered the time ripe for revealing their collective heart's desire. Now their champion has come forward, and who should it be but the Nash-Kelvinator Corporation of Detroit, Michigan?

I had forgotten all about the army's mandate to Nash-Kelvinator, and so it was with some surprise that I read the seven-column ad in the New York Times a few weeks ago in which that great-hearted corporation spoke out in its name. It was a huge, stirring layout, featuring a square-jawed gunner, alert in his "bubble of glass" at the tip of a Flying Fortress, waiting for a Messerschmitt to swoop past out of an inky sky. The copy was headed "Until I Come Back . . ." and it was a message to the folks back home which the gunner—and all his fighting fellows—had presumably decided to send through the Nash-Kelvinator Corporation.

"They say America will be a lot different after this war," the gunner muses in fourteen-point bold. "Well, maybe so. But as for me, I know the score. . . . I know there's only one decent way to live in this world—the way my folks lived and the way I want to live." And here comes the real business end of the message: "When you find a thing that works as good as that, brother, be careful with that monkey-wrench."

Planners and professional good-doers, if ever you feel tempted to free anyone from want or fear, just remember that Nash-Kelvinator gunner out there over the Zuyder Zee. He's in an ugly mood. Listen: "And there's one little spot—well, if they do as much as change the smell of the corner drugstore—I will murder the guy. I want my girl back, just as she is, and that bungalow on Maple Avenue. . . . I want that old roll-top desk of mine at the electric company, with a chance to move upstairs or quit if I want to. I want to see that old school of mine, and our church, just as they are—because I want my kids to go there. That's my home town. Keep it for me the way I remember it, just the way I see it now—until I come back."

Can't you picture the scene? The men climb wearily out of the big plane. "Whew! it's good to be back after that one," says Navigator Joe Bojkiechowski, left tackle, Notre Dame '39.

"Damn right," says Forward Gunner Swanson. "Never seen such flak in all my life."

"Thought we were done for a couple of times this trip," chimes in Tail Gunner Jacobs.

"Geez," says Bojkiechowski, "hope we're not being knifed at home while we're goin' through this hell."

"What do you mean 'knifed'?" asks Swanson.

"Well, I want to find my girl just as I left her when I get back to that bungalow on Maple Avenue," answers Bojkiechowski. "I want to be sure the New Deal ain't changed her none."

"Yeh, that's right," says Jacobs. "And I want to be sure those bureaucrats in Washington don't tell Consolidated Ashcan that they can't fire me if they want to. And that goes for the union, too."

"You bet," says Swanson. "My dad writes that they're talking about tearing down the shanty I was raised in to make room for some new government houses near Bridgeport. I don't mind as long as they just talk. But if they rip up that shack and put my mother in one of those new houses with all kinds of fancy gadgets, I'll go back there and murder 'em."

"Sure," says Jacobs, "here we are fightin' our guts out to keep things just the way they always were—no changes, no improvements—and these guys back home foolin' around with monkey-wrenches. We oughta do something. But who we got to talk for us?"

"I got it!" yells Bojkiechowski. "Nash-Kelvinator—that's the ticket for us!"

"Who's this Nash-Kelvinator, Joe? I never heard of him," says Jacobs.

"Him! It ain't a him, you sap. It's a great big humanitarian institution that makes iceboxes and fluid-drive cars. It's a big, generous corporation that speaks up for you and me against all those bureaucrats in Washington that are always trying to free us from want and stuff. What say we send a cable?"

And so Nash-Kelvinator became the voice of the A. E. F.

One month later it branched out and became the voice of the American people, too. I know because I spotted a companion seven-column ad in the Times. This one, captioned "When You Come Back to Me . . .," shows a stout-hearted lass frozen in a Mrs. Miniver chin-up attitude against the background of a bleak winter scene. She is probably Mrs. Bojkiechowski. Through the courtesy of Nash-Kelvinator she speaks for us all:

"When you come back to me," she whispers across the Atlantic, "you will find nothing changed. Those left at home promise that. . . . You've said, 'Don't let anyone tamper with a way of living that works so well.' Never fear, darling, that's the way we all want it."

"And now," I can almost hear her murmur, "And now, darling, a message from our sponsor." For in a modest benday strip superimposed over Mrs. Miniver-Bojkiechowski's left elbow and extending to the snow-covered tree on the left are the miniature figures of a shiny car and a handsome refrigerator, and beneath these the legend: "Nash-Kelvinator. In War, Builders of Pratt and Whitney Engines and Hamilton Standard Propellers. In Peace, Nash Automobiles, Kelvinator Refrigerators, and Appliances."

Ah, fluid drive! Electric refrigeration! That's the primitive way Bojkiechowski's folks had always lived, and their folks before them. No changes, no improvements—the very spirit of American advertising.

In the Wind

HOWARD Y. WILLIAMS, field director of the Union for Democratic Action, recently wrote an open letter to Eddie Rickenbacker deflating his arguments against labor and advising him to stick to the facts. The letter was read into the Congressional Record by Senators Coffee and Guffey, both New Dealers. Last week came Rickenbacker's answer: "Dear Mr. Williams: I more than appreciate the thoughts expressed in yours of February 23, as well as the inclosed [U. D. A.] Bulletin, and want you to know that such words of encouragement make me realize my efforts are not in vain."

AT THE NEW ENGLAND Inter-American Institute, held at Boston University recently, Mexico's only representative was Rudolfo Brito Foucher, a personal acquaintance of Hitler and Franco. As rector of the National University of Mexico Foucher conducted a purge of pro-Allied professors. He was invited to take part in the institute on the recommendation of the Pan-American Union, which said, according to Dr. Daniel Marsh, president of Boston University, that he was probably the most representative Latin American educator.

AFTER FIVE YEARS of lawsuits, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen has won a victory over the Elgin, Joliet, and Eastern Railway. The question at issue, which finally reached the Illinois Supreme Court, was whether the railroad should obey an order of the State Commerce Commission requiring it to replace the pail-and-dipper drinking facilities in its cabooses with sanitary cups and coolers.

FESTUNG EUROPA: Since the appearance of anti-Nazi slogans on walls in the Belgian village of Meirelbeke, the villagers have been forced to mount guard near walls suitable for slogan-writing. . . . Some Belgian factories have stopped providing soup for their workers because they can't get anything with which to make it. . . . In Czecho-Slovakia the names of executed patriots are announced on billboards. . . . Two Norwegian women's magazines have been suspended because of a leading article in their New Year's issues extending the season's greetings to "all good Norwegians." . . . And this is a Nazi joke, from Berlin's Illustrierte Zeitung: A woman is dying and her husband asks if she has a last wish. "Yes," she whispers, "apple tart with cream." The husband replies sternly, "This isn't the time to eat, it's the time to die."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Second Front

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

WHETHER the Nazi attack in the Kharkov area has a limited objective—to keep the Soviet air force from the oil fields of Rumania, for example, or to achieve a better strategic position, or to re-establish morale at home—or whether it marks the beginning of another great offensive, the indisputable fact is that the Germans have regained the initiative in the east, at least partially, and have thus reopened the issue of the second front.

That a second front in Europe was bound to become again a matter of controversy was easy to foresee. During the winter the discussion temporarily died down. This was not only because the Russians were advancing vigorously all along the line but also, and more particularly, because of the hopes aroused by the invasion of North Africa. For the second time in one year public opinion in the United Nations expected a great British-American offensive. The first time was in June, when a communiqué issued after several days of conversation in Washington between President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill led people to believe that the second front was only a matter of weeks. The landing of the Americans in North Africa created even greater expectations—expectations which were dampened but not dispelled by the long stalemate in Tunisia. And the Casablanca conference, with its guarded but definite promises of aggressive action, revived hope in Europe as well as in this hemisphere.

With this background, no one can pretend surprise if in the weeks to come the clamor for a second front should take on new vehemence or if we should begin to hear new and more bitter complaints from the Russians. Let us suppose that for one reason or another the start of a British-American offensive is delayed until after the end of May and that the Russians are faced once more with the necessity of resisting the entire weight of the Nazi army. If that should happen we may be sure that the question of the second front will assume proportions which may well threaten the unity of the Allied nations. That's the moment for which the Nazi propaganda machine is waiting.

Just one thing might serve to reduce the danger of open discord and deprive Goebbels of an invaluable political weapon. If a Council of the United Nations could be established within the next few weeks empowered to plan over-all strategy on both the political and the military front—strategy based on a clear and straightforward democratic program—then even a delay in opening the offensive in the west would arouse less anger and suspicion. It is to be hoped that Mr. Eden in his conversations at Washington has succeeded in clearing the air. If he is able to establish even the beginning of genuine cooperation between Russia and the Western powers, he will have achieved a major diplomatic triumph. But the outlook is not very bright.

During the last three months anti-Russian feeling in the United States has been growing. This was evident in the editorials which appeared in some of the most powerful newspapers on the occasion of Stalin's recent Order to the Red Army. It was evident in the declaration of Ambassador Standley and in the reception that declaration had in the press and in Congress. In fact, this feeling has been germinating ever since the first great Russian victories at the beginning of the year.

Dr. Goebbels knew very well what he was doing when he revived the boggy of bolshevism in Europe. His numerous agents in the United States undoubtedly informed him that, not only in isolationist circles but even among many strong supporters of American intervention now and after the war, the prospect of a powerful, victorious Russia was looked upon with dread. It is this state of mind which has enabled the Nazis to win every important political battle of the last ten years. Throughout this period Hitler has always maneuvered to inject Russia as an element of division into every serious effort to build a strong anti-fascist world coalition.

"We're Coming, Joel!"

Courtesy the London Tribune

The technique employed by the forces of reaction to frighten the left and paralyze its efforts to wage the war as a struggle against fascism has frequently been denounced in these columns. I would recall one article published nearly two years ago under the title The Blackmail of the Right. The reactionaries have only to point to a man and call him a "Bolshevik agent" to make him cower and draw back. They have even enjoyed the collaboration of certain Socialists and liberals who, in their hate of Stalinist Russia, are ready to brand as "fellow-travelers" people who put the winning of the war ahead of any other consideration. The same technique has been applied to the issue of the second front. It is all right, for example, for the New York Times to publish editorials advocating a second front—particularly if such editorials appear at a moment when it looks as if the Red Army might reach the German frontier before a British-American expeditionary force can land in Europe. But if someone from the left calls for a second front with equal eloquence and the same arguments, he is at once branded as a pawn in Moscow's game.

This political confusion is the direct result of the absence of an adequate instrument of United Nations policy and the lack of firm democratic conduct of the war. It bodes ill for the discussion of the second front which is certain to fill the press before the end of spring. People will again be divided. And again the reactionaries and their allies on the left will collaborate with Dr. Goebbels by dismissing the agitation for a western front as a new Stalinist maneuver. Should this happen, the United Nations will face their worst political crisis.

Perhaps my fears are unfounded; perhaps Montgomery's new offensive will prove to be the prelude to the general assault upon Hitler's European Fortress. Military preparations for an invasion of Europe obviously involve a degree of secrecy which makes prophecy risky. But political preparations, while they call for secrecy in their underground phases, cannot be altogether hidden. The minds of people must be prepared for action. Their courage must be awakened, and their confidence, badly battered by repeated disappointments, must be reestablished. And it is in this field that we note with regret a total lack of important gains—unless it is considered shrewd political strategy to treat the organizer of Spain's Blue Division as a trusted friend and to waste no opportunity to be disagreeable to the country which, since the summer of 1941, has carried the heaviest burden of the war.

Russia's Baltic Frontier

BY VASSILI SOUKHOMLINE

[Among the questions raised by the recent much-discussed editorial in the London Times was that of Russia's access to ice-free ports. The following article by a distinguished Russian émigré presents his country's historical position on this subject.]

I FREQUENTLY find the opinion expressed in the American press that the Baltic states which were formed in 1920-22 on territory previously belonging to the Russian Empire and were reoccupied by the U. S. S. R. in 1939-40 should be restored as independent states after our victory over Germany. The supporters of this opinion say that the strategic reasons which led the U. S. S. R. to seize this region will lose their weight after the disarmament of Germany and the creation of international machinery for maintaining a permanent peace in Europe.

It seems to me that there are many important points which they do not take into consideration.

1. Not only strategic but vital economic and political reasons urged Russia toward the shores of the Baltic. The struggle for the Baltic started as early as the tenth century and played a fundamental role in the growth of the Russian state. It was as important as Russia's fight for the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov, and represented a tendency of the country to reach its natural borders in the west. The town of Yuriev, now Dorpat or Tartu, second largest city of Estonia, was founded by the Russians in 1030. During the following centuries Russia fought several wars against the German Order of "Sword Bearers," against the "Teutonic Order," against Denmark, Sweden, and the Polish-Lithuanian monarchy, in order to gain control of the Baltic coast, which was finally conquered by Peter the Great in 1721.

From the economic standpoint the Baltic provinces were always very closely connected with the rest of Russia. Before the First World War 32 per cent of Russia's foreign trade went through their ports. More than 70 per cent of the flax exported, 80 per cent of the barley, 90 per cent of the butter and vegetable oils were sent abroad via the Baltic, and half the imports of rubber, cotton, and machinery came in that way. Reval, Riga, the islands of Oesel and Dago, Libau and Windau were important military and naval bases.

2. The creation of the three Baltic states—Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia—was the result of the Russian military defeat in 1914-18. There is no doubt that the Allies would never have thought of separating the Baltic provinces from Russia had not Russia been temporarily weakened by war and revolution. In 1920 the American government protested very justly against the dismemberment of Russia. In a note to the Italian ambassador, Avezzano, Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby, said:

This government would regard with satisfaction a declaration by the Allied and associated powers that the territorial integrity and true boundaries of Russia shall be respected. These boundaries should properly include the whole of the former Russian Empire, with the exception of Finland proper, ethnic Poland, and such territory as may by agreement form a part of the Armenian state.

After pointing out the part played by Russia in the war against Germany, Secretary Colby continued:

By this feeling of friendship and honorable obligation to the great nation whose brave and heroic self-sacrifice contributed so much to the successful termination of the war, the government of the United States was guided in its reply to the Lithuanian National Council on October 15, 1919, and in its persistent refusal to recognize the Baltic states as separate nations independent of Russia.

In July, 1922, after the European powers had recognized the Baltic states, the United States did so also. However, the official documents published on this issue show clearly that the American government did not abandon its belief that Russia's natural borders should be restored some day. Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes made the following statement in a note dated July 25, 1922, which the American commissioner in Riga handed to the Baltic governments:

The United States has consistently maintained that the disturbed conditions of Russian affairs may not be made the occasion for the alienation of Russian territory, and this principle is not deemed to be infringed by the recognition at this time of the governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, which have been set up and maintained by an indigenous population.

3. It was Germany that took the initiative in creating the Baltic states. As a matter of fact, Germany proclaimed the "independence" of Lithuania on February 16, 1918. In the year after the Armistice, until November, 1919, the Allies used the German occupational forces in the Baltic provinces to prevent the extension of the Soviet regime to these regions, just as in the following year it was Anglo-French policy to support all anti-Soviet elements in Russian territory. The "independent" governments of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania were first set up with the help of German troops; later they were supported by the British navy, by Swedish and Finnish volunteers, and by Allied arms and credit.

In the beginning the Baltic states depended on British financial and economic assistance. Later they fell under the influence of Germany. Lithuania installed a fascist regime in 1926 and Latvia in 1934. Estonia kept up the appearance of a parliamentary regime, but two reforms of the constitution—in 1933 and 1937—enabled pro-fascist elements to control the country. The fascist governments of the Baltic states, together with Colonel Beck's government in Poland, prevented an agreement between the U. S. S. R., England, and France in 1939.

4. No one can foretell what kind of international machinery for the maintenance of peace will be created after this war. It is certain, however, that the United States will not relinquish its bases in the Pacific or in the Atlantic. Nor will Great Britain sacrifice Gibraltar, Malta, and Suez. Similarly, Russia will naturally insist on keeping the military, naval, and aerial bases it needs to defend its frontiers; it must be able to resist aggressors, opening a new conflict, until the armies of other members of the future international body can intervene.

The Atlantic Charter cannot be used as a pretext for reversing the millennial development of an Allied state which has until now borne the brunt of the fight against Germany, or for violating its vital interests as demonstrated by its history. The Atlantic Charter cannot bar access to the sea to a country which covers one-sixth of the globe.

The return of the Baltic states to the Soviet Union will in no way affect the national culture of their inhabitants. During the czarist regime neither the Estonians, the Latvians, nor the Lithuanians ever demanded an independent national state. Not a single political party included such a request in its program. They merely asked for national autonomy. The Soviet Union is a federation in which the language and culture of the three Baltic peoples are recognized and respected just as are the language and national culture of the Ukrainians, White Russians, Georgians, Armenians, and Tartars.

It is comprehensible that some persons in the Baltic regions are against their return to Russia. Industrialists, bankers, shopkeepers, and politicians dependent on the capitalist regime are afraid to become citizens of a country where an anti-capitalist system prevails. Russian capitalists felt the same way in 1917. The writer of this article, like many other Russian émigrés, was prevented from continuing his literary and political activities in his own country. That fact, however, does not alter his firm belief that the new Russia has the same right to guard its security and assure the development of its own way of life as had the old Russia.

Those Lithuanian, Latvian, and Estonian groups who have lost their positions and their social standing cannot complain that they are victims of national discrimination. As a matter of fact they are victims of a social upheaval. The new Soviet republics are administered not by Russian governors but by their own countrymen, among whom we find Communists, Socialists, and representatives of a democratic intelligentsia. The fascists are out, but otherwise the local administration has hardly changed. The Soviets have even left Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian national military units under their own officers. After the Germans attacked, these units were incorporated with the Red Army.

Whatever its political and social system, Russia's permanent and vital interests and the security of its population of 200,000,000 cannot be sacrificed for the sake of a small number of Baltic politicians and capitalists who suppressed democracy in their own countries long before the Russian occupation and who willingly accepted the political and economic dominance of German fascism. It is astonishing that some people in America describe the former Baltic dictatorships as "democracies." Any good reference book could disillusion them. The "Statesman's Year-Book" for 1939, for instance, notes of Lithuania: "The democratic system collapsed in Lithuania in December, 1926. Since then a nationalist dictatorship has been established." And of Latvia: "Since May, 1934, an authoritarian government on a corporative basis has been established. . . . The parliament, Saeima, was disbanded."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

A GERMAN song seems destined to become popular even with the enemy in this war. Word comes from Africa that the British and American soldiers have taken a fancy to the tune, which they have heard sung by German prisoners. Supplied with English words, it is fast becoming a hit in General Eisenhower's army. From there it will presumably find its way to us. It will be recognized by the refrain, which in German runs as follows:

Es geht alles vorüber, es geht alles vorbei.

Es geht alles vorüber, es geht alles vorbei!

(Everything passes, everything comes to an end!)

In Germany this refrain is sung with all kinds of satirical variations. A number of these are reported by a Swede recently returned from Germany who contributes an article to the Stockholm Veckojournalen of March 6. Some of the most popular refer to rationing troubles. For example:

Es geht alles vorüber, es geht alles vorbei.

In Abschnitt November gibt's wieder ein Ei!

(Everything passes, everything comes to an end.

The ration book for November gives us an egg again!)

or

Den Schnapps vom Dezember bekommt man im Mai!

(December's brandy will be delivered in May!)

But the favorite version and the one most often heard is this:

Es geht alles vorüber, es geht alles vorbei.

Zuerst geht der Hitler, dann geht der Partei!

(First Hitler will go, then the party!)

According to our Swedish informant, the Berliners are especially fond of it in this form. And he is an observer who had long lived in Germany, who left only a short time ago, and who is obviously competent to judge. Only once in several months do we get such a glimpse into the closed Reich.

As everyone knows who has lived in Germany, the Berliners have always been a race by themselves—smarter, more skeptical, more caustic than their provincial countrymen. They are as little typical of the average German as the New Yorker is of the average American or the Parisian of the average Frenchman. Nevertheless, it is interesting to hear that "despite the Gestapo, Berliners talk quite frankly in the streets, discuss the situation very critically, and perhaps too opportunely make a distinction between themselves and the Nazis." It is still more interesting to learn that "the Berliner hardly dreads any kind of peace any longer."

It was always the opinion of the writer of this column that the Germans would never be convinced by promises that mild peace terms were obtainable, but that some day they would become nihilistically apathetic to the difference between a mild and a severe peace. Our Swedish reporter is the first to observe that this stage has been reached, if only in Berlin.

However, he asserts that other Germans too are already far advanced in skepticism and cynicism. He considers the heavy injections of propaganda with which the German people have been braced since Stalingrad and "total mobilization" wholly ineffectual. "German public opinion is marked by a sarcastic quality which prevents heroics." And while the German people of course do not want to see the Russians overrun the country, Goebbels's attempt to cast Germany in the role of Leonidas protecting all mankind by holding back the Russians at a new Thermopylae is, he believes, a complete flop. "That Germany under Nazi rule should be fighting in Russia to save Europe and England seems to the Berliner, and to the average German as well, despite the tragic circumstances, almost ridiculous."

"How is the Stimmung?" was the heading of an editorial in the Neues Wiener Tageblatt on February 21. The paper answered its own question with remarks which require no comment.

It is quite natural [it said] that in the course of a long and severe war the Stimmung should be sometimes better, sometimes worse. One can draw no conclusion at all, if not a false one, from the fact that at some particular moment the Stimmung is bad. Undoubtedly people today are in a serious mood, but their spirit is unbroken. If some people do not realize this, it is because anxiety and discontent make themselves heard and seen more plainly than everyday heroism. Not everybody is a soldier, and it is not surprising if a generation that has known little but misery occasionally grows tired of it and longs for rest and better times. Soldiers of the First World War will explain to you why this fourth year of war cannot be compared to 1918. . . . Do not seek an escape in complaints. They assuage the heart's distress no better than the rumors with which some people try to drug themselves. Do not complain, for that is a thoughtless and a dangerous thing to do. Let the father, husband, or son at the front remain in ignorance of the troubles oppressing you. The soldier should not have to worry about our Stimmung.

File and Remember

The "Daily News" Scores

ON SUNDAY, March 14 the New York Daily News published an editorial which ran in part as follows:

Russia's current attitude is that this is not only a horizontal war across land but also a vertical war of economic classes, with Russia championing the poor peasants and workers. Those people in the former Baltic states, Poland, and Finland, according to the Communists, could be happier under the Red Government at Moscow than under their old landlords and industrialists. This is the present Russian alibi for saying ever more loudly that it intends to get back after this war all the territories which czarist Russia had before the previous war, except for a sliver of Poland. A small Polish state after this war appears to be agreeable to Stalin, for reasons best known to himself; and he is now telling the Poles that they can be compensated for their sacrifices of territory in the east by being given East Prussia and additional parts of Germany. If that would not sow the seeds of another war, we don't know what would.

Soviet Russia, too, along with its mouthpieces in the Communist Party organizations in other countries, is still trying to pump life and permanence into the legend that it was gigantic, aggressive, and cruel Finland which attacked poor little peaceful Russia in December, 1939. This is an evident attempt to lay a foundation for reabsorption of all Finland into Soviet Russia after this war, and too bad about the Atlantic Charter's insistence on self-determination for small nations and the world-known fact that Finland does not want to return to Russia.

At 9:15 on Monday morning, March 15, the Berlin radio was utilizing the editorial quoted above for propaganda purposes:

The deep mistrust which a large portion of the American population nurtures with regard to the military intentions of the Soviets is expressed in a Daily News article. Moscow's claim that the Finns had attacked the U. S. S. R. in 1939 is denounced as a silly legend by this widely read New York paper and as an attempt to prepare in a propagandistic war the incorporation of the whole of Finland into the Soviet Union. —CBS short wave.,

Little Sir Echo

Westbrook Pegler said in his column Fair Enough in the World-Telegram of Friday, March 12:

It is argued that even though the Communists in this country are evil conspirators against our government, as Francis Biddle, the Attorney General, admitted they were last spring, they have no connection with Stalin. But the truth is that they are Stalin's agents and the further truth is that the American people are no more disposed to take such meddling from him than similar treachery from Hitler. The idea behind our policy as to Communists among us is that if we don't let them do their stuff in this country and treat them nice, Stalin will not be friendly with us when the war is over. Why do we feel that we have to do all the plotting?

And from a Berlin short-wave broadcast comes this:

Mr. Wallace's speech was intended to allay the fears and suspicions of Soviet Russia held by the run of Americans. And well may the British and American people harbor these fears and suspicions. There is in every democracy a red painted Trojan horse with its belly full of avowed Communists, only waiting for the signal to leap out of the horse's vitals and to open the gates to the Bolshevik hordes waiting without.—(CBS).

Such Vulgarity!

The chief feature of the statements made by Mr. Standley, the American ambassador to Moscow, is the tone in which they were uttered. It is quite understandable that the Americans, whose God is publicity, should be disappointed that the help they are giving, or think they are giving, to Russia is not sufficiently appreciated. But it is rather more difficult, at first glance, to see why this representative should so bitterly reproach the government to which he is accredited. His statement borders on vulgarity. Not that such a tone should surprise anyone, for it is the usual tone adopted by American statesmen.—Rome broadcast to England (CBS).

When Vice-President Wallace, the gentleman farmer, was on his father's farm, the manager, we are told, put him to work whitewashing the urine houses and pigsties. It was a job to which he was well suited, and he made life miserable for chicken lice and other barnyard vermin. So adept, in fact, did he become in whitewashing that he never quite lost the habit. And, in later life, wherever he went, he carried about with him a pail of whitewash and a big brush, ready and willing to apply the purifying lime to vermin-ridden pigsties at home and abroad. On Monday he found a job entirely to his liking when he single-handed attempted the gigantic task of applying a coat of whitewashing to the Soviet pig-sty. . . . In his speech he avoided all reference to communism, being content to apply to this ideological and economic system the more tender and less hateful name of Marxism. But a skunk by any other name smells just as putrid. . . . —FRED W. KALTENBACH over the Berlin radio (CBS).

BOOKS and the ARTS

Mr. Mencken and the Good Old Days

HEATHEN DAYS, 1890-1936. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

MR. MENCKEN is certainly one of the most accomplished and most delightful writers our country has ever produced. This third instalment of his own remembrance of things past is a sheer joy to read if only for the pleasure one gets from observing how successfully he has created an instrument for communicating the flavor of his particular—and peculiar—zest for life. Time has served only to perfect a style which was always robust and exuberant, but which has grown with the years better balanced and better integrated until it has achieved now an almost classical perfection without losing its individuality.

Even the youngest generation of readers, which meets him for the first time in the present volume, should have no difficulty in understanding why Mr. Mencken was one of the principal literary heroes of the teens and twenties of this century. It may, however, quite understandably wonder how on earth he was ever classified among the liberals, and for the benefit of this youngest generation the phenomenon may be explained. Mr. Mencken has not gone reactionary in his later years. He had always precisely the same contempt for the beautiful and the good that he revels in now. So far as his politics are concerned, it would be a misuse of the term to call him a tory, for toryism implies a formalized theory concerning the state and the best means of promoting its welfare. Mr. Mencken's political philosophy is, on the other hand, simply that of the ward heeler and is based securely on the ward heeler's premise that people are divided, not into the good and the bad, but only into the wise and the foolish and the hypocritical and the frank. Mr. Mencken was once counted a liberal merely because anti-puritanism and the revolt against the village played a larger part in the liberalism of the teens and twenties than political or economic theories did. If to him Mr. Roosevelt is now merely "a radio crooner," he thought no more highly of Woodrow Wilson. He doubts whether "in entertainment value" the latter is to be put higher or lower than Huey Long, and from his standpoint, that of the detached spectator, entertainment value is all that counts. "I like politicians much better than I like professors. They sweat more freely and are more amusing." The really good old days were those when political quackery was more flamboyant than now, though of course it was no more thoroughgoing.

The Governors, in fact, were for long my favorites, for they constituted a class of extraordinarily protean rascals, and I remember a year when, of the forty-eight then in office, four were under indictment by grand juries, and one was actually in jail. Of the rest, seven were active Ku Kluxers, three were unreformed labor leaders, two were dipsonians, five were bogus war heroes, and another was an astrologer.

Mr. Mencken's general estimate of human nature approximates pretty closely that of Jonathan Swift, and, indeed, Yahoo is one of his favorite terms for describing that majority of the population which he has most assiduously contemplated. The odd fact is, however, that "savage indignation" is something which has never troubled him and that whereas Swift is popularly supposed to have gone mad with disgust, Mr. Mencken is approaching old age still full of eagerness and zest while remaining completely free of the only fear which would really trouble him, the fear that the supply of fools and scoundrels might give out. Most people enjoy having their opinions and prejudices confirmed, and Mr. Mencken, being like most people in this respect, has for many years assiduously sought to be present wherever large bodies of people were being conspicuously grotesque. Hence, of course, his especial delight in the national conventions of the great political parties and the eagerness with which he cherishes his memories of such unexpected shows as that put on in Dayton, Tennessee, at the time of the anti-evolution trial. Even before his eminence made it easy for him to win choice assignments, he knew how to get fun out of the hangings he covered in Baltimore and "enjoyed especially the terminal part, for my lifelong interest in theology was already well developed, and it gave me a great kick to hobnob and palaver with the divines who comforted the doomed." There is at least poetic truth in the explanation he gives of his presence in the Holy Land before proceeding, in one sketch, to make some comments on the atmosphere prevalent in that region. Mr. Mencken, it seems, had intended to look over the remains of Gomorrah, and it was only after discovering that these remains could not with any certainty be identified that he decided to take a look at the Holy Sepulcher instead. No one can doubt that it was for him a very poor second choice.

Even those with no great faith in utopian schemes and no unqualified admiration for human nature may find Mr. Mencken's unabashed delight in depravity sometimes shocking. But what a writer he must be to hold the delighted attention of the reader through a series of sketches which begins with a loving portrait of an amateur rat killer and devotes most of its pages to unmitigated swine of one species or another. By way of illustration of the author as writer nothing will serve better than a few sentences from the account of the rat killer just mentioned. He was much, much admired by his youthful contemporaries and therefore:

The reader of today, soaked in the Freudian sewage for so many years, will assume at once, I suppose, that Hoggie must have been a Lothario, and his headquarters a seraglio. Nothing could have been further from the truth. He was actually almost a Trappist in his glandular life, and his hormones never gave him any visible trouble until much later on, as I shall show in due course. . . .

The male infantry of today, debauched by Progressive Education and the sex-hygiene quackery, are said to be adepts at the arts of love before they are more than half house-broken, but that was certainly not true in my time. . . . What made Hoggie a personage was nothing in that line; it was mainly, and perhaps only, his successful and notorious resistance to the doctrine that cleanliness is next to godliness. . . .

Hoggie, disdaining firearms, did his fighting with clubs, and had an arsenal of them ready to hand—little ones for light jobs, and thick warty shillalals for really earnest work. When he came down upon a skull something gave way, and it was never Hoggie or his weapon.

In his early days as a writer Mr. Mencken's favorite trick was to achieve the grotesque by juxtaposing words drawn from two widely different vocabularies or by assuming as parallel or equivalent two personages or two events which the admirers of one would regard as inhabiting a universe wholly outside the universe of the other. He still uses the same trick—for example, when he is describing the alleged tendency of political spellbinders to convert themselves and remarks: "Let us not forget that Lydia Pinkham, on her death bed, chased out her doctors and sent for a carboy of her Vegetable Compound, and that Karl Marx (though not Engels) converted himself to socialism in his declining years." But this isn't really a trick any more for the simple reason that it is now used with too masterly an assurance and effectiveness to deserve any such deprecatory designation. Even the incongruous elements of his vocabulary, though they also retain their effectiveness, have been made to seem congruous as parts of a style which has achieved its own harmony. Consider, for example, the phrase "a Trappist in his glandular life." Mysticism and materialism are juxtaposed; but whereas a bad writer would overemphasize the grotesqueness of the juxtaposition, Mr. Mencken, by choosing "glandular," a word of great dignity in its own universe, achieves his grotesque effect without seeming to be guilty of any violation of stylistic propriety. Like his book as a whole, this may not be pretty. But it is certainly art.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Man and History

HUMAN NATURE AND DESTINY: A CHRISTIAN INTERPRETATION. II. HUMAN DESTINY. Gifford Lectures. By Reinhold Niebuhr. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

IT IS curious to think that we are going to make peace treaties, make history for the centuries, without having asked ourselves seriously what history is or where it is going. The fact is, we are sustained, in the democracies, by some implicit belief concerning the direction and the ultimate ends of human evolution. We have almost all of us a vague idea of progress, of the amelioration of the human lot, because we still float in an atmosphere of vague Christianity. But the approaching tasks will be precise, the decisions to be taken terribly precise. We may have to choose, for example, between sacrificing individual liberties for the sake of raising the average standard of living and sacrificing social and international justice for the sake of a balance of power, Machiavellian, but favorable to certain cultural developments. We may have to choose between a system which places confidence in man and a system which has faith only in the police. Or we may have to invent, that is to say, combine old elements in a manner yet unknown. For to invent is to reorientate.

But what direction do we wish to give to the history of the world? What can we expect of man? Those who will be responsible for the treaties of tomorrow, have they even asked themselves the question?

The Nazis have answered clearly. They deny every transcendent value and accept the right of the strongest. History is war in perpetuity. A naturalistic, and pessimistic, conception. The Communists also know what they expect of history and what its direction is; hardly less naturalistic but more optimistic than the Nazis, they assume that evil will be eliminated along with the system of classes. History will end in perpetual peace and abundance.

As for the others—well, we live by a mixed heritage of Catholic, Protestant, and Renaissance notions, of which we appear often to have forgotten the origins and ultimate ends. But in order to know the direction of history it is necessary to know or decide where man comes from and where he is going. And if we ignore the direction of history, we risk going in circles, like those who "advance" in a fog, or undermining what we believe we are saving.

Reinhold Niebuhr's book would render a great service if it did no more than describe and classify the diverse conceptions of history formulated by Western humanity. But this book does much more. It defends with extraordinary probity and consistency the Biblical-Christian view of man and history.

Mr. Niebuhr seems to me to be one of the rare coherent Protestants of our time. His whole book is based on the serious consideration of a single idea, but of an idea that is fundamental: man is a being involved in finite nature but at the same time possessing the liberty to transcend his nature and to understand himself from a point outside nature. And all his conclusions about history stem from that.

If man were only nature, he would not have either any liberty or any history. If he were only spirit, he would be right to take refuge in a mystical and passive waiting for another world. Niebuhr shows how all the theories, ancient or modern, about the direction of history and of our actions fail through insufficient consideration of one of the terms of the human paradox. Too optimistic or too pessimistic. Only the Biblical doctrine maintains the balance because it is rooted in the very essence of the paradox, which culminates in the divine-human personality of Christ and is resolved only by sacrifice. History does not move toward an earthly paradise. "The Anti-Christ stands at the end of history to indicate that history cumulates, rather than solves, the essential problems of human existence." (We shall see that tomorrow, when all our old problems present themselves anew, on a global scale.) The solution and the direction of history are therefore beyond history. We can only "believe" that this solution is already realized and that this direction is already revealed in the Incarnation, the Sacrifice, and the Resurrection. But also, since we believe it, we are constrained to act in this world.

All this, condensed in the few sentences of a review, must appear esoteric to a reader who is not a theologian. But Niebuhr's book is simple and clear. It is impossible to imagine anyone less sectarian and yet so vigorous in his convictions. His plea for tolerance strikes a note that is very rare today. He illustrates that magnificent phrase of Calvin's:

"When we denominate the virtue of the saints perfect, to this perfection belongs the acknowledgment of imperfection both in truth and in humility." Mr. Niebuhr's frank criticism of Protestantism opens up horizons. He has seen that the weakness of the Reformation lies in its having neglected to establish living and solid links between its theological doctrine and its culture or politics. This book in part fills in this lacuna: it sets forth a theory of history from the Protestant point of view and the theoretical bases of a Protestant politics. And above all, Niebuhr never forgets his theology when he speaks of politics. Thus he accepts the belief in the resurrection of the flesh and rejects the Greek belief in the immortality of the soul, as well as the naturalistic belief in the definitive mortality of the individual—and for exactly the same reasons he accepts political activity and rejects escapist mysticism, as well as totalitarian cynicism. This single example will give an idea of the integration of his thought.

I hope that the negotiators of the peace of tomorrow will take time to read this book before signing, whether out of opportunism or idealism. Just as one reads along the highways of Pennsylvania, "Lose a minute, save a life!" so I should like to say to the drivers of the peace, "Lose a day of reading, save a century and a million lives."

DENIS DE ROUGEOMONT

Flight from Self-Made Terror

FLIGHT FROM TERROR. By Otto Strasser and Michael Stern. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

IT HAS long been a riddle why so few splits have occurred between National Socialist leaders. However, memoirs of anti-Hitler Nazis seem to furnish an explanation—namely, that men capable of a real change of mind had no chance of gaining a high position in the party in the first place. This indispensable real change of mind is shockingly absent in the newest autobiographical outgiving of one of Hitler's former top men, Otto Strasser. Otto Strasser is sometimes mentioned as a possible candidate for an important role in the post-war set-up. But a man's desire to kill Hitler because of Hitler's desire to kill him does not make him acceptable. And if there are those who think that Strasser's past can be overlooked, his present state of mind should spell the end to whatever political ambitions he may have for the post-Hitler world.

Until 1930 Strasser was one of the very highest Hitler Nazis. He claims to have saved the party by ingenious tricks in 1924, when it was outlawed and at its lowest ebb. He claims to have knocked open, together with his brother Gregor, the heart of Germany, Prussia, to Hitler's provincial movement. He says that he hired Goebbels for the party, because Goebbels "had an uncanny ability to say exactly the things I wanted to hear" and showed a "total absence of any belief." First of all, Otto Strasser, as Nazi press czar and publisher, for many years poisoned Germany day after day by means of his flood of Nazi dailies, magazines, pamphlets, and publications. In 1930 he broke with Hitler and organized dissenting Nazis in his "Black Front" movement. His books must therefore be considered as political documents.

The first thing that strikes the reader is the complete absence of any expression of sorrow over the cataclysmic results of his own previous work. On the contrary, the book is permeated by an arrogant assumption that he and his kind are exempt from the laws which bind philistines. This, however, is the essence of the Nazi doctrine of the "élite."

In the opening chapter of this book, for example, he describes himself lying in a German military hospital (just like Hitler), when on November 7, 1918, "the Communists won." Little does it matter to him that there were no Communists in Germany at that time. With many details and undisguised gusto he tells how, despite his wounded leg, he slipped out of bed, participated for about two days in a quickly improvised white terror ("there was fascination for me in this grim justice"), and slipped back into the hospital bed. The story, as told, is palpably untrue. But this adds to its significance because it shows even more clearly how Strasser's mind works. He does not doubt that the reading public will swallow his concoction and that he will endear himself to the Allies by his "approach"—which by necessity must lead to neo-Nazism after the war.

He gives ugly names to some Nazi leaders—not feeling that he owes an explanation for having collaborated with them closely for many years although he knew how bad they were. On the other hand, he still admires many of them; when he mentions Ludendorff, one of the main culprits, he grows ecstatic; Gregor Strasser, Hitler's fanatically devoted helper and Heinrich Himmler's inseparable friend, was an "idealistic, patriotic Socialist" and is elevated here almost to the role of a saint; Rudolf Hess is a "jewel." Sometimes he reveals his views by a single word, as when he speaks of a man's "technical American citizenship." He still appears to believe what he discovered in 1920, that "only to the Nazi Party could a person with progressive or socialistic thoughts turn now." What can heal such a mentality?

The book is crowded with false statements; if the tendencies which lie behind it were not so grim, it could pass as a parody of the "I Saw It Happen" type. Some of the false statements are old Nazi stereotypes; some read like bad jokes. The tone of the report ranges from such sentences as "The feel of the butt of the revolver in my hand was strong and sustaining" to "Edith's struggling body—her beautiful siren's body—hampered his movements." Strasser seriously maintains that Adolf Hitler was a democrat until late in 1925, when he became a dictator. Why did he become a dictator? Because of Jewish influence: the party, we are told, had just decided on a more socialistic course. This so angered Kirdorf, part-Jew and multi-millionaire, that he gave Hitler money to build up the S. A. against these socialistic plans. Strasser knows, of course, that the S. A. was founded in 1920-21 and not, as he now maintains, after October, 1925, as a result of the intervention of a part-Jew multi-millionaire who "sold his people into bondage." We are also informed that at some time after October, 1925, Reich President Ebert, instigated by Kirdorf, allowed Hitler to mix again in German politics. The author is not in the least disturbed by the fact that Ebert died in February, 1925. Similarly, we are told that Strasser's fight against Goebbels's paper, the Angriff, took place early in 1925—although the Angriff was not even founded before July 4, 1927! One of the most amazing victories over time is this: after reviving the fable that the German inflation of 1934 was caused by the "fulfilment" of the peace treaty, he says, "Late in 1923 . . . the people cried for a change in government. . . . We all knew a bloody explosion was coming." And, indeed, this foreboding of late 1923 did not deceive Strasser: "We had our answer early in March, 1920." Time destroys the speculations of man, says Cicero—but not of Otto Strasser.

The insult this book offers to the American public becomes the greater when we consider that it is but an enlarged and revised version of Strasser's book "Hitler and I," published in New York in 1940. (Neither the contents nor the jacket of "Flight from Terror" gives the slightest hint of this fact.) A comparison of the two autobiographies does reveal differences, however. Take, for example, the scene—it appears in both books—in which Strasser is caught by the Gestapo in a Bavarian mountain hut. According to "Flight from Terror," "So hot was the May sun at midday that we wore sport shirts and athletic shorts." According to "Hitler and I," "So warm was the April sun that we wore nothing but bathing slips." In the first version, when the Gestapo caught the men in the warm April sun, "my three companions leaned over the table and concealed the documents spread on it with their naked bodies." In the new version, when the same Gestapo agents caught them in the hot May sun, the naked bodies have disappeared. Instead, Strasser "waved a hand toward the lunch baskets which, fortunately, were still closed. Inside those baskets were lists of my followers." In the warm April sun there were also two women who must have evaporated in the hot May sun, because there is no trace of them in the 1943 version.

But this is not just another silly book. It is a disquieting symptom. After the most terrible of all wars, will died-in-the-wood fascists be allowed to establish their own neo-fascism as a reward for their successful flight from self-made terror?

HANS ERNEST FRIED

Strawinsky as Critic

POETIQUE MUSICALE SOUS FORME DE SIX LECONS.
By Igor Strawinsky. Harvard University Press. $2.

THE remarks of creators on their own art belong to the class of sacred writings. They should be preserved, pondered—and interpreted, for they are seldom trustworthy in the literal sense. Something can always be learned from them, though that something is rarely the thing said; most often it is the intention behind the effort that we value, the revelation of a temperament that we knew first from the work of art and of which we get a binocular view when the artist deigns to harangue us.

This necessary task of criticizing the critic is of course difficult, and seems, moreover, to imply a certain impudence. Who am I to reprove Tolstoy's "What is art?" when I could neither conceive nor execute "War and Peace"? Does he not know more about his business than I? Yes, but only in the sense that he knows it from the beginning, nothing more. Valid criticism is not simply the report of the bystander on what he sees; it is a difficult feat requiring practice no less than natural gifts and a knowledge of the appropriate means of expression. Success in another art is no guaranty of success in this, and from the very division of their time and

AMUSEMENTS

"Vivid and entertaining theater."—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.
THE PLAYWRIGHTS' COMPANY & ROWLAND STEBBINS present

THE PATRIOTS

by SIDNEY KINGSLEY
NATIONAL, W. 41st St. PE 8-8220. Evgs. 8:40, Mats. Wed. Sat. 2:40

PUBLICATIONS

YOU'LL WANT TO READ

freedom

A quarterly commentary on all aspects of liberty

PRYN'S HOPKINS, editor

Consistently fine articles by top-notch writers on all phases of freedom—genetic, aesthetic, psychological, industrial, political and intellectual.

SUBSCRIBE NOW

Single Copies 25 Cents 1375 S. Oak Knoll Avenue
By Subscription Dept. TN,
Twelve Issues: $2.00 Pasadena California

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

energy—let alone the cast of their minds—artists have proved, with some exceptions, brilliant improvisors rather than philosophic critics.

Mr. Strawinsky is no exception. His book has some of the merits and all of the defects of amateur criticism. The merits are those of an intelligent witness to the act of creation. To be sure, he says that it is impossible to explain fully what goes on when one makes a piece of music: at the core is an irrational something. But this in itself is worth having said anew. The special way in which Mr. Strawinsky views invention, inspiration, technique, and execution is also worth possessing in printed form. For the Varieties of Artistic Experience which someone will some day compose, this testimony is invaluable. Moreover these six lectures are studded with excellent critical formulations. I cite a few:

Ignorance and ill-will stem from the same root, and the latter benefits in secret from the advantages it derives from the former. . . . Experience has shown me that any historical datum . . . can certainly be used as a stimulus to excite the creative faculty, but never as an idea that can clear up a problem. The artist can build solidly only on the immediate, for everything that has fallen out of usage can no longer serve us directly. . . . Nothing compels us constantly to seek our satisfaction in repose. . . . The valuing of a value is itself subject to valuation . . . in this regard nothing is absolute save the relative.

These remarks are found, for the most part, in contexts of which the purpose is to reestablish some well-known artistic requisite or principle—the need for honest and intelligent criticism, the distinction between imagination and fancy, the dangers of snobbery, sensationalism, and egotism, the special character of music as a time art and its dependence on faithful execution from a text that can never be fully explicit. All these things Mr. Strawinsky expounded to his Harvard listeners most carefully and earnestly. And so far there was little need of interpretation.

But Mr. Strawinsky attempted something more than a refurbishing of good old truths with a few strokes of his own. He attempted the spiritual reformation of his hearers, and to do it he tried to give form to a characteristic modern attitude. It is this attempt that makes much of what he says ambiguous, even contradictory; just as it is what makes his book an important symptom of the creative mind in the twentieth century. The spiritual reformation was to make his hearers approach music "objectively . . . dogmatically . . . under the austere sign of order and discipline." And the characteristic attitude was the predictable one of repudiating the nineteenth century, musically, and the last five hundred years, intellectually and socially.

In short, Mr. Strawinsky attacks modernism in all its meanings and would even have the church condemn it if a way could be found. His citations, his examples, his irony proceed from that sense of homelessness, that fear of being taken in, that shallowness in ascribing motives, that scorn in depicting other intellectual movements than those he has trimmed up in his own mind, which are the stigmata of the neo-classicist everywhere. His is the familiar search for a golden age—in his words, a "blessed epoch"—a search guaranteed from failure by an irremediable lack of historical sense. Greece, the Middle Ages, order, discipline, calm submission to fundamental laws—these are the words (they never become concrete ideas) that carry the burden and beg every question.

They also conceal the contradictions. For example, the Middle Ages are praised for having considered artists as simple artisans, but elsewhere we are told that nothing can be more important and elevated than art and the discussion of its principles. Again, the composer attacks what is loosely called the literary element in music, the element to which, of course, the Middle Ages and Greece devoted exclusive attention. In the same vein, the idea of revolution in art is banned because it means chaos, but originality and innovation are upheld as necessary. And so around each key word a game of tether-ball goes on, with the artist who speaks always on the winning side. His fancy, his interpretation, his fundamental laws, his irrational, his wayward development must have free play, while those of his colleagues, rivals, and predecessors are confined under the "austere sign of order and discipline." This egotism is unconscious, but it can be measured by the stature of those singled out from the past for especial praise—Gounod, Tchaikovsky, Bizet, Chabrier, Delibes, Bellini, and the earliest Verdi.

I am far from saying that in jerrybuilding this edifice to house his insights Mr. Strawinsky does not give cause for real meditation. I even agree with many of his judgments—on Wagner and Schoenberg, on harmony and melody, on critics and conductors. But almost every phrase he uses must be reworded to purge it of unfairness or inconsequence. In the most abstract language he makes constant appeal to the worst instincts of the groundlings—scorn, derision, superiority. He distils poison with modesty and self-righteousness with candor. He cannot help it, for critically speaking he is an unprincipled amateur. It is as if I tried to make a symphony out of the scraps of melody that occasionally occur to me. Mr. Strawinsky could point to the holes in the texture and the unworthy dodges my innocence would devise to get over the problems. There might be interesting moments, but no sustaining idea or linking of parts. Similarly with Mr. Strawinsky's "Poétique Musicale," of which even the division into subheads is an amiable fraud. Compare, as a standard of criticism on the same subject, Suzanne Langer's "Philosophy in a New Key" or Roger Sessions's "The Intent of the Musician." And, having compared, remember Mr. Strawinsky's lectures with gratitude as a unique affidavit.

JACQUES BARZUN

The Great Theme

AMONG contemporary novels Joseph Freeman's "Never Call Retreat" (Farrar and Rinehart, $3) must claim a special place for itself. It is serious, scholarly, and ambitious. Its theme is one of the greatest available to the modern novelist—the relation of the individual to the forces of history. If, then, it is twice as long as it should be and if, as fiction, it suffers severely from its heavy burden of erudition, these faults may be seen as the faults of excess and forgiven in the light of the enormous task Mr. Freeman set himself. Less easy to forgive, of course, are the woodenness of Mr. Freeman's central character, Professor Schuman, and the naïveté of his women characters. For all his learning, this bloodless professor of history is scarcely the companion I would choose for a long journey through contemporary civilization, and for all their virtue—or because of it—the women in the professor's life are pretty unbelievable. (Still, Mr. Freeman's hero is so dull that any sexual achievement is a generous gratuity from his author!) But what really troubles me about this novel is not its length, its frequent tedium, or the emotional non-dimensionality of many of its characters so much as its fundamental evasion of moral-intellectual responsibility. This evasion is typified in the device on which the novel is constructed.

As the book opens, Paul Schuman, the Viennese historian whose years correspond to the tragic years of this century, is a refugee in America. He suffers from recurrent visions and a failure of will, and he has come to consult a psychoanalyst. The interview with the doctor occupies only ten pages of Mr. Freeman's 750-page novel; the rest of the book is the record of Schuman's "thousand and one Freudian hours," although stripped of "everything that pertains to the somatic data and symptoms of the disorder" and keeping "only the human and social circumstances which explain how Schuman came to see what he saw." Yet what the patient is saying psychoanalytically is presented in conventional novel form. The narrative is divided into the usual sections and chapters; there are even epigraphs at the beginning of each chapter. Schuman's recollections, far from being freely associated, are as ordered and polished as his author can make them, and except for the interjection of an occasional "I hesitate to describe it, Doctor," or "Are you still there, Doctor?" to remind us that the narrator is undergoing medical treatment, Mr. Freeman's patient might be at home writing his intellectual biography on his own typewriter. Why, then, we must ask, the psychoanalytical device in the first place?

Well, one obvious and artistically valid explanation is that modern history can in no better way be summed up than in the man sick with visions and paralyzed in will. Just as Schuman struggles, now, for his personal sanity, he has been part of a world struggling for political and social sanity. Also it adds a slight but neat artistic and moral-political filip to Mr. Freeman's indictment of Nazism that his hero is rescued from despair by Freud, one of the people whom Nazism is particularly eager to destroy. Yet the fact that Mr. Freeman's protagonist and raisonneur is confessedly ill makes it very difficult for the reader to assess the validity of his opinions. It could work out, that is, that we would forget Professor Schuman's condition so long as Mr. Freeman, speaking through him, thinks and says what we wish him to, but that the moment he fails to record modern history as we ourselves would record it, we would be disarmed by the knowledge that it is not Mr. Freeman himself but an admittedly sick man who is in error.

Actually, of course, we go through no such process: we quite forget that Schuman is being psychoanalyzed. I purposely exaggerate the part this device plays in the narrative because, as I say, it typifies Mr. Freeman's refusal, all along the line, to commit himself on his opinion. "Never Call Retreat" is concerned with highly controversial issues, especially issues in left-wing politics, but we can never be sure, for example, whether it is Mr. Freeman's failure or Professor Schuman's failure that the true relation between the Austrian Communists and Social Democrats is so carefully glossed over, or whether or not Mr. Freeman agrees with the wife and friends of Schuman who so unquestioningly indorse the role of the Communist Party in Spain. Schuman's liberalism protects him from having to take positions in action, but this liberalism is also shown to be a weakness. This looks to me like one of those situations in which an author both has his cake and eats it. It seems fair to assume that if Mr. Freeman's central character hears but one side of a story it is because that is the side Mr. Freeman wants his reader to read.

And unhappily, since the only approach to either history or drama is without this kind of evasion or reservation, the drama of "Never Call Retreat" suffers quite as much as its history from Mr. Freeman's reluctance to commit himself. For instance, the best section of the novel is that which deals with Schuman's years in a German concentration camp; indeed, it is a virtuoso feat to have drawn such a convincing picture of prison life without first-hand experience. And in this section Mr. Freeman develops and almost brings to a climax a story which is as fine and subtle and truly significant a study in the relation of men and principles as anything I know in modern fiction. It is the story of what happens to two comrades, a poet and a man of action, when they come together in the high-tension world of a prison underground. If Mr. Freeman had written his whole book on the level of courage and insight with which this story, so far as it goes, is conceived, he would have written a great

Spring Books

Dozens of first-rate new books will make their first appearance during the coming months. Reporters' stories of the world battlefronts, economic and social analyses, top-flight fiction, belles lettres are all represented on publishers' current lists. And Nation readers will want to know about them.

The Nation is meeting the needs of the active book-buying market which its readers represent by publishing a Spring Book Number, devoting extra space to book reviews and literary comment. And leading publishers will select this issue to carry announcements of books in which Nation readers will be interested.

The date, April 24. Deadlines: for space reservation, April 13; for final OK, April 16. Publisher's advertising rate, $160 per page. For details, telephone ALgonquin 4-3311, or write

Advertising Department

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK, N. Y.

book; but the point is that even this story itself is not carried out to its full and proper destiny, because that would be for Mr. Freeman to admit that revolutionary power can breed the same injustices and corruption as any other power. Instead, he has his two characters die before their conflict comes to its conclusion. Having stated the problem, he shirks its resolution. It is the sad failure, not alone of a single episode in a novel, but of a whole novel.

I am sorry not to be able to write at any length about two other books of the week which I very much enjoyed—Vardis Fisher's "Darkness and the Deep" (Vanguard, $2.50) and Marcel Haedrich's "Barrack 3, Room 12" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.50). More fictionalized anthropology than novel, Mr. Fisher's story of our ancestors in the days when they were just learning to build shelters and hit each other with clubs is a serious and informative book which is at the same time as entertaining as an afternoon at the monkey-house. Marcel Haedrich is the pseudonym of a French officer captured by the Germans. The gentle journal of his imprisonment is one of the quietly touching documents of this war.

DIANA TRILLING

Douhet on Air Power

THE COMMAND OF THE AIR. By Giulio Douhet. Translated by Dino Ferrari. Coward-McCann. $4.

THE FIGHT FOR AIR POWER. By William Bradford Huie. L. B. Fischer. $2.50.

A VERY distinct service has been rendered American students of war by the publication of the complete American translation of Douhet's volumes on air power. No single work has exerted a greater influence on the theory of war in the air than have the writings of this Italian general who, long before the First World War and at a time when airplanes were largely experimental, plotted future trends with extreme accuracy. It is a fair criticism of the backwardness of our military thinking that this classic in the literature of air power has taken so long to appear in English.

Long before "Billy" Mitchell in the United States was referring to the "brass heads" of his opponents, the more tactical Italian had developed a doctrine of air power which held it to be the primary factor in war. The army and navy, Douhet pointed out, cannot ward off air attack. There is no real defensive against air war. The only safe course for an inferior air force to follow is to avoid an engagement with a superior enemy. Nor does even this course offer much hope, since the stronger force will use its margin to bomb extensively the industrial heart of the enemy.

Douhet's interpretation of the First World War is remarkably keen, and he clearly foresaw the future development of offensive tactics and weapons to overcome the machine-gun and intrenchments. But he did not quite foresee the Blitzkrieg, for he views the airplane alone, not the airplane as part of a combat team, as the weapon to break the type of stalemate which existed in 1916.

A large part of the book depicts an imaginary war between Germany on one side and France and Belgium on the other. The decision is obtained when an independent German air force completely destroys opposing auxiliary air forces in a two-day struggle and thereafter operates without opposition, destroying enemy cities and industry at will.

Critics can point to errors in this study. The author has not always grasped the trend of future developments. While he correctly emphasizes bombing as a function of airplanes, he greatly overrates its effectiveness. He states, for example, that future air wars will be so quickly won or lost that ability to replace planes will be an unimportant factor. Cities and industries are not so quickly or easily obliterated as he assumes, and bombing in the present war has not destroyed civilian morale. In concluding that there is no defense against air attack, he fails to foresee the deadly interceptor plane.

But these are hardly major objections to a book written in part more than two decades ago. On the whole Douhet was remarkably prophetic. Many of his observations are filled with such pungent wisdom that one can only wish they had been more generally accepted. He suggests, for example, that the principles of war should be taught in universities. Again, "Woe to him who tries to fight the war of the future with the weapons and system of 1917."

"The Fight for Air Power" by William B. Huie, though written in a light and readable vein which may bring popularity, has much less to recommend it. Most of the book is devoted to the past troubles of the Army Air Corps. With the aid of informants whom he quotes but neglects to name, Mr. Huie builds a case of neglect of air power against the President, the army, the navy, Congress, and others.

It is not exactly news that the relations between air, land, and sea branches of American defense have not always been happy ones, and many of the charges which the author brings against the older services are justified. But his account is unfortunately so biased and unfair that it discredits some really excellent thinking on the subject of air power. While dwelling on the iniquities of army and navy he fails to mention the overweening conceit in the air force, the failure of air officers to attend maneuvers or staff school or to look at air power as both an independent and a cooperative weapon. He soft-pedals air blunders in the Philippines and without bothering to consult the available evidence, which indicates a different conclusion, decides that the Flying Fortress was the real architect of victory at Midway. Quite correctly he urges unified command, but he doesn't want it if it means that the navy will get control of any land-based planes. The author is well informed regarding the important function of air power as a long-range striking weapon, and his comments on the Flying Fortress are worth careful reading. But nowhere does he reveal the slightest sign of understanding the importance of command of the sea, the cooperative role of air power, or the use of land armies.

Several chapters toward the end of the book are devoted to a strategy for winning the war. And here Mr. Huie is an undiluted optimist. He is certain we can destroy the German air force and productive facilities from the air and urges a defensive on land until that is accomplished. In the Pacific he pronounces an island-hopping offensive certain to fail and believes we should depend on air bases in Siberia and China for direct attack upon Japan. The diplomatic problems standing in the way of the first course and the enormous transport difficulties of the other do not worry him.

DONALD W. MITCHELL

March 27, 1943

IN BRIEF

DRAMA

MR. RUTLEDGE OF SOUTH CAROLINA. A Biography by Richard Barry. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.75.

It will be news to most readers that the author of the Constitution of the United States was John Rutledge, the able South Carolina lawyer, statesman, and strategist who did so much to win the Revolution in the South. But that is the conclusion of this absorbingly well-written, urbane, but (one is sorry that "but" is the appropriate word) extremely scholarly biography. And it was also the conclusion of De Toqueville, who approached the question as an un-informed and impartial outsider and formed his opinion on evidence almost reluctantly supplied. Mr. Barry has not only drawn on almost every known contemporary document, but has unearthed 127 previously unknown documents in Rutledge's handwriting, including the final draft of the Constitution. This is rich social as well as political and personal history.

Fiji: Little India of the Pacific. By John Wesley Coulter. University of Chicago Press. $2.

This is a book of somewhat specialized interest; but almost any of us may need to take a specialized interest in almost any part of the world nowadays, and for a person who wants to know about Fiji this is a handy survey, from first-hand acquaintance, of the people, geography, and political and economic conditions of a very centrally located spot on our route to the Southwest Pacific. Fully provided with graphs, tables, maps, and charts. A word must be said for the highly decorative but serviceable printed linen binding.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT. By Lloyd B. Holsapple. Sheed and Ward. $3.

The reign of Constantine was epoch-making. He adopted the Christian religion, became the first sole Roman Emperor in a very long time, and moved the capital of the world to the city on the Bosphorus that bears his name. It is the thesis of this scholarly biography, written from the Roman Catholic point of view, that Constantine's effect on history can be accounted for only by his original genius. It is definitely a book for Catholics. Others may find it slightly elliptical.

Killing Germans

AT THE beginning of this theatrical season I made the flip prediction that war was going to be good for business but bad for art. I rather wish now I had spoken with greater solemnity and could therefore claim more credit as a prophet, for the prediction has turned out even better than I hoped. Indeed, I am about ready to ask the compositor for The Nation to keep in type a standard lead for my notices of the new plays. It would read something like this: "When 'The Whatyoumaycallit' opened last week the notices were mixed—which means that some were even worse than the others. A few days later, however, audiences seemed to be having a very good time and remained to applaud after the curtain fell."

This week the title to be inserted in the appropriate place is that of a concoction called "Men in Shadow" which the eminent Max Gordon has indulged himself in at the Morosco Theater. With a frankness which is also understatement the program calls it a "melodrama," and it credits authorship to one Mary Hayley Bell, though I fancy Roy Hargrove, who both directs the piece and acts the leading role, has had a good deal to do with it. If the author really is a woman, then here is one more bit of evidence to cite in support of the contention that the female of the species can be pretty ferocious when she puts her mind to it. "Men in Shadow" is the first play I ever saw in which the big scene showed one man breaking another man's spine with sound effects. The spine in question is, I am glad to report, one made in Germany, and the sound effect—a kind of dry crackle—is probably quite authentic. Even so, I hope my patriotism will not be suspected when I confess that I found this proceeding a bit unpleasant.

The scene of the action is one of the standbys of melodrama, namely, "the old mill." It is occupied by a small group of American behind-the-lines saboteurs whose activities are very vaguely presented but seem to include signaling to airplanes. How the saboteurs got there is not quite clear; neither, to me at least, is it quite clear what they are going to do in the loft to which they have retired just before the final curtain goes down. But none of these things is very important because the play is concerned with only one subject, which is, quite simply, killing Germans.

In a broad general sense that is and ought to be the subject of all war plays. But when this subject is interpreted as literally as the present author has interpreted it, the action is likely to become a bit monotonous. Moreover, nothing that follows can quite come up to the spine-breaking with sound effects. You can, of course, pick out a nice fat German to stab in the back, and you can make the blood on the dagger very red and very visible. But real blood is old stuff in melodrama and doubtless was already old stuff on the occasion when I first observed it—namely, at the end of "Fra Diavolo" when the romantic bandit rolled down the rocky incline to the footlights and revealed the once spotless ruffles of his shirt front now all incriminated. The only real variety which "Men in Shadow" affords is when Americans rather than Germans are suffering physical pain. Just after the first curtain goes up, the air is rent for five or ten minutes by the screams of an injured airman whose two broken legs are being set by an amateur. Just before the last curtain goes down, it is being rent again by the screams of the same man as he is being hoisted into the loft by his companions. Even Gloucester in "King Lear" gets his eyes gouged out only once.

It is the business of our soldiers to kill Germans. Undoubtedly some of these same Germans must be killed in decidedly unpleasant ways, and when it is necessary I hope our soldiers will not be too squeamish. But I seriously doubt that those of us who are staying safely at home ought to be encouraged to take delight in the spectacle of physical suffering or that sadists should be given convenient opportunities to convince themselves that their perversion is really ardent patriotism. The fact remains, however, that when I saw "Men in Shadow" it seemed to be going over big.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

ART OF THIS CENTURY. 30 West Fifty-seventh Street, until April 10. Fifteen early and fifteen late paintings by Braque, Chagall, Dali, Chirico, Duchamp, Ernst, Gris, Kandinsky, Klee, Leger, Masson, Miro, Mondrian, Picasso, and Tanguy raise the always unanswerable question why the earlier paintings should be so much better than the later ones. Braque, Gris, Picasso, and Marcel Duchamp each show magnificent pictures painted between 1911 and 1914; Dali a charming aerial pink landscape, "The Spectral Cow," in pleasant contrast to his later earthworm style. The exceptions to this rule are Miro and Max Ernst. Miro gets more fresh and original with every picture, and Ernst has painted a wonderful subterranean landscape with gay windows opening on a brighter world. Neither of the Klee's comes up to "The Magic Garden," which, although not in this exhibition, can be seen in another room of the gallery.

WAR AND THE ARTIST. At the Pierre Matisse Gallery, 41 East Fifty-seventh Street, until April 3.

This just fails to be interesting—Chagall, Ernst, Masson, Matta, Miro, Picasso, Rouault, Siqueiros, Tamayo. Chagall has a charming picture "Between Darkness and Light," and Ernst an amusing one called "What Is Going on in Africa," with a lot of animals snarling and bellowing. There are two very good Miro's, some of Picasso's "Dreams and Lies of Franco," rather dull Rouault drawings, and a pretty Matta in Schiaparelli colors.

MUSIC

MY REPORT on the fall ballet season was delayed by pressure of other matters until it seemed best for me to wait and give it before the Ballet Theater's spring season.

"Aleko" had sets and costumes by Chagall which were so startlingly beautiful in color and imagination as to be open to the criticism that they claimed too much attention for themselves; it had Tchaikovsky's A minor Trio, which turned out to be a superb ballet score as Massine used it; this use, even with its occasional weaknesses, added up to one of Massine's finest achievements; and it created roles for Markova and Laing in which they gave extraordinary performances. Massine did not, this time, construct choreographic movements to correspond with the movements of the Trio; his scenario used for the material of its four scenes the changes in character of the music, but cut across the break between the two movements and the structural divisions within the movements; and when I praise his use of the music I have in mind first of all this subtle structural integration of music and scenario. And in addition there was the feeling for the quality of the music that he showed in the choreography. In Skibine's twisting entrance as the curtain rose one saw the freshly imagined style which Massine had created for the principals—a style which was a perfect medium for Laing's smoldering emotional force, and in which Markova astonished one with unsuspected emotional powers as a character dancer. Massine also devised a series of charming divertissements for the second and third scenes, using some of the variations of the second movement of the Trio; where his imagination showed weakness was in the invention for large groups in the first and last scenes.

Of the other new works Dolin's "Romantic Age" was a trifle which required Markova to give first an amusing demonstration of an inability to dance and then an enchanting demonstration of her exquisite and unique art; and the more pretentious "Don Domingo" had good costumes and sets by Julio Castellanos, atrocious music by Revueltas, and choreography by Massine that descended from mere dullness to the badness of a Mayan goddess and warrior pas de deux straight out of an Earl Carroll "Vanities." The Ballet Theater's revival of "Billy the Kid" without Loring's participation or supervision revealed disturbing changes of the sort that begin to take place in a ballet when the choreographer is no longer on hand to watch over it; and Ian Gibson was less effective than Loring in the title role, lacking for one thing the stocky physique that had helped Loring to create the effect of a little tough guy; but even with these faults the work came out a masterpiece. In the same way Nijinsky's "Afternoon of a Faun" retains its originality and power even with the changes it has undergone in thirty years, and did so even with the new features of Laing's poor performance. "Petrouchka" was said to have been restaged by Fokine; but there was no evidence of restored order in the aimless milling about of the crowd; and there was of course the usual chaos in the performance of the music. Of the principals Lazovsky, the company's best male dancer, who got almost nothing of importance to do, was outstanding in the title role (Jerome Robbins proved a less effective substitute in a performance in which Lazovsky was the First Groom); and Baronova did her best work as the Ballerina—which is to say that this was the only role which she could not reduce to an exhibition of meaningless virtuosity and unendurable comic pertness. The revival of "Coppelia" was one of the occasions for such an exhibition.

The revival of Tudor's "Dark Elegies" I missed; but I attended a performance of "Lilac Garden" and several of "Pillar of Fire" which altered my impressions and estimates of these works. It was "Lilac Garden" that now seemed diffuse and repetitious; in "Pillar of Fire," on the other hand, I began to perceive what new states of mind in Hagar were reflected by the second scene that had previously seemed to be mere repetition of earlier material—the self-loathing which causes her to turn away from the man she loves, and which is dispelled only when finally he kneels before her. But though I found coherence in the part of Hagar I found none in the part of the man: Tudor provides nothing to account for his acting as he does in the first scene and then acting as he does in the second. Shortly afterward a remark by a connoisseur of ballet and an admirer of Tudor provided me with a clue to the enormous popular success of "Pillar of Fire." I had asked him what he thought of Balanchine; and he answered: "Balanchine isn't getting anywhere with his use of the medium; Tudor is getting somewhere." It occurred to me that many people who were bored by "Les Sylphides" or a Balanchine ballet to a Bach or Mozart concerto, which used the medium of ballet as Bach or Mozart used the medium of music, would be impressed by the works of Tudor, in which the ballet medium was used to convey explicit meaning in the way that music is used in program-music.

For the rest there were Markova's great performances in "Giselle," "Les Sylphides," and "Pas de Quatre."

As for the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, two of its new productions—Nijinsky's "Snow Maiden" and "Chopin Concerto"—were poor stuff, with only this redeeming feature—that they employed the exquisite fluent grace of Danilova. But "Rodeo" had a good score by Copland (a sort of pint-size "Billy the Kid"), good sets by Oliver Smith and costumes by Kermit Love, and choreography that was a delightful embodiment of Agnes de Mille's sharp perception and wit; and it provided good artistic use for Franklin's whirling agility. These new works were done with precision and finish; but the older ones were exhibited in various degrees of delapidation.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Shakespeare and Dyer

Dear Sirs: I would like to register a slight protest against the complete inadequacy of the review of Alden Brooks's new book, "Will Shakspeare and the Dyer's Hand," by Theodore Spencer in your issue of February 27.

I have not only read the book, and indeed reviewed it recently, but I have read and enjoyed Mr. Spencer's own very fine work "Shakespeare and the Nature of Man." In addition I read, in 1937, Mr. Brooks's earlier work on the authorship of the plays, "Will Shakspeare, Factotum and Agent." I can claim, therefore, a slight acquaintance with the subject, although I am not a Shakespeare expert.

It seems to me that Mr. Spencer has not done the book justice. Most of his review is taken up with trying to be funny in a ponderous fashion. Whether publishers are faced with a paper shortage, for instance, has nothing to do with the problem who was the real author of the plays? Mr. Spencer has adopted the traditional attitude of the Stratfordian conventionalists. They invariably look the other way and make academical jokes about Bacon. Having scored so heavily in the past over Mrs. Gallup and the cipher fanatics, they conclude that there is nothing more to be said on the subject. In this they are out-ostriching the ostrich in burying their heads in the sand, while the general public has long ago reached the conclusion that the Stratford butcher boy certainly did not write most of the plays. They may not be clear as to who did, but to brush off anyone who has taken the trouble to write a book like "Will Shakspeare and the Dyer's Hand" as nonsensical seems to me to be the act of one whose mind is closed to the sort of evidence that would be accepted in any common court as substantial.

At the time I read Alden Brooks's earlier work, I was much struck with the idea that the man whose name is on the plays was probably merely the producer. I recall seeing a silent film based on Hugo's "Hunchback of Notre Dame." The name of Hugo was printed very small at the bottom of the advertising, while the producer's name was two inches high at the top. I am sure the Man of Stratford, if alive today, would be in Hollywood. In any case it is more credible that the poetry was written by a courtier than by a countryman from Warwickshire. I must repeat, you have unfortunately done less than justice to a valuable work. It would have been better to have had the review done by a lawyer than by a college man.

WILLIAM MC FEE

Brookfield, Conn., February 28

For What Object?

Dear Sirs: It would have been easily possible, however tedious, to have taken Mr. Brooks's argument point by point and shown that his case for Dyer as the author of Shakespeare's plays is, in the light of the facts, an ingenious and painstaking implausibility. For example: Dyer died in 1607; if he wrote the plays that appeared after that date, he must have written them earlier, and Mr. Brooks tries to show that he did. But in trying to do so, Mr. Brooks is forced to ignore every evidence of style, of poetic development, of dramatic technique, of change in poetic vision—all the things that any real student of literature first thinks of.

In itself this is enough to suggest why a work like that of Mr. Brooks is not worth taking seriously. Mr. Brooks has read widely in Elizabethan literature, and has worked very hard for twenty years—but for what object? Not to increase our understanding of poetry, not to increase our understanding of a wise man's expanding view of human experience, not to increase our understanding of the craftsmanship of a great art, but merely to satisfy a fundamentally trivial curiosity. A curiosity which apparently starts from the unrealistic and scarcely democratic belief that a man whose father had once been a butcher was unable to write great poetry.

The trouble with Mr. Brooks's volume is that it is hopelessly beside the point. That is why, however, ponderously, I tried to laugh it off. For with Shakespeare the important thing to do is not to worry about who wrote the plays but to read them—and read them again.

THEODORE SPENCER

Cambridge, Mass., March 4

P. S.—The suggestion in Mr. McFee's last sentence has interesting possibilities. When the next book on international law is published, why not have it reviewed by a dentist?

"Nature" or "Civilization"?

Dear Sirs: My article Fascism Without Mussolini, in The Nation of January 30, prompted a letter which embodied opinions widely spread in this country and therefore worthy of discussion:

Your article in The Nation on fascism Without Mussolini raises a question which has been much in my mind about the political future of Italy—and of France also, for that matter. Perhaps you should write another article telling how the "Italian Democratic Republic" can be constituted after the war, since no such answer to Mazzini's prayers was vouchsafed before Mussolini. Certain it is that parliamentary government had broken down before the Duce appeared (I was there during the World War and the Armistice and saw much of this process); and indeed the Italian government, so long as it was strong, was always a veiled dictatorship, whether Cavour or Crispi or Giolitti happened to be at the helm. It's a very old story as the history of Rome would attest. It almost seems as if parliamentarism—which is the essence of the "Democratic Republic," as the English-speaking peoples understand it—were alien to the Latin nature; for neither France, nor Italy, nor Spain, nor Portugal, nor the Central and South American countries really succeeded in establishing it on a firm foundation. Whether the Slavs have that particular type of political genius remains to be seen: the Czechs alone so far seem to give an affirmative answer. The Scandinavians, yes; the Germans, hardly. The people who have bitterly assailed recent action in North Africa by our representatives seem unconscious of that problem. I should like to see your answer to it.—J. S. N.

When one writes, "The Italian government, so long as it was strong, has always been a veiled dictatorship, whether Cavour or Crispi or Giolitti happened to be at the helm," one should define the meaning of the word "dictatorship." If one means that in Italy the Prime Minister shaped the country's policies, the statement is correct. But in this sense Roosevelt's America also is a "dictatorship." Bernard Shaw's basic argument in favor of Hitler and Mussolini was always that Great Britain no less than Italy and Germany was a "dictatorship." In fact, in Great Britain the Prime Minister, when backed by a solid parliamentary majority, controls domestic and foreign policies.

However, when one puts together in the same dictatorial box Cavour and Mussolini, Roosevelt and Hitler, Churchill and Stalin, one must distinguish again between a "dictatorship number one" in which anyone criticizing and opposing the men in power is dispatched to jail or to the next world, and a "dictatorship number two" in which the right to criticize and oppose the men in power is granted to the citizens.

"Dictatorship number two" in former times was termed a "free regime." I, being seventy years old, intend to stick to traditional terminology and go on terming it a "free regime." Piedmont was a "free" regime from 1848 to 1860. Italy was a "free" regime from 1860 to 1922. I was an opponent of Giolitti from 1902 to 1914 and a critic of the Italian government during the First World War. Nobody dispatched me to jail or to the next world. Nobody ever thought of dismissing me from my teaching positions at the universities of Messina, Pisa, and Florence. But in 1925 I had to leave Italy.

A "free" regime permits habeas corpus, freedom of the press, of association, of assembly, trade-union freedom, religious freedom, freedom of teaching, elective local government, parliamentary institutions, etc. These institutions did exist in Italy. They do not exist now. They make the difference between a "free" and a "dictatorial" regime.

Parliament, one of the institutions of a "free" regime, was working rather poorly in Italy. But what were parliamentary institutions in England before the Act of 1832? England had to go through a process of trial and error during the whole of the nineteenth century—must we recall the Chartist movement of 1848?—before it settled down to a form of government we admire. To be sure, we do not forget that British national elections in 1924, 1931, and 1935 were won by the Conservative Party through three swindles—the Zinovieff letter in 1924, the put-up scare about the Post Office savings in 1931, and the fraudulent promise to stand by the League of Nations in the Italo-Ethiopian dispute in 1935. Such swindles, however, are part and parcel of that process of trial and error through which mankind has to pass in its endeavor to grow less imperfect.

Is political freedom a particular privilege bestowed by the Almighty God upon the Britons and those in America who claim to have British blood in their veins even if it is Irish or German, and even if not all immigrants originating in England belonged to precisely the same moral breed as the Pilgrim Fathers?

There is a brutal German Nazi doctrine of the Nordic race, and there is another doctrine of race soaked with suave Anglo-Saxon cant: "You are unworthy of reaching our heights; we are endowed with a parliamentary nature, a parliamentary genius; you have to be content with dictatorships." The notions of "nature," "genius," "instinct" spring from the assumption of something primitive, permanent, and unchangeable—"race."

Switzerland does not consist of born-on-the-lap-of-Jove Anglo-Saxons, but of Germans, French, Italians, and Latins. Yet all these Swiss may teach the "chosen" Anglo-Saxon peoples many lessons in democracy. Switzerland has as yet produced no Neville Chamberlain, nor John Simon, nor Samuel Hoare, and no Ku Klux Klan, Huey Long, or Mayor Hague. Of course the Swiss also had to learn through trial and error. As late as 1847 they were living under oligarchic regimes no less than those Czechs and Scandinavians who seem, like the Anglo-Saxons, to be endowed with an innate "genius" for democracy.

Let us, therefore, put aside "natures" and "geniuses" and "instincts," and let us speak of "civilizations" and state that Anglo-Saxon civilization should be credited in the political field with accomplishments which all other peoples must admire and envy. And since civilization spreads from one people to another through imitation, there is no absurdity in the fact that Latin peoples strive toward the political institutions of the Anglo-Saxons in the same way as the latter, in former times, had much to learn from the Latins.

When one asks "how the Italian Democratic Republic can be constituted after the war," one should ask oneself whether one can forecast who will be the President of the United States and what England will be in 1945. Why do the Italians alone have to deliver the blueprint of what their free post-war regime should be, nay, list their future leaders, one by one, if they do not want to be handed over to some Fascist quisling? Nobody asks Mussolini what the Fascist regime will be when this war is over, if it does not crumble. Why is it that only the anti-Fascists are asked to act as prophets and to put themselves in the places of forty-five million Italians who are now voiceless? This war is upsetting social, moral, and intellectual conditions so deeply everywhere that nobody, unless he is a fool, can foresee what features any political regime will assume tomorrow when the present earthquake is over.

I cannot foresee for Italy any alternative but hell, that is, dictatorship, on the one hand, or purgatory, that is a more or less imperfect parliamentary regime, on the other. I leave paradise, that is, the flawless parliamentary regime, to the Anglo-Saxons.

Anyhow, what the Italians will do is the business of the Italians and not of the Anglo-Saxons. It is high time that Anglo-Saxon self-complacency stopped speculating on what the Italians will do, stopped teaching them what they should do, and concentrated on what Britain and America ought to do if they intend to remain true to those Christian and democratic principles of which they claim to be the custodians.

America and Britain have to win this war, disarm Germany and Italy, not rearm the other countries of Europe, and stop there. It is not their business to tell the European peoples what they must or must not do. Europeans are not savages. Let them do what they can according to their lights.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Cambridge, Mass., March 2

Ehrlich and Alter

Dear Sirs: The Nation, in its issue of March 13, places protestants against the Ehrlich and Alter executions by the Soviet authorities in the unsavory position of seeking to initiate an anti-Soviet campaign and of thus playing "directly into the hands of Goebbels."

This is, indeed, a strange editorial conclusion to arrive at when one considers that everything known about these two men indicates that their lives were dedicated to the fight against all that Goebbels and Hitler stand for; that nothing, absolutely nothing, is known of the crimes they are alleged to have committed, and that "liquidation" of political opponents is as "regular" under the Stalin regime as are elections in our own country.

You place the responsibility for the Ehrlich-Alter execution with the Soviet government and then caution your readers that "people in this country have a responsibility too." Quite so. But why not tell your readers what that responsibility is? Is it to remain silent in the face of any act committed by an ally simply because we fight the same enemy?

It is true, of course, that the Soviets never promised to abide by the "four freedoms" of democracy prior to becoming our ally in fighting Hitler. But it is, I take it, equally true that we, on our side, never undertook to put these democratic prerogatives in mothballs when Stalin entered the war on our side.

Do you advise silence in the face of political assassination because you fear that the bond which today holds together the peoples of the United Nations is so thin that it cannot stand the strain of democratic vigilance?

A lot of people in America will not agree to such a moratorium. Stalin and America are fighting the same enemy; Stalin, to keep the record straight, has never said that he is fighting for democracy, but we did and we are. No one suggests that we break partnership with Stalin because he ordered the execution of two more trade-union leaders. Gene Cox, Howard Smith, and Clare Hoffman probably would reject such an idea as vehemently as Earl Browder and Bob Minor. But there are thousands in America who see in the assassination of Henryk Ehrlich and Victor Alter another example of what they bitterly protested against when they saw it committed by Hitler. They cannot believe that it is right just because Stalin has done it this time. They believe that it is their unbartered democratic right to protest against it. I am one of them.

MAX D. DANISH

New York, March 15

[The Nation did not suggest that Americans should "remain silent" about the execution of Ehrlich and Alter. It condemned the execution but urged the necessity of restraint and a sense of proportion on the part of persons who, like Mr. Danish, recognize the need of closer relations between Soviet Russia and the other Allied nations.]

It All Depends

Dear Sirs: You printed a few weeks ago a letter from F. Eugene Dubuisson in which he said that while he does not agree with Congressman Rankin on some subjects he and other Southerners will continue to send to Congress men like Rankin who "are willing to stand against the Northern majority that would condemn the South to mongrelization."

After long observation and quite some reading the opinion has been forced upon me that the white man has not the slightest objection to mongrelization per se: what he does object to is legal honorable mongrelization. As long as the disgrace of mongrelization rests solely on the dark-skinned woman and her and his child he cares nothing about mongrelization.

I live within twenty miles of an Indian school. Years ago a cousin, after driving past the place, remarked, "I drove by the Indian school. There were between two and three hundred children playing on the grounds and not one was a full-blooded Indian."

Within the last decade there died not far from my home a mulatto woman born in the 1830's. Her uncle, also a mulatto, died years ago; evidently the Southern planters of over a hundred years ago had not the slightest objection to mongrelization. And just as evidently it was not forced on them by "Northern idiots."

ELIZA COOK, M. D.

Gardnerville, Nev., March 1

Forgive Whose Taxes?

Dear Sirs: The so-called Ruml plan for "forgiving" 1942 taxes and putting our distraught tax system on a pay-as-you-go basis wears such an innocent expression, promises such sweet relief, and is backed by such an impressive array of financiers that it merits close scrutiny. In this troubled, complex world we should overlook no opportunities to simplify our national problems and ease our heavy burdens.

The method I propose for testing this plan has often brought us hopefuls to grief in the past by exposing plans which we were sure bore our economic salvation. It is to apply the thesis to a concrete case, work it out, and microcosmically reveal the substance of the entire plan. After all, the Ruml plan is no doubt impervious to any but frivolous criticism, for who can deny that if the government continues to get its tax money every year it simply can't suffer a year's loss of taxes?

Mr. Collins, president of Amalgamated Aircraft Corporation, computes his taxes for 1942, 1943, and 1944 on the basis of the existing tax system, assuming that the war will end in 1944 (to illustrate a point), thereby cutting his business in half and bringing a proportionate reduction in his tax load. Here's what he finds:

1942 income—$100,000; on March 15, 1943, he pays $75,000.

1943 income—$100,000; on March 15, 1944, he pays $75,000.

1944 income—$50,000; on March 15, 1945, he pays $15,000.

Total taxes—$165,000.

Mr. Collins then estimates the income taxes his next three payments will call for under the Ruml plan—whether paid annually or in instalments makes no difference:

1942 income—$100,000; forgiven.

1943 income—$100,000; on March 15, 1943, he pays $75,000.

1944 income—$50,000; on March 15, 1944, he pays $15,000.

1945 income—$50,000; on March 15, 1945, he pays $15,000.

Total taxes—$105,000.

The dawn comes up like thunder!

REO M. CHRISTENSON

Fort Rosecrans, Cal., March 15

CONTRIBUTORS

BLAIR BOLLES writes a column on diplomacy and foreign affairs for the Washington Evening Star.

HIRAM MOTHERWELL is author of "The Peace We Fight For." As European correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, he saw the rise of fascism in Italy and of Nazism in Germany.

FRANK H. UNDERHILL is professor of history at the University of Toronto and a member of the editorial board of the Canadian Forum. In politics he is a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

VASSILI SOUKHOMLINE is a Russian writer and journalist. He was formerly editor of the Russian democratic monthly The Will of Russia, published in Prague from 1922 to 1932. Before the fall of France he wrote on diplomacy for the Paris daily Quotidien and the weekly Lumière, was managing editor of the magazine Europe Centrale, and contributed to Europe Nouvelle and other publications.

DENIS DE ROUGEMONT, distinguished French critic, poet, and playwright, came to this country after the Nazi invasion of France. He is the author of "Love in the Western World," an analysis of the development of contemporary attitudes toward love, and of "La Part du Diable," recently published.

HANS ERNEST FRIED is in the Department of Government of the College of the City of New York. He is the author of "The Guilt of the German Army."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 6

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 An unpleasant fellow, particularly when he comes out of his shell (two words, 3 and 3)
- 4 U. S. state with ■ floor covering in the center
- 10 Some err before they are reformed, and this is what they feel about it
- 11 A bad man is bad in vain
- 12 Saw without teeth
- 13 This in a king is murder
- 14 Epithet for the solver who starts, perhaps, at breakfast time and finishes at midnight
- 15 Organs the vote-getter can generally count on
- 17 Your itinerant European rug seller of pre-war days was probably one
- 21 Cleveland preceded and succeeded him
- 23 Upsetting the table naturally produces a sheepish remark
- 26 Mother of an expensive daughter
- 28 Half a loaf is better than no bread, but this is three-quarters of one
- 29 Often associated with vice
- 30 A facial contortion
- 31 Part of a circle cut off from the rest
- 32 Accounts, or songs, may be
- 33 The poet Burns enjoyed us to scan our brother man thus

DOWN

- 1 Do these money-saving offers exclude profits, as they say?
- 2 Behaves like me among the clergy
- 3 The Grand Canyon is evidently the place for ■ grand feed
- 5 Kind of crossing we should like the steamship company to adopt from the railroad

- 6 Though isolated, this bit of land is apparently occupied
- 7 Hardly the type of musical instrument for a band-wagon
- 8 Though he keeps a watch he may not be able to tell you the time
- 9 Big bills don't worry them
- 16 "I am - - - Oracle, And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark!" (Merchant of Venice)
- 18 Fine mast is obvious when broken up
- 19 A point for writers
- 20 Secretive, as a shy Lett might be
- 22 Here we see you in action at the card table
- 24 Oscar Wilde wrote of the importance of being this
- 25 An ogre makes an ass of himself
- 27 Buck up!
- 28 If you want stout, give ■■ order for it first
- 29 Of doubtful origin and distinctly shaky toward the end

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 5

ACROSS—1 STARTER; 5 WHIPPET; 9 ESSENCE; 10 SOLDIER; 11 TIGER; 12 EVE; 13 TITLE; 14 RAINMENT; 16 NATURES; 18 CHERUBS; 21 ASPIRIN; 24 SMELT; 26 UNA; 27 RATED; 28 ITALIAN; 29 ORLEANS; 30 NIBBLED; 31 EARNERS.

DOWN—1 SPELTER; 2 ASSEGAI; 3 TUNER; 4 RE-ELECT; 6 WESTERN; 8 INLET; 7 PAINTER; 8 TURENS; 15 BCU; 17 TIP; 18 CUSHION; 19 EVE-LAMB; 20 SPURNED; 21 ALAMODE; 22 RETRACE; 23 NUDISTS; 25 TWILL; 27 RULER.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Force and Freedom: Reflections on History.* By Joseph Burckhardt. Pantheon Books. $3.50.
- Monkey.* By Wu Ch'eng-ên. Translated from the Chinese by Arthur Waley. John Day. $2.75.
- We Chinese Women.* Speeches and Writings During the First United Nations Year. By Mayling Soong Chiang. Chinese News Service. 25 cents.
- World's Great Mystery Stories: American and British Masterpieces.* Edited by Will Cuppy. World Publishing Company. 49 cents.
- The Year of Decision: 1846.* By Bernard De Voto. Little, Brown. $3.50.
- War Discovers Alaska.* By Joseph Driscoll. Lippincott. $3.
- The Greek White Book.* American Council on Public Affairs. $1.50.
- Bound for Glory.* By Woody Guthrie. Dutton. $3.
- The New Guides to the Latin American Republics.* Edited by Earl Parker Hanson. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.
- Postwar Economic Problems.* Edited by Seymour E. Harris. McGraw-Hill. $3.50.
- P. R., Democracy and Good Government.* By F. A. Hermens. The Review of Politics. Notre Dame. 75 cents.
- Listen Hitler! The Gremlins Are Coming.* By Inez Hogan. Dutton. $1.
- The Fight of the Norwegian Church Against Nazism.* By Bjarne Høye and Trygve M. Ager. Macmillan. $1.75.
- Independence for India?* Compiled by Julia E. Johnsen. Wilson. $1.25.
- Way for America.* By Alexander Laing. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.
- Spice and Scent: Herbs in Fact and Fancy.* By Lee Maril. Coward-McCann. $1.75.
- The Book: The Story of Printing and Book-making.* By Douglas C. McMurtrie. Oxford. $5.
- The First Century of Flight in America: An Introductory Survey.* By Jeremiah Milbank, Jr. Princeton. $2.75.
- South from Corregidor.* By Lieutenant Commander John Morrill, U. S. N., and Pete Martin. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.
- The Garden of Doctor Persuasion.* By Francis Neilson. Nelson. $2.
- Theodore Roosevelt and the Rise of the Modern Navy.* By Gordon Carpenter O'Gara. Princeton. $1.50.
- We Fight with Merchant Ships.* By M. B. Palmer. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.75.
- Karl Marx and Marxian Science.* By Arnold Petersen. New York Labor News Company. $1.50.
- Science Year Book of 1943.* By John D. Ratcliffe. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.
- Baden-Powell: A Biography of Lord Baden-Powell of Gilwell.* By E. E. Reynolds. Oxford. $2.75.
- Between the Thunder and the Sun.* By Vincent Sheean. Random House. $3.

(Continued on Inside Back Cover)

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 3, 1943

NUMBER 14

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- | | |
|------------------------|-----|
| Much Ado About Food | 472 |
| The Press on Churchill | 473 |
| The Case of Mark Starr | 474 |
| The Language of Piracy | 474 |

ARTICLES

- | | |
|---|-----|
| The Shipshaw Scandal by I. F. Stone | 475 |
| Why They Follow John L. Lewis?
by Selden C. Menefee | 477 |
| Steel Wins Wars by Fritz Sternberg | 479 |
| The Coming Offensive in the Pacific
by Donald W. Mitchell | 482 |
| 10 Years Ago in The Nation | 483 |
| Will Hays's New Rival by John McDonald | 484 |
| In the Wind | 486 |

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- | | |
|--|-----|
| The Spread of Sinarquismo by Félix Díaz Escobar | 487 |
| Spanish Soldiers of France by A. D. Printer | 488 |
| Behind the Enemy Line by Argut | 490 |
| File and Remember | 491 |

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- | | |
|---|-----|
| The Adventures of Monkey by H. P. Lazarus | 492 |
| Russia, Reform, and Revolution by Ralph Bates | 492 |
| "This Grace Is Dignity" by Rolfe Humphries | 493 |
| Pieces of Empire by Marcus Duffield | 494 |
| Miss Lucy Ludwell by Grace Adams | 496 |
| The Negro and "His Place" by E. Franklin Frazier | 496 |
| Cross-Purposes by Frank Jones | 497 |
| In Brief | 499 |
| Art by Jean Connolly | 499 |
| Records by B. H. Haggin | 500 |

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 7 by Jack Barrett

469

The Shape of Things

ONCE MORE MONTGOMERY'S VETERAN ARMY has outfought and outsmarted Rommel's Afrika Korps, and the desert fox is now running to earth with the Allies in hot pursuit. It remains to be seen whether the German commander can extricate any sizable portion of his forces through the southern Tunisian bottleneck to combine with the army of General von Arnim in a last-stand defense of the Bizerte-Tunis triangle. His retreat is menaced at half a dozen points by the Allied armies pressing eastward and is exposed to concentrated attack from the air. Winston Churchill, however, has warned that bitter fighting is still to be expected. The Bizerte-Tunis area has been elaborately fortified in the past five months and might prove capable of standing a prolonged siege. However, as the armies of Generals Montgomery, Patton, and Anderson link up and close in on the enemy, there is good reason to hope that the Axis will soon lose its last toe-hold in Africa. Nor are Rommel's chances of a successful Dunkirk very bright. Allied air and naval supremacy is likely to preclude the escape of more than a small percentage of his forces across the hundred-mile channel which separates them from Sicily. For nearly five months the United Nations have been waiting impatiently for this day. It has been delayed by acute logistic troubles, by appalling weather, and by the difficulty of welding the armies of three diverse nations into one effective fighting machine. However, the unified command instituted at Casablanca has mastered its problems and proved its worth in action by carrying out a complicated strategical combination with clockwork accuracy.

★

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Managing Editor	Washington Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT BENDINER	L. F. STONE	MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON	MAXWELL S. STEWART
Music Critic	Drama Critic
B. H. HAGGIN	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL	JONATHAN DANIELS	LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR	J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Business Manager	Advertising Manager
HUGO VAN ARX	MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1919, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

IN RUSSIA A TEMPORARY STALEMATE HAS been reached, with both sides stalled by mud and spring floods. The German counter-offensive in the south has been checked at the Donets line; the Russian drive in the center has so far been unable to penetrate the outer defenses of Smolensk. Not surprisingly, the second-front question is coming again to the fore, with Moscow hinting plainly that it would prefer military support now to lectures on post-war policies. The German rally which led to the renewed loss of Kharkov appears to have been made possible by the transfer of reserves from the west, and the Russians may well feel that they were robbed of the fruits of their winter offensive by the failure of their allies to give them support when they most needed it. However, if a western front can be opened up within the next two months, it can still prevent the concentration of German forces for a summer offensive and give the Red Army the chance to break through that it is hoping for. Of course, in any debate on the second front Anglo-American authorities are at a disadvantage, since the only effective reply they can make until the zero hour is past is to name a date. And obviously only Hitler would be pleased at that. Russian critics have suggested that the Anglo-American commanders value preparation above time and are over-insistent on having the last button sewed on the last uniform before they will move. But it may be that Moscow fails to appreciate the magnitude of the shipping problem just as it has been less than generous in recognizing the contribution of the bombing offensive against Germany. That is an essential preliminary to any Continental invasion as well as an effective method of reducing the supplies Germany can ship to the eastern front.

✱

HOPES FOR FRENCH UNITY HAVE RISEN WITH the arrival of General Catroux in Algiers for discussions with General Giraud preparatory to a visit by General de Gaulle. Giraud is said to have come to recognize that De Gaulle commands the support of most Frenchmen inside France, who see in him the symbol of uncompromising resistance to the Nazis. This gives the Fighting French leader a moral authority to which Giraud can only oppose the steady support he has received from the United States government. Both generals are fervently anti-Nazi, but while De Gaulle's experiences in the war have moderated his original conservatism and brought him round to the democratic point of view, Giraud retains his authoritarian distrust of the Republic. Moreover, whatever his military qualities, he seems something of a political innocent who fails to understand the implications of advice given him by political advisers. Consequently, so long as he is surrounded by such men as Peyrouton, Noguès, and Boisson, the fusion of his forces with those of the Fighting French is likely to remain incomplete. There is some reason to hope, however, that Noguès and Boisson are slated for early removal, and certainly nothing could do more to aid the unity negotiations except the dismissal of Peyrouton. But this, probably, is more than we can hope for. It would mean too open an acknowledgment of the State Department's errors.

✱

VICE-PRESIDENT WALLACE'S TOUR THROUGH Latin America has proved a great success so far. Its political significance exceeds that of the conventional diplomatic visit, and particularly in Chile the reception accorded him amounted to a genuine plebiscite in support of a policy of cooperation between the two countries. One has the feeling that, for the first time, the men and women of Latin America, not merely the governments and chancelleries, are striving toward a genuine good-neighbor policy. The fact is extremely important in itself, and the service rendered by Vice-President Wallace is inestimable. But our officials in Washington, our press, and our radio commentators must not overlook the fact that the 100,000 Chileans who welcomed the Vice-President in the Stadium of Santiago cheered in him the defender of the "Century of the Common Man," the advocate of a real people's peace. He was enthusiastically greeted in Chile for the very attitude which causes our reactionaries to attack him at home. A visit by Hoover, for instance, would have met with a quite opposite reception at this time. Incidentally, Mr. Wallace's visit underlines the splendid accomplishments of various Chilean groups. The Chilean edition of the magazine Free World (Mundo Libre) was launched with a first number devoted principally to the Vice-President. The Association of Spanish Republicans, very strong in Chile, also contributed to the magnificent demonstration in the Stadium.

✱

IT IS RATHER IRONIC THAT CONGRESS, THE flower of the democratic system, is the one court in the land in which a citizen may be prosecuted, injured in his professional career, and even driven from public life without so much as a hearing. This technique was worked so brazenly and with such success by the Dies committee that it has now been adopted by a number of Congressmen for regular use on the floor of the House. Representative Lambertson, the honorable gentleman from Kansas, suggested a few weeks ago that the President's sons had been sneaked out of the fighting zones as soon as their pictures had been snapped. Representative Costello, the honorable gentleman from California, has on no evidence whatever branded the Office of War Information a haven for slackers. And Representative Flannagan of Virginia, likewise an honorable gentleman by virtue of his election, has pinned the label of draft-dodger on an extremely able government official named David Ginsburg. As general counsel of the Office of Price Administration, Mr. Ginsburg won the public thanks of the Senate for his services, and Leon Henderson, his superior, naturally requested draft deferment for him on the ground that he was essential. When Senator Brown succeeded Henderson, Ginsburg, having completed a phase of his work, asked his new superior for a release so that he might enter the army. Brown granted the release, and a high officer in the War Department who wanted to utilize Ginsburg's services urged him to apply for a commission. He did, and the Flannagan slander, seasoned with a dose of anti-Semitism, followed. Other public servants have suffered similarly. As a result resignations are piling up among those who are unwilling to subject themselves to the vindictiveness of men who may slander without fear of punishment.

*

THE REPEAL OF THE $25,000 SALARY LIMIT by an overwhelming Congressional vote was a serious personal defeat for President Roosevelt and a setback in the vital anti-inflation campaign. But it can hardly be denied that Congress was within its rights in rescinding an order that clearly violated the intent of the legislative body. The Nation has questioned on several occasions the wisdom of limiting earned income without at the same time placing a ceiling on unearned income of all kinds. But the case for placing a top limit on incomes during war time is unassailable on economic and psychological grounds. Without such a ceiling the government has inadequate justification for asking John L. Lewis's miners or the farm bloc to back down on their demands in order to prevent inflation. For money that is squandered by the wealthy on luxuries will have a no less inflationary effect than money spent by miners or farmers on food, clothing, or shelter. It is clear, however, that the ceiling on incomes should be imposed not by the President but by Congress. If Congress refuses to act, the President would be well within his rights to carry the fight to the American people. Once the people are made aware of the issue, Congress can be forced into action.

*

A COMPLETE ANSWER TO RICKENBACKER'S efforts to link absenteeism to union activities has been provided in a series of recent industrial studies of the problem fully reported by the Wall Street Journal though neglected by the press in general. No less than 95 per cent of all absences in West Coast airplane factories was found to be due to illness and transportation difficulties, according to a survey just completed by the Aircraft War Production Council. Illness of the workers themselves accounted for 75 per cent of the absenteeism among men and 70 per cent of that among women. Illness or death in the family was responsible for an additional 8½ per cent of male and 12½ per cent of female absenteeism. Transportation breakdowns and failures of car-sharing plans accounted for another 12½ per cent. Another study, conducted by the Consolidated Edison Company of New York, revealed that the common cold and other respiratory diseases were the cause of one-half of its worker absences. Some twenty different causes of absenteeism were listed in a survey made by an industrial group in Los Angeles, among which one of the least important was drunkenness. Accidents were a major factor. Household responsibilities and the necessity for having time to shop rank as fairly important causes of absence among women workers. This difficulty has been met in some places by short shifts, plant nurseries, and plant shopping services, but most industries have been slow in adopting even such obvious remedial measures.

*

THE DANISH ELECTORS WHO WENT TO THE polls last week had no illusions about their ability to change the present state of affairs. They knew that, however they voted, the German occupation would continue and the coalition Danish government under the opportunistic Premier Scavenius would pursue its policy of cold cooperation with the Nazis. Nevertheless, far more of them cast their ballots than at the last election, and although the Nazis claim the results as indorsement of the government and its policy, there is good reason to interpret them as a demonstration of belief in democracy. All the big parties gained, with the greatest percentage increase scored by the Conservatives, whose exiled leader, Christmas Müller, now heads the Free Danish movement in London. The Social Democrats also improved their position impressively. Scavenius's own party—the Radicals—showed a comparatively slight increase in votes and lost one of their thirteen seats in the Folketing, while the small Farmers' Party, which had been suspected of Nazi sympathies, was almost wiped out, losing both its seats. Out of over 2,000,000 votes polled, only 43,277 were cast for the acknowledged Danish Nazi Party. This represented an apparent gain of some 12,000, but it was made possible by orders switching the votes of the German minority in Schleswig, which had voted 15,000 strong for their own Nazi candidate in 1939. Altogether the election affords further evidence of the refusal of the Danes to kowtow to their conquerors. Their resistance may be passive—apart from considerable sabotage activities—but it is unshakable.

*

DENMARK IN FACT HAS EARNED THE RIGHT to resent a recent comparison with Hungary for which John F. Montgomery, former American Minister in Budapest, was responsible. Mr. Montgomery, who has given support to the American activities of the notorious Tibor Eckhardt, declared in a letter to a Hungarian Committee in Youngstown, Ohio: "Although Hungary is technically our adversary, she is a slave of the Axis just as Denmark is, a fact which few people understand. The truth is I find very little understanding and appreciation of Hungary's position." We think Mr. Montgomery is poorly informed about both Denmark and Hungary. He apparently is unaware that the government to which he was once accredited was fascist before Hitler. However much Regent Horthy and his feudal friends may personally dislike the dictation of Nazi upstarts, they accept it as a lesser evil than the loss of their own power, whether it means sending Hungarian armies to die in Russia, starving their own people to feed Germany, or introducing the Nürnberg laws. It should be our task to bring justice to the Hungarian peasants and workers after the war, but if we are to do that there can be no forgiveness for those who sold their souls and are now hoping to escape fulfilment of the bargain.

Much Ado About Food

IF WE are to judge by the newspaper space and the radio time allotted to it, the food problem dominated all others in the thinking of the American people this past week. Some radio commentators went so far as to use the word "famine" in their discussion of the aggravated food scarcity. Doubtless the newspapers of Berlin, Rome, and Tokyo have delighted in reproducing for their readers—for whom empty store shelves are a normal thing—the more extreme stories about the "hunger riots" in Washington and New York. As a result of this deluge of publicity, the average American is probably pretty well convinced that if a food crisis is not already upon us it is not far distant. The fact that the beginning of meat and butter rationing virtually coincided with the appointment of Chester C. Davis as Food Administrator and Congressional consideration of the Pace bill to raise food prices and the Bankhead bill to defer all farm workers has made it appear as if this crisis were moving rapidly toward some kind of terrifying climax which threatens the entire war effort.

How much of this publicity build-up is political and how much merely reflects a natural journalistic tendency to exploit a subject of great interest to everyone, we do not know. But we have noticed that the press has given comparatively little space to a sober analysis of the basic facts, which if adequately presented would have done much to allay any hysteria that may have developed. For the facts would have shown that despite a few bad spots the basic food situation of the country at the present time is excellent.

The absence of the usual quantity of meat in the butchers' show cases, for example, appears not to be due so much to lend-lease requirements as to the simple fact that farmers are not slaughtering their hogs and cattle in the usual amount but are keeping them on the farms for breeding purposes. On January 1 there were 73,660,000 hogs on the country's farms, an increase of 13,283,000 in a year—the largest increase in history. It is predicted that Iowa's 1943 pig crop will be 37 per cent above last year's record yield. Similarly, there were 5 per cent more cattle on our farms on January 1 than on the same date a year ago. Egg production in January and February was nearly 16 per cent above that of the corresponding months a year ago, while the rearing of both chickens and turkeys for food purposes is expected to reach a new record. Moreover, official March estimates show that farmers are expecting a very sharp increase in the acreage devoted to the chief meat substitutes—soy beans, peas, and peanuts. Now that rationing has been established, no difficulty should be encountered in distributing these basic protein foods equitably among the population.

Although food prospects are encouraging, real problems are constantly arising in adjusting agriculture to our war economy. It is these problems, rather than any immediate crisis, that the new Food Administrator will have to tackle. Chief among these is the matter of farm prices. Although the prices of the things the farmer sells have risen far more than those of the things he buys, the farm bloc in Congress is committed to a still higher level. The Pace bill for including farm-labor costs in computing "parity" has been temporarily sidetracked in the Senate, but will undoubtedly reappear. Holding the present price level is primarily a political problem, and the ultimate responsibility for this task falls upon Congress rather than the Administration. But though the present food price level is as high as it should be, the prices of many farm crops are seriously out of line with war-time requirements. Most grain prices, for example, are far too high, while the prices of protein-producing crops such as peas, soy beans, and peanuts are too low to bring maximum production. One of Mr. Davis's first responsibilities will be to grapple with this problem.

Hardly less acute is the farm man-power situation. While the shortage of farm labor is not as severe as the farm bloc would like us to believe, it is serious enough to hamper production if it is not remedied. A "land army" of high-school youths, women, and city workers would go a long way toward meeting the situation, but immediate steps need to be taken to organize such an army if it is to be ready to save this year's crops. Action is reported to be already under way to assure an adequate amount of farm machinery and fertilizer to meet the increased goals of war production.

While there is nothing in the food situation that should cause alarm, neither is there reason for complacency. Our food needs are bound to increase rather than diminish as the war progresses. The army is still expanding. Lend-lease requirements will continue to rise. Stockpiles will have to be built up for use in the post-war period. If these demands are to be met, careful planning is required. American agriculture will have to be reorganized to produce the maximum nutritional values with a minimum of man-power. Our diets will also have to be reorganized in line with the necessary changes in farm production. By tackling this latter task soberly and intelligently, without trace of hysteria, the average citizen may make a substantial contribution to the winning of the war.

The Press on Churchill

SO FAR as the American public is concerned, Mr. Churchill's speech of March 21 has had several good results. The sultry weather that overhung our thinking about post-war world organization has begun to break up, and most observers already report a fresh breeze of progressive realism. But it must be said that on the whole reaction to the speech was expressed in purely general terms. The idea of regional councils, for instance, proved to be too concrete and too new for immediate acceptance.

One thing is quite remarkable, and that is that the speech cut across all party lines upon this issue of regional councils. So sound an advocate of collective security as the Cincinnati Inquirer was extremely suspicious of the whole idea on the ground that it smacked too strongly of the old balance-of-power policy. The same point of view was taken by the Raleigh News and Observer and to some extent by the Washington Post. In isolationist Boston the Christian Science Monitor, while accepting the councils, did so on the assumption they were to be incorporated into a larger world organization. Again and again this question of the balance of power cropped up. Commentators who were by no means sure that they wished America to collaborate in Europe nevertheless objected to any attempt by Britain to reconstitute the ill-famed balance. In a certain sense this attitude was a consequence of a natural resentment at the thought that Britain might be attempting to play off the United States and the Soviet Union against each other. But that was not the meaning of Mr. Churchill's speech.

Very few of the nation's newspapers have discussed frankly our relations with the Soviets, though an exception must be made of the New York press. The metropolitan journals, recognizing that Mr. Eden's visit was chiefly concerned with the problem of Russian relations, dealt quite boldly with the question. The London Times article proposing an Anglo-Russian bloc had prejudiced Mr. Eden's mission, for no State Department likes to be presented with a fait accompli, not even when it is a case of one of our friends coming to an agreement with another. Mr. Eden's statement that the London Times was not an official spokesman needed strong support, support which necessarily had to take the form of a reasoned argument covering the whole ground. Mr. Churchill was successful in this, his main intention.

While the exclusive bloc has been disavowed and there seems little suspicion remaining in this country, the reality of the British rapprochement with the Soviets is doubted by no one. Its necessity, indeed, has been everywhere acknowledged. It is now clearly realized that American refusal to deal adequately with the Soviets will not cause Britain to reverse its attitude. In a curious way, American realization of this is all the clearer because Mr. Churchill also assured the American conservatives that the Anglo-Soviet treaty—which, by the way, President Roosevelt originally proposed—does not mean that Britain will become Communist. In sum, and to say it in American terms, Mr. Churchill has rounded out Vice-President Wallace's utterances and looked right over the heads of the little men in the Berle corner of the State Department. That this represents an immense gain for the United States cannot be doubted, for if we are to have any illusions concerning the Anglo-Russian rapprochement we may be tempted to waste our time in trying to set up reactionary governments designed to hold the Soviets in check.

There has been little open talk of the cordon sanitaire. That the British leader unmistakably rejected the futile policy has doubtless something to do with this, for no cordon, however strong, could be maintained without British support. But this cannot be the sole explanation. The truth is that the idea no longer seems attractive to thoughtful conservatives. But, it will be remarked, no one ever does talk openly of a cordon; what one does mention is the independence of small frontier states. And this question was repeatedly raised, particularly by the New York Times, which used the following words: "The cordial and concerted agreement among Britain, the United States, and Russia on which the whole scheme rests must still be established. If Russia were to accept the stipulations regarding the small nations in conformity with the Atlantic Charter, America's cooperation would be much more assured than it is now." In other words, the recognition of the old cordon sanitaire states is to be a condition of American cooperation.

In sharp contrast, both the Herald Tribune leading editorial and Mr. Lippmann in his column gave clear support to what is now held to be the British opinion, that it would be best to yield to the Russian demands concerning the Baltic states, Poland, and Rumania. In any case, Mr. Churchill's words—"it will not be given to any one nation to achieve the full satisfaction of its individual wishes"—seem to leave the door open to compromise. And that Mr. Churchill was making a fair offer to the United States was called in doubt only by such elements as Representative Woodruff and the Daily News, which rejected collective security in favor of outright militarization of this country upon a conscription basis.

Throughout the country, then, though there was little attempt to formulate proposals in regard to the U. S. S. R. there was universal recognition of the necessity of coming to an agreement with it. This must be taken as by far the most important consequence of Mr. Churchill's speech. It is clear proof that the American people are ready to accept a progressive solution of the essential problem of collective security.

The Mark Starr Case

NEW YORKERS have been wont to note with superior smiles the antics of educational authorities in what they regard as the less enlightened parts of the country. Now it is their turn to blush for New York City's Board of Education, which has refused to appoint an outstanding candidate to the new post of adult-education director, apparently on the ground that he has long been associated with labor unions. Mark Starr was recommended for this position by the Board of Superintendents and the Board of Examiners, who after exhaustive tests found him to be the only fully qualified applicant out of a list of nearly one hundred. It is not surprising that they should have done so. Mr. Starr began life as a pit boy and by his own efforts won himself a scholarship at the London Labor College. For more than twenty years he has devoted himself to the problems of adult education, and for the last eight he has been educational director of the International Ladies' Garment Workers, a trade union which has done a unique job in making education an integral part of its activities.

In explaining why he voted against Mr. Starr, Ellsworth B. Buck, president of the board, said: "I would oppose the appointment as director of adult education of any man who had a long record as a labor antagonist. By the same token I oppose the appointment of a man who has a long record as a labor protagonist." Following the logic of this argument, the board should head its next advertisement of the position: "None but socially philosophic hermaphrodites need apply."

More seriously, the idea that labor sympathies should be a bar to an appointment of such vital interest to labor is one that must be challenged sharply. New York is a union city, and probably a majority of the students in adult-education classes are either union members or the children of union members. Why should they be deprived of the direction of someone who supports their aims and champions their rights? This does not mean that an adult-education program should be a course in indoctrination. On the contrary, as every experienced teacher in this field knows, the only successful way to educate adults in such fields as the social sciences is to present them with both sides of a question and give them an opportunity to reason it out for themselves. And this, we can state with assurance, is the educational method preached and practiced by Mark Starr.

Trade-union leaders are joining with outstanding educators in protesting against the action of the Board of Education. We hope they keep it up, but we hope too that this smack in the eye will stimulate them into taking a more constant interest in the educational problems of New York. Hitherto they have not exerted the influence on this department to which their strength entitles them and have left an open field to reactionary forces which have not failed to exploit their opportunities. We suspect that the pressure groups whose undercover activities are continually impeding educational progress in New York City—and in other large cities—are largely responsible for Mr. Starr's rejection. If labor does not wake up and play its proper part in exposing and routing these forces, New York City may come to be classed with Talmadge's Georgia.

The Language of Piracy

BENJAMIN F. FAIRLESS, president of the United States Steel Corporation, chose an interesting metaphor when he promised the Truman committee that persons responsible for passing defective steel plate at the Carnegie-Illinois steel works would "walk the plank" regardless of who they were. The language of piracy is peculiarly appropriate to such extraordinary behavior. We hope that Attorney General Biddle will respond to the appeal of Senator Truman and not merely rely upon the pledges now made by the corporation's own officials, but investigate the circumstances and criminally prosecute those responsible.

If the faking of tests and the passing of defective steel was, indeed, the work of underlings, the United States Steel Corporation is badly in need of reorganization. The testimony makes one wonder just how far up in the company's hierarchy this cheating of the government was authorized, suggested, or condoned. The indignation expressed and the punishment threatened by top officials must be read in the light of Senator Truman's statement that J. Lester Perry, president of Carnegie-Illinois, United States Steel's principal operating subsidiary, did not give investigators "very strong cooperation." According to the Senator, his investigators were hampered by the attitude of the company. It does not sound as if there was any great anxiety to root out this kind of cheating by subordinate employees, if that is all it was.

From the record so far unrolled, it is hard to avoid the inference that more is yet to be known of the whole affair. George E. Dye, supervisor of inspection, said he had been aware since last July that the mill "was shipping badly laminated and piped plates to the United States navy and United States maritime shipyards" and supplying defective steel for lend-lease. He said that he brought this to the attention of his supervisors and that his inspectors were assigned clerical duties that prevented them from doing an effective job. Newspaper reports say responsibility was traced no higher than William F. McGarrity, chief metallurgist of the Carnegie-Illinois Edgar Thompson Works. Dye testified, however, that when he referred this matter to McGarrity last November, he was "instructed to reject all the bad plates." Two days later, according to Dye, he was told that McGarrity had "'got his ears beat back' when he brought the subject up in an operating meeting and I was instructed to go easy on rejections." This is denied by McGarrity, but it would seem to merit further inquiry. What higher officials sit in at these operating meetings? Is it possible that such practices can go on month after month, during a war, without some instructions from officials high in the councils of the company?

Perry might have been more candid on the stand. First he declared that the breaking in two of the tanker Schenectady during its trial run on the West Coast on January 16 was not due to the failure of steel. Perry gave as his authority the report of the American Bureau of Shipping. But when Senator Brewster proved from the same report that inferior plates "more like cast-iron than steel" did play a part, Perry gave a curious answer. He said that "in any event the plate at the point where the break began was not a product of the Irvin works." It took questioning by Senator Ferguson to bring out the fact that though this steel may not have come from the Irvin works, it did come from another plant of Perry's company, the Homestead Works. This sort of thing does not increase one's esteem for Perry.

That steel-company officials, subordinate or important, should indulge in cheating of this kind is both sickening and infuriating. The lives of our own fighting men and those of our allies were and, for all we know, still are endangered by ships made from defective steel. We hope that the power and prestige of the Steel Corporation will not save it from a thorough investigation by the Justice Department and that those responsible will be convicted and as severely punished as they deserve. And we hope that investigation and prosecution will not stop short with the first subordinate who is willing to "take the rap" for this shameful episode.

The Shipshaw Scandal

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 28

CURIOUSLY enough, none of the Congressmen who were so scornful of TVAs on the Danube have said anything about Shipshaw on the Saguenay. To establish public-power projects in foreign countries is philanthropic folly but to endow a dam in Canada for the aluminum trust is statesmanship. So at least I read the minds of these Congressmen and of some sectors of the conservative press. Mind-reading is necessary, because they have decided to keep as quiet as possible about the affair. From their point of view, there has already been too much talking by well-meaning but unsophisticated friends. For the whole deplorable revelation, it seems, is due neither to PM nor to the Washington Merry-Go-Round but to the New York Times, which in all innocence and with no intent whatsoever to muck-rake let slip a hint of the facts. "If only they hadn't printed that story," said a power-trust stooge in a Washington hotel lobby, after a day of arduous labor at the WPB. "That story" is the dispatch from Ottawa published by the New York Times last January 31, "New Power Plant Gives Quebec Lead." The tip-off (the ivory-towered editors of the New York Times have grown unused to the wicked ways of crusading journalism) was the sentence which said, with childlike delight and ingenuousness, "Not the least amazing thing about it [the Shipshaw power development on the Saguenay River in Quebec] is that it is already paid for. . . ."

On investigation it turned out that this $65,900,000 project, which will not be completed until November, was more than paid for months ago. Inquiry, subterranean inquiry (for Jesse Jones does not make a fetish of candor), in Washington by Drew Pearson and this correspondent disclosed that Jesse Jones had given the Aluminum Company of Canada an advance of $68,500,000 interest free under contracts signed in the spring of last year. This was enough to pay the entire cost of the project, plus a pourboire of $2,600,000. The day after this was published in the Merry-Go-Round and PM, C. D. Howe, Canadian Minister of Munitions and Supply, rose in the House of Commons at Ottawa to explain—and there were further disclosures. Howe picked up a copy of the Ottawa Evening Citizen which carried a summary of the American stories headed "Canadian Plant Is Financed by American Funds." "As a matter of fact," Howe explained disingenuously, "this is wholly inaccurate. The Shipshaw development was built with the corporate funds of the Aluminum Corporation of Canada." Later, under prodding from nasty members of the opposition, Howe was a little more explicit, though almost as bland. "An advance payment was asked for the metal," Howe said of the aluminum to be produced with the power to be generated at Shipshaw, "and the money received was not capital; it was revenue—in other words, the sale of a product and the payment for it." That the entire cost of the project was paid off in advance, an interest-free advance payment against aluminum to be delivered by the end of 1945, is presumably a mere detail. Many a manufacturer would like to do business with the government on such a basis. This, to adapt the terminology used by critics of railroad labor, is, indeed, featherbed financing.

Howe's explanation revealed that the British had also made an advance payment "of the order of $10,000,000 to $12,000,000" and Australia of "I think $3,000,000 or $4,000,000"—he was oddly vague. He also disclosed that the Aluminum Company of Canada had the aid of the government of Canada in obtaining these not unfavorable terms. The plant might have been built with the proceeds of a loan at interest from the three governments, but of this conventional method Howe disapproved. "I took objection," Howe declared, "to other governments lending money to the company to meet the capital outlay subject to repayment after the war. We have tried to avoid burdens of that kind. What was finally evolved and accepted by the purchasers was that the Aluminum Company would sell at the current market price a block of aluminum to the three companies totaling the figure I have just given." Howe had not given it, but the advances obviously total $81,500,000 to $84,500,000. The Aluminum Company itself seemed to consider these arrangements somewhat better than the "common practice" they were termed by Howe. For the Ottawa Hansard reports this amusing tidbit during the debate:

Mr. Coldwell: If I may ask a question, is it not fair to say that by advance payment on future purchases of aluminum the United States is assisting in paying for this plant, as are also other governments?

Mr. Howe: No. I am coming to that now.

Mr. Coldwell: I have their prospectus before me, and they make that statement.

Mr. Howe: Do not mix up two things.

Howe did not specify what he meant by "two things." Perhaps one of them was what one may properly boast of to one's shareholders; the other, how one should discreetly explain it to the public.

This is more than another case of financial favoritism to the Aluminum Company. That is an old story at the RFC. This is part of what will be seen more clearly in later years as a gigantic plan to enable the aluminum trust to dominate the power and aluminum business in North America. It demands investigation, and it is good to see that Senator Truman, to whom we owe earlier aluminum revelations, has addressed an inquiry on it to Jesse Jones and that Congressman Coffee of Washington has introduced a resolution in the House calling for a joint Congressional investigation. Unless there is pressure upon Congress, the Coffee resolution will be buried, and the Truman committee may let the sheer volume of its activities distract it from the Shipshaw scandal. The Northwest, the Southeast, and New York State are the areas from which that pressure should come, for enough is known to show that public-power developments in the Columbia River basin, in the Tennessee Valley, and in the St. Lawrence area were sidetracked to make way for Shipshaw. More important than the financial terms granted the Aluminum Company by Jones is the fact that Shipshaw was given preferential treatment on priorities at the WPB while major additions to capacity at Grand Coulee and TVA and a badly needed transmission line between New York City and the St. Lawrence were stalled and finally shelved.

Had these American projects been private and the Shipshaw project public, there would long ago have been an outcry from the press. For Shipshaw has been built in the Canadian wilds under the most difficult of circumstances while much more accessible sources of power here have been ignored. I quote again from the tell-tale New York Times account of Shipshaw: "For many months it has been a 'hush-hush' war mystery not to be written about. . . . But strange tales circulated in Quebec province about how the work was being carried on in temperatures 30° below zero, of the blasting of 18,000 cubic yards of solid rock, of the big dam at Lake Manouan, 170 air-line miles up in the wilderness, where there is no railroad and no road, so that everything, men, horses, and thousands of tons of equipment, including 'bulldozers,' trucks, and steam shovels, had to be flown in."

Compare these conditions with Grand Coulee, where a dam and a powerhouse wait for three generators long ago authorized by Congress, generators which would add close to 350,000 kilowatts of capacity to the Bonneville area. Compare these conditions with TVA, where Congress has authorized downstream generating units with some 600,000 extra kilowatts of capacity. Why were these and smaller public-power projects in California's Central Valley denied priorities on generators and turbines while equipment was rushed to Shipshaw? Why was copper sent to Shipshaw, though it was denied, despite the President's instructions and the War Department's approval, to the Massena-New York transmission line which is all we need to tap the 500,000 kilowatts of capacity now idle in the New York City area? How the New Dealers would be trounced for their impracticality and for sacrificing the war effort to public power if the situation were the reverse of what it is!

The answer is that the RFC and the WPB are both dominated by enemies of public power and friends of the aluminum trust. The foremost of these is Jesse Jones. They want no more expansion at Grand Coulee or elsewhere in the Northwest because it would be public power and because Congress provided in the Bonneville Act that this power should not become the basis of any industrial monopolies, as in aluminum. They want only so much expansion in TVA as is necessary for the convenience of the Aluminum Company and other big metal and chemical concerns. They would rather leave 500,000 kilowatts—the base for the production of 500,000,000 pounds of aluminum a year—idle in New York City than build a transmission line which might ultimately bring cheap St. Lawrence power back to the metropolis. They have laid their plans well. Promises by Jones to set up more producers of aluminum have been forgotten. With the exception of one small project for Olin Corporation, all the government-owned plants are under Alcoa operation. All were designed by Alcoa, and use an older and less efficient method of separating the aluminum from the alumina. This will provide an argument for scrapping them after the war because they will be unable to compete with more efficient and lower-cost aluminum-trust plants here and in Canada. Several of the biggest, like that in Queens, New York, have been located in high-cost power areas, and this will furnish another argument for selling them to the junk man. Finally, the Aluminum Company of Canada, with its cost-free power and aluminum plants on the Saguenay in Quebec, will be in a position to sell the light metal more cheaply in this country than any government or private plant.

The Shipshaw project, financed cost free out of public funds, will provide a new argument in the fight the aluminum trust has waged for two generations to stifle, if it could not dominate, the development of the St. Lawrence. Shipshaw, says that New York Times story, "will give far more power than Canada would have obtained from the St. Lawrence waterways scheme." The objection to Shipshaw arises from no nationalistic animus against a development in Canada but from objections to a private deal which will enable the aluminum and power trusts to undercut public power and the industries dependent upon it on both sides of the border, in Ontario as in the Northwest, the Tennessee Valley, and New York. In the last war we built Muscle Shoals and then fought two decades over its control. The public finally won. The aluminum and power trusts, thanks to Jesse Jones and the WPB, have been able to pursue a wiser policy this time. They have arranged for us to build them a new and greater Muscle Shoals, a project as great as Boulder Dam, in the Canadian wilds. And this time they arranged in advance that though we foot the bill, the property shall be theirs.

Why They Follow John L. Lewis

BY SELDEN C. MENEFFEE

Hazard, Ky., March 23

IF A collapse in the present negotiations between John L. Lewis's United Mine Workers and the operators of the Appalachian coal fields should be followed by a strike call, the miners would back their national leadership practically 100 per cent. Some of them would stay away from work only because "there is nothing else we can do," but all would stay away, and the mines would be closed. I reached this conclusion after talking last week with about a hundred miners in Logan County, West Virginia, and Perry County, Kentucky, two of the largest coal-producing areas.

If the miners strike, however, it will be with genuine reluctance. The great majority of them realize that a halt in production now would interfere seriously with the war effort. "The way I see it, coal is at the bottom of the whole war," one man told me. "It takes coal to melt the iron ore, and it takes iron and steel to make guns and tanks." The miners do not want to interrupt this process. Nearly all of them are buying war bonds on the pay-roll allotment plan; and house after company house displays one, two, or even three blue or silver stars in the window.

A Kentucky miner assured me, with deep emotion, "I don't want to do a thing that will hurt our government. I got a boy in the army, and I'd hate to see the coal stop coming from the mines even for one day, for fear it might hurt him." Yet this man, like the others, expressed his firm intention of supporting the union's stand even if it means a strike.

A general coal strike at this stage of the war would do more than hamper war production. It would touch off an anti-union campaign unequalled in labor history. The press has already sharpened its sword. Fred W. Perkins, for example, a Scripps-Howard writer covering the negotiations, has repeatedly referred to the pending strike as one which "would delay victory and might even lose the war." A mine shutdown is all that would be needed to induce the present Congress to pass strong anti-strike and anti-labor legislation. Several Representatives have already made this clear in public statements.

In the event of a strike, the inevitable hysteria can be minimized and the miners saved from unreasoning attacks which would leave them bewildered and embittered only if the situation in the coal fields is clearly understood. The willingness of the miners to follow their union leaders is traceable to three things. First, they have profound faith in the rightness of union policy, a faith which was reinforced by their hard-won victory in the 1941 strike. The union has raised basic wages in the mines to $7 a day and has proved the miners' only real protection against the operators. The miners' loyalty, by and large, is to the union itself and the local leaders rather than to the national officers. But Lewis has a strong personal following, especially in the recently organized Southern fields, which benefited by abolition of the North-South wage differential two years ago.

Second, the miners all feel that rapidly rising prices make the present wage scale unfair. "We've got to live and feed our kids," they say. They don't complain about deductions for war bonds, but they see the Victory tax and the projected 20 per cent withholding feature of the new income-tax law as cuts in pay. They are anxious to earn enough to offset these inroads on their cash income.

Third, most of the miners believe, optimistically, that the need for coal is so great that their demands will be met, or some reasonable compromise made, in order to keep the mines in operation. Many of them predict that the negotiations will continue right up to the deadline, when a settlement will be reached. If they do shut down the mines, the men will think of themselves as just "sitting at home waiting for a contract to be signed" rather than as actively striking. They believe such a strike would last only a few days. They fervently hope so, for most of them remember the three-months strike in 1941, when suffering was acute despite union aid and the dollar-a-day food credits allowed by some company stores.

I went into the coal fields with two preconceptions: that Lewis's demands for a $9 basic wage and an $8 absolute minimum, if fully realized, would destroy the present wage- and price-control system that is our main protection against inflation; and that a basic wage of $7 a day was pretty fair pay anyway, even in this period of rising prices. Of the validity of the first I am still convinced. But such concepts as the Little Steel formula and the "spiral of inflation" mean nothing to nine-tenths of the miners. For them, the battle is as always strictly between them and the operators, with the danger of hurting war production only an unfortunate complicating factor.

On the adequacy of the prevailing $7 wage I changed my opinion after witnessing the widespread poverty that still exists in the mining camps. "We could buy more with $5.60 two years ago than we can with $7 today," miner after miner declared. Reports that the men squander their money are wholly unfounded. I saw crowds of people in the stores of Logan on a Saturday night, but most of them were buying the necessities of life. The liquor stores were not nearly so busy as those of Mobile, Seattle, and other centers of new war industry.

The continued poverty of the miners is due in part to the numerous and sizable deductions made from their pay by the operators. After war-bond allotments and Social Security and Victory taxes are taken out, there are deductions for rent, light, water, and coal, and then for health, hospital, and burial benefits. The men are even required to pay rental for the lamps they use in the mines and the cost of the explosives they need to get out the coal. I saw several pay slips on which gross figures of $80 to $90 for two weeks' work had been trimmed down a third to a half by these charges. "They got back that last pay raise long ago in bigger cuts and higher prices at the commissary," one miner told me. The workers are not forced to take "scrip" usable only in the company stores, but most of them are obliged to buy a large part of their supplies from the company because it is so hard to get into town. Complaints of overcharging and violations of ceiling prices in the company stores are widespread.

Another cause for dissatisfaction among the miners is the lack of overtime pay. "The operators got their raise of 14 cents a ton to cover time and a half for Saturday work, but they haven't passed it on to us," a West Virginia miner complained; "they only started overtime work a few weeks ago to make a showing at the negotiations." A local union official in Kentucky said to me, "The operators somehow manage to shut down one day during every week to avoid working us over thirty-five hours, so they can pay us straight time on Saturdays. Usually they plead a lack of cars; but last week they used as an excuse the funeral of a colored man who hadn't even worked in the mine for the last four years. All Saturday work should be at time-and-a-half rate." If the miners were allowed to work six straight days a week there would be much better feeling toward the companies. This would seem a not unreasonable desire on their part, especially if the danger of a coal shortage is as great as the newspapers assert.

Finally, a major factor in the existing bad relations between miners and operators is the terrible squalor of most of the camps. Unpainted shanties, with muddy yards on muddy streets and practically no sanitary facilities, clutter up the bottom land along every river and creek in the mining districts. The comfortable homes of supervisory employees are usually set apart on higher land—"Snobs' Knob," the miners term it in one camp near Holden—and provide a glaring contrast. Miners' houses barely large enough for one family, are divided to hold two; the coal-streaked faces of unkempt children peer through every window and around every door when a stranger approaches.

I visited one house at Allais, Kentucky, in which the holes in the rough board floor and around the doors were big enough for a man to put his hand through. The miner's wife told me that on windy days it was impossible to keep the house warm, even with coal fires in both the fireplace and the kitchen stove. She was doing the family wash when I called, heating the water over a coal fire in the muddy yard. This tiny house, sheltering a family of seven, was rented for about $30 a month, including light, water, and coal. That may not seem high to a city dweller, but considering the condition of the house and the lower rent formerly charged for it, the miner finds it exorbitant. In some camps the miners are charged a set rate for coal each month, regardless of whether they need or get it (the price of coal here is only about $3.50 a ton). Little grievances such as these are often the ones that rankle the most.

Conditions are not uniformly bad. I found fairly well-kept camps at Seco and in the Jenkins district of eastern Kentucky. One camp at Holden, West Virginia, has a swimming pool which is open to those miners and their families who can pass a health test. In Harlan County, long an anti-union stronghold with its captive mines, I am told that showers have been installed at some mine exits. The miners appreciate any benefits provided by the operators, but they still look to their union for guidance and support.

Some union leaders claim that there is enough coal above ground to last for several weeks or months; and the U. M. W. has provided for the continued operation of mines outside the Appalachian area. These, however, produce only 28 per cent of the nation's coal. As long as the issue is between the operators and their employees, the union will keep its following intact. But if the federal government finds it necessary to take over the mines to keep the war industries going, all the indications are that the men will gladly go back to work pending a final settlement. They put Uncle Sam above John L. Lewis.

Steel Wins Wars

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

STEEL remains the most important single item in the modern war test," writes the London Economist. This statement has been amply confirmed by the events of two world wars.

German patriots have always boasted that in the first war Germany was enabled to hold out against its enemies for four years by the genius of its military leaders and the heroism of its soldiers. In reality, military superiority throughout the war went hand in hand with superiority in the production of iron and steel. Frederick the Great's observation that God was invariably on the side of the big battalions can be modernized into God is on the side of the country with the biggest production of iron and steel.

Germany began the First World War, as the second, with a Blitzkrieg. This had direct and important military results. Ferdinand Friedensburg, one of the best-known German experts, wrote in "Coal and Iron in the World War" (Berlin, 1934):

The rapid German offensives in the west and in the east resulted in the capture of the strategically unfavorably situated coal and iron districts of southwestern Poland, Belgium, and northern France. In this way a quarter of the Russian production of coal and a twelfth of the Russian production of pig-iron fell into German hands. The whole of Belgium's coal and iron production, half of France's production of coal, and no less than two-thirds of her production of pig-iron and steel also came into Germany's possession.

As a result, Germany's heavy industry and steel production expanded out of all proportion to that of the Entente. In August, 1914, the yearly steel production of the Central Powers was estimated at 21,000,000 tons and that of the Allies at 19,000,000 tons. But after the conquests of the first six weeks German steel production leaped to 24,000,000 tons—though not all the steel capacity of occupied France and Belgium could be used—while the production of the Allies was reduced to 13,000,000 tons. By this first lightning victory the Kaiser's armies gained a superiority in the supply of steel which was overcome only by the entry of the United States into the war.

In the First World War the greater part of the German army was always concentrated on the western front. Not more than a third of the effective divisions and at times only a fifth were sent against Russia. These troops, despite their numerical weakness, were able to win overwhelming victories because a highly industrialized Germany faced a predominantly agricultural Russia. To Russia's production of steel, which at that time was 4,436,000 tons, Germany opposed a production almost four times as great.

In spite of its initial successes in the west, in spite of the weakness of Russia at the time, the Kaiser lost the war when the industrial capacity and later the growing military strength of the United States were thrown into the balance. In 1917 the steel production of the Central Powers totaled only 16,000,000 tons, but the Allies, including the United States, were producing 58,000,000 tons. That was the decisive factor.

In the years immediately preceding the Second World War, Nazi Germany, as we know, organized its industry for war and enlarged its steel capacity every year. In the year which saw Munich, the annexation of Austria and the Sudetenland, the construction of the western fortifications, and a trial mobilization in Germany, the production of iron and steel in Germany was of course greatly stepped up. On the other hand, in the same year, at a time when the issue of peace or war was in the balance, the Western powers allowed their production of iron and steel to fall. In Great Britain and France it was only four-fifths as large as in 1937. Production for armament in these countries represented but a small part of their economic activity, whereas peace production played a decidedly minor role in National Socialist Germany.

On the heels of the economic recession which began in the United States in the autumn of 1937, industrial activity throughout the world was slowed up. The recession was so great that, despite the increase in armament, steel production in England fell from 8,629,000 tons in 1937 to 6,872,000 in 1938; in France from 7,914,000 tons in 1937 to 6,027,000 in 1938. The output of Germany's steel industry, however, steadily forged ahead until it far outstripped that of Great Britain and France combined.

With steel production in the last year of peace almost four times that of France, Germany started the Second World War; after its short campaign in Poland it went on to lightning victories in the west, and seemed to have conquered the world.

In the last year of peace and in the first phases of the war our attention was concentrated on the strength of Germany's military machine and war industry. We failed to consider the tremendous change that had taken place in the industrial structure of Soviet Russia in the period between the two wars, especially since the inauguration of the Five-Year plans. As the country had developed industrially, its steel production had increased accordingly. German experts called attention to this development very early, and we now know that it became a decisive factor in world history. Friedensburg wrote:

Despite the tremendous material and psychological effects of coal and iron on the origin, course, and end of the World War, the changes in the distribution of coal and iron factors have been comparatively small. In this respect a new war would find the situation much the same as it was at the beginning of the last. . . . Of all the great powers Russia is the only one which could face a new war considerably stronger with regard to coal and iron supplies than she was in 1914. Under the stress of economic circumstances Russia has learned to get on without foreign supplies, and she has tremendously strengthened her own productive apparatus. In this respect she has profited from the important lesson learned by many countries during the last war, namely, that in the event of war a country can reckon with certainty only on those mining and industrial districts which are situated well inside its boundaries.

In 1938, the last year before war broke out, German steel production was 22,991,000 tons and Russian 18,156,000 tons. That means that Russia had become the second strongest country in Europe; in steel and in heavy industry generally, Russia probably produced four-fifths as much as Germany.

The strategy of this war has been different from that of the first in that Germany has had to fight on only one front. When the German army attacked Russia in 1941, America was still at peace and England's air raids over Germany were few and small. Though German armies of occupation were stationed all over Europe, we may assume that about four-fifths of the German army fought against Russia in 1941 and 1942. In the First World War Russian steel production was one-fourth that of Germany, and one-fourth of the German army fought against czarist Russia; at the beginning of this war Russian steel production was four-fifths that of Germany, and four-fifths of the German army fought against the Soviet Union. In other words, Germany's steel production, as compared with that of the enemy, was the key to the distribution of the German army.

I don't mean to say that steel production, the development of heavy industry and aircraft manufacture in the Soviet Union, explains everything. Without the tremendous courage of the Russian soldiers, without the almost incredible capacity of the Russian people to withstand suffering, without the consciousness of the masses that this is their war, the successes of the Red Army would not have been possible. But one of the decisive factors in today's war has been Russia's industrial development, of which its steel production is typical. Though Germany has concentrated 80 per cent of its troops on the eastern front, it has achieved only small and indecisive success, and that at the cost of much of its reserves of men and matériel.

Germany is on the way to defeat, but the Allies have still a long way to go before Germany's military strength is broken. In this war as in the last the military and industrial might of the United States tips the scale. The future stages of the war will show the role of steel production more clearly than those of the past have done. I have said that England's steel production was less in 1938 than in 1937. Since 1939, however, England and the empire have been producing to the limit of their capacity, which is now from 17,000,000 to 18,000,000 tons annually. On the other hand, Russian steel production has been greatly reduced by the German invasion. However, though the Soviet government gives out no figures, we know that it is pushing industrial development in the Urals and in Asia. In its December, 1942, issue the London Economist said:

The latest reports from the "industrial front" show that the process of expansion in Russia's eastern war industries has not halted. The most recent achievement is the opening of a new giant blast furnace at Magnitogorsk. The furnace has been described as the largest in Europe, "only slightly below the capacity of the largest blast furnaces in the United States." Its annual capacity is said to exceed half a million tons of cast-iron. Its construction took only five months, and the furnace was put into operation on December 5. Another new furnace of similar size is to be opened in the Urals within the next few weeks. The Deputy Commissar for the Iron and Steel Industries has summed up the position:

"The Soviet iron and steel industry now produces every type of steel required by the war industries and is fully meeting demands. This is one of the main results of our work in 1942. All the works, including those in the Urals, which before the war produced the so-called trade metal have now been completely reorganized for the production of high-quality war metal used in making tanks, planes, and shells."

Despite these developments in Asiatic Russia it appears that Russian steel production today is hardly any greater than at the beginning of the war. The combined production of Russia and England is somewhat less than that at the disposal of Nazi Germany, which includes the capacity of all Continental Europe, reduced as that is. Germany's production, however, is only a fraction of that of America.

When the war broke out in Europe in 1939, American steel-ingot production was 52,800,000 net tons. It was at that time already greater than that of Germany, plus all the conquered countries, plus Italy, plus Japan. In 1941 it had risen to 82,930,000 tons; in 1942 it advanced to 86,000,000, and by the end of last year it was running at the annual rate of 89,000,000 tons. The latest War Production Board estimates of capacity at the end of 1942 are as high as 93,000,000 tons.

British and Russian production have been enough to keep Hitler's army cooped up in Europe. It is at least doubtful whether it is enough for complete victory. American production, however, is now almost double that of all the Axis countries combined. This gives the anti-Axis powers such superiority that a general offensive with victory on the battlefield can be only a matter of time.

STILL ON AND ON AND ON.

The Coming Offensive in the Pacific

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

IN THE second phase of the Pacific war, which now appears to have ended, the Japanese made numerous attempts to eliminate the United Nations bases nearest to their newly conquered empire and to cut the transport lines to Australia, but the Allied defense was generally successful. The third and final phase of hostilities, a successful United Nations offensive in Japan's own waters, has yet to start, but reports from MacArthur indicate that the enemy, having failed to dislodge our forces, is strengthening his bases in the East Indies in expectation of counter-blows. Our main interest now centers in how soon we shall be able to take the offensive and how well we have learned what our experience in the war should have taught us.

The outstanding lesson of the Pacific war has been the interdependence of air, sea, and land power. In the beginning we frequently paid only lip-service to this principle, but we have applied it with increasing effectiveness as the war has progressed. Ideally, all three forces should operate under one command; separate commands of any sort in the area of hostilities should be avoided. Closer support of the marines on Guadalcanal by MacArthur's soldiers and more help from the navy in the campaign in New Guinea would have eased some of the difficulties in both areas.

The air force has brilliantly taken over certain duties formerly identified with army or navy, but it has achieved its greatest triumphs not as a separate agent but in combination with land and sea forces. The plane carrier, for example, has become the capital ship of today, though it has not outmoded the battleship, which has steadily gained in power to deal with air attack. The Flying Fortresses so dear to the heart of the Air Corps have passed the acid test of war, but for work against ship targets their high-altitude bombing has been much less effective than dive bombers and torpedo planes.

A year and a half of war has uncovered weaknesses and strengths in all the services with a completeness impossible in days of peace. The early fighting following Pearl Harbor demonstrated that American military and naval leadership left much to be desired. Shifts in command, not all of which were made public, eliminated much dead wood, and our officer corps has in recent months compiled a fine record. The mid-November naval battle in the Solomons and the Air Corps's victory in the Bismarck Sea were both practically "perfect" victories and are certain to become classics.

On some fronts, however, there has been evident a lack of imagination in the services. In Tunisia as at Pearl Harbor and in the Philippines and the Solomons, our sea, air, and land leaders have shown that they do not learn from example but only through experience. Virtually every defeat we have sustained has been due to a failure to prepare adequately against enemy tactics whose character had already been shown. Thus the Philippine air force was largely destroyed on the ground; four 10,000-ton cruisers were lost because it was believed an approaching inferior Japanese force would not attack; and the rout of our men by Rommel in February was largely the result of poor intelligence work and antiquated tactics. Fortunately this fault has been more than counterbalanced in the Pacific by the lack of originality and the blind aggressiveness of the Japanese, which have kept them attacking regardless of losses.

New capacities as well as old weaknesses have been uncovered by the war. All through our modern naval history we have been hampered by slow repair and construction of ships. On the basis of this bad record the sinking of five battleships at Pearl Harbor and the severe damaging of others would have been judged almost fatal. Yet these losses were repaired with a speed little short of miraculous. Meanwhile the navy, making a virtue of necessity, substituted carrier-cruiser striking groups for its crippled heavyweights, and these won repeatedly, even when outnumbered.

The last few months have shown further that Americans are outdistancing the enemy in the technical improvement of weapons. This has been most marked in the air, where lopsided figures of losses have long been the rule. In the Bismarck Sea battle 136 American planes destroyed not only more than two-thirds of the 150 Japanese planes encountered, but 10 warships and 12 transports carrying 15,000 men.

New warships and old ones rearmed carry far more potent defensive weapons against Japanese planes than they had three years ago. The advantage of enemy planes over our surface craft has been heavily cut, while our own air forces have a greater margin of superiority over Japanese air and sea forces than ever before. This lead in technical development will undoubtedly be lengthened as the war continues. Our submarines were expected to do well in the Pacific because they could be based close to enemy trade lanes, but it was not foreseen that they would be able to sink a ship every other day or that the highly rated Japanese submarines would claim so few victims.

Of vital interest is the question how effective our war of attrition has actually been. Enemy losses of manpower can at once be written off as of very little practical importance. Amphibious war does not require large mass armies of the European type, and Japan could lose ten times the troops we have wiped out without being crippled. The big overseas empire which Japan has acquired needs a huge merchant fleet for both economic and military purposes. Secretary Knox is authority for the statement that 28 per cent of the 6,400,000 tons of shipping with which Japan entered the war has been sunk but that new construction and the capture of Allied ships has reduced the net loss to about 14 per cent. Such losses, unless maintained and increased over a long period of time, cannot break down the inter-island communication lines.

But planes and warships are things that the Japanese can ill afford to lose. The ability of our machines and men consistently to outfight and outbomb the enemy has maintained a rate of attrition not far short of the 600 planes a month that it is estimated Japan produces and almost certainly ahead of the number of high-grade pilots which Japan has turned out. The extremely heavy sinkings of cruisers and carriers have greatly cut down the Japanese navy's offensive capacity. And in both planes and warships the proportion of American output going to the Pacific can hold and increase this superiority.

These cumulative losses help to explain the present lull in hostilities. Japanese offensive strength has been so greatly lessened that common prudence suggests a defensive course and the retention of some power in reserve. Our recent air and sea raids on enemy outposts provide a certain insurance against any efforts by the enemy to resume the offensive. They may also serve another purpose, for the dispersal of Japanese forces over a wide area clearly invites attack.

Outspoken Admiral Halsey has said that he believes we have sufficient offensive strength to justify a prophecy of early victory. This blunt forecast of early success is interesting since our entire war strategy seems to rule out any immediate direct attack. But it is no secret that the United States is building scores of plane carriers of several types and that deliveries have already started. We will shortly have several times as many carriers as on the day of Pearl Harbor. While not all are of the best possible type as to speed and carrying capacity, a fleet of, say, thirty carriers with an average of forty planes each would constitute a floating air force capable of achieving overwhelming air superiority almost anywhere. Heavy and persistent attacks on the Japanese mainland itself would lie well within possibility.

Whether such attacks will be undertaken in the near future no one knows. But before the end of 1943 we shall have this strong carrier force available. If well used, it may easily become the surprise weapon of 1943.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

CAPTAIN Hermann Wilhelm Göring, minister of the new Hitler dictatorship, expresses his passionate indignation at the "dirty lies" charging persecution in Germany. "Throughout all Germany there has not been a single person from whom even one fingernail was chopped off," he shouts. But almost in the same breath he declares: "There have been a few cases where Jews and others have been dragged from their homes and beaten. . . . Some storm troopers have terribly beaten up this one or that one. . . . It is humanly understandable if they took justice in their own hands. . . . You know how bitterly anti-Semitic some of our people are."—April 3, 1933.

OLDEST AND LARGEST nudist organization in America offers membership to intellectual men and women of clean character, believing in the modern doctrine of sun and air bathing. (Advt.)—April 5, 1933.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S bill for the regulation of security sales, to be sure, locks the barn door after the horse has been stolen. . . . But may it not be that some loot is still recoverable? Was Charlie Mitchell the only financier who wrote off a half-million-dollar income tax by a sale to a relative? Isn't that an unwarranted aspersion on the ingenuity of a whole generation of financial giants?—April 12, 1933.

WILL AUSTRIA, this pale and shrunken state caught in the nutcracker of Fascist Italy and Hitler Germany, be the next to succumb to the enormous pressure of reaction in Central Europe? . . . Menacing Dollfuss, who is himself on the right, are two camps even farther to the right. If the Heimwehr, his semi-allies, don't gobble him, the Nazis will. —April 12, 1933.

AFTER a two-year struggle . . . the principle of direct federal unemployment relief has at last been accepted. President Roosevelt's program bristles with bad points as well as good ones, but it at least recognizes and accepts the responsibility of the federal government for its jobless citizens—which means, in fact, that it accepts the principle of the direct dole which The Nation has so long advocated.—April 5, 1933.

THE SCOTTSBORO BOYS still have a chance for liberty, but it may be a matter of years—and years pass slowly in the cells that the South reserves for its Negro "citizens." Meanwhile, we urge our readers to contribute as generously as they can to the Scottsboro defense fund.—April 19, 1933.

WHILE THE ATTENTION of the Western world has been engaged elsewhere, the Japanese have not been idle. . . . The Japanese seem determined to swallow China piecemeal, and they refuse to reckon the cost. They are apparently prepared . . . to risk international intervention and a possible world-war to gain their end.—April 26, 1933.

Will Hays's New Rival

BY JOHN McDONALD

WE HAVE to a large extent protected our books, magazines, and newspapers with the laws and customs of freedom, but we have allowed the movies, product of our own generation, to languish without privilege, like the second son under primogeniture. Several years ago the movies were taken over by an economic monopoly and a private censorship, guided into an extreme commercialism, and given the character of an "amusement industry," along with Ferris wheels and roller coasters. We make a distinction between such industries and, for example, the publishing business; and it appears that by accepting the industry's estimate of its purpose we have been maneuvered into degrading an entire form of communication. Now the movies are under pressure to submit to a kind of government supervision which may complete their conversion into a propaganda instrument for the manipulation of our culture.

The Office of War Information wants to do what we have always allowed other agencies to do—to look films over before the public sees them. Almost all movies have in the past been reviewed and altered by the Production Code Administration of the Hays Office.* The OWI proposes to subject them to a second review. When Lowell Mellett, chief of the OWI Bureau of Motion Pictures, went to Hollywood a short time ago to make final arrangements, he said that all major studios had agreed to this review. When he returned, neither he nor the industry would make any comment, but it appeared that no general agreement had been reached, and that the issue had opened a major controversy concerning the relation of films to the government.

The purpose of the proposed OWI review, according to reports in the trade press, is to provide a "standard procedure" for transmitting "voluntary propaganda requirements" to motion-picture producers. These requirements have been reduced to a kind of flexible and developing OWI code. The reasons given for review are technical. It is difficult for the OWI to secure the application of its code without seeing film scripts in advance of production; for obvious financial reasons producers are often unwilling to make changes after production is completed. Some producers, notably those under Paramount, are said to ignore the OWI; contacts made by others, except Warner Brothers, are intermittent. On the whole the relationship is casual.

When the proposal for review was first made last December, the trade press, on behalf of producers and the Hays Office, raised the cry of censorship. Mr. Mellett replied that there is no censorship in this type of review for the reason that it lacks sanctions for enforcement. If sanctions were merely a question of police power, his proposal probably would have met no resistance. Mr. Mellett has joined in the President's statement "I want no censorship of the motion picture," and his sincerity is not to be doubted. But he appears to have overlooked the power of his office, a power that carries sanctions in the moral suasion of a government conducting war and in the diffused controls of a high executive in coordinated government.

Formalized government review shifts the burden of dissent to the producer. Under ordinary circumstances Mr. Mellett would have to take the step of disapproving all or part of a completed film. Under the reviewing procedure the blue pencil goes on the script, and the producer must take the step of disregarding a specific recommendation of the government. A producer inclined to dissent may fear that such action will appear as an unpatriotic defiance of the government.

Review unlooses a second sanction, implicit in coordinated government. Like other industries, the movie industry has to justify itself to get its rations; and nothing frightens producers now more than the problems of man-power and materials. Can a producer, then, ignore the Film Chief's relation to officials in the War Man-power Commission, the War Production Board, and other agencies important to the physical life of the industry? The connection between ideas and materials is illustrated in the review of all fact films by the War Production Board. No civilian fact films, except domestic newsreels, can be made today without WPB approval. Mr. Mellett is adviser to the WPB on the selection of fact films for which materials will be allowed. It is beside the point that Mr. Mellett would never use his influence against a particular producer. The point is that his office gives him wide collateral powers, creating a psychological hazard that interferes with the producer's freedom of choice.

The expansion of government, the new powers and controls it exercises in administering the whole economy

* A number of state and local censorship boards are engaged in reviewing films. In certain areas they form a serious obstacle to a free screen, supplanting the normal procedure of formal complaint and trial by jury for violations of laws of decency. They have been cited as the excuse for the Hays Office censorship to end other censorships. This article is concerned only with censorship at the source, that is, censorship governing production and national release.

for war, creates an entirely new set of real and implied pressures on the instruments of communication. The channeling of these pressures through review injures the sense of freedom, a feeling that contains the quintessence of what we celebrate as American.

In any other medium a proposal of this kind would surely be widely opposed; in the movies it is widely accepted as natural. The press is an independent public factor in the making of war and peace; and the OWI would not think of reviewing its copy before publication. The film critic of the New York Times has indorsed review of the movies, but he would probably join his editor in protest against review of the press. Yet one must either hold review to be in principle as valid for one as for the other, or retire to the untenable position of approving a double standard for words and pictures.

Since there are no serious advocates of review of the press, except in the Post Office, one may assume that the double standard is at the center of the movie difficulty and ask the upholders of review of the movies to explain themselves. To this writer the double standard appears a fault of the industry itself and of an acquiescent public.

Industry spokesmen say: We teach nothing, we are only shown. The rigor of the Production Code is the industry's own denial of that policy. Has not the code taught, for example, that sin is always punished? And has not the Hays Office closed the channels of distribution to pictures that failed to exemplify that teaching? Actually the policy of unqualified entertainment is a box-office come-on and a good way to sell merchandise. According to a Hollywood gag, the film industry is in the canning business. No one doubts that the movies are and should be first of all entertaining. But not many doubt that the movies teach all kinds of things from dogmatic theology to Veronica Lake hair-dos, not to speak of alleged facts. In asserting itself as a purely commercial enterprise, the moving-picture industry has abdicated the preferential position to which it is entitled as a form of communication and an independent cultural force.

The movies have a stronger base for independence than any other medium. Unlike the press and radio, they sell only to their audience, without benefit of advertisers or sponsors. Yet the press is regarded as a public institution, while monopoly has contributed to the view that the movies are a private enterprise. The film industry is in fact not so free as the press. The press has its hierarchies, rests upon large investments, advertising, radio controls, and exclusive wire franchises, but it is multiple. There are thousands of newspapers in the country. There are only a handful of big movie corporations and their associates.

Moreover, most of the best (first-run) theater outlets are controlled by these few producing and distributing companies. Independent producers without distributor tie-ups get practically no financing and rarely a big-time release. The producer-distributor arrangement is convenient for banks in that it guarantees a return on loan and investment regardless of the quality of a particular film. Like all theatrical productions, motion pictures are a gamble. With producers owning their own market, a good part of the speculative losses on bad films is shifted to the public through forced distribution.

The industry's economic structure requires anticipated box-office grosses of untold millions of dollars on single films. To meet this requirement film standards are reduced to the least common denominator; and most films set before adult Americans now have been censored according to standards set for children on the one hand and the foreign markets on the other. Almost all films are produced with an eye to export. During recent years the pressure of the export market has increased as most of the neutral and United Nations world has become increasingly dependent upon the United States for its motion pictures. In war time this brings the official export censorship into play on films made primarily for the home market. And it gives the State Department an invitation to plant its policies in Hollywood, compromising our own neighborhood entertainment by the necessity of entertaining, among others, distant non-Axis fascist neighborhoods. Film Daily reported recently that State Department officials "have passed along some rather definite instructions on foreign affairs to Hollywood. The whole story of State Department's involvement with the making of 'For Whom the Bell Tolls' makes it quite obvious that the department simply doesn't believe in freedom of the screen when it comes to diplomatic questions. Warner Brothers, Paramount, and Twentieth Century-Fox have dropped projected films dealing with the North African situation on hints from the State Department." It is impossible to say how far this kind of thing has gone. Paramount is said to have resisted interference with Hemingway's film; but producers won't talk. If the State Department allowed free trade in cultural intercourse between the United Nations, this kind of trouble would be minimized; and if the movie corporations were less intent on reaching every kind of foreign market, there would be less ground for political interference in the field of film ideas. Mr. Mellett's proposal to review promises only to standardize such interference.

Whenever self-regulation is proposed, the industry offers the Hays Office, focal point of its monopoly, officially known as the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Inc. All eight of the major movie companies and three minor ones belong to it, and its jurisdiction covers production, distribution, and exhibition. Its censoring tool, the Production Code, represents with slight indirection the desires of censorial pressure groups, of which the Legion of Decency is the first. Through the Hays Office, a few producer-distributors and their professional censors are able to rule our whole motion-picture art. One man, Will Hays, has the power to grant or not to grant to anyone owning a motion picture the seal which the producer-distributors have agreed upon as the condition of distribution. It looks like an open-and-shut case of restraint of trade. But no independent producer seems to want to take the risk of finding out in the courts.

Hays Office censorship has been defended as a private affair of the industry, like a story conference in a studio. Yet who would not oppose the growth of a similar organization in the press? Just suppose that the national magazine-distributing organizations and the principal newsstands were controlled by a few big magazines and that they adopted the Hays code. Suppose the smaller magazines were unable to get on the principal newsstands unless they conformed to a code of Catholic morals and unless the big magazines found a spot for them that would not disturb their own marketing schedules. Obviously, the press could not tolerate this kind of self-regulation without abdicating its freedom. Why should it be tolerated in the movies?

The issue of self-regulation versus government review is further complicated by the fact that the OWI, despite limitations inherent in any, especially in an official, code maker, is much more enlightened and more moved by good-will toward men than the Hays Office. To take one example: The Hays Office has managed to ignore Negro pressure, preferring apparently the Southern white market to the Northern Negro market on a straight box-office basis. The OWI, whether influenced by man-power needs in war time or a conscious liberalism, brought about a better attitude toward Negroes, overturning the unwritten code according to which Negroes were always either funny or menial. That is a point scored for the OWI, but it would be a mistake to chalk it up for censorship.

The way to solve the problem of government review is simply to abandon it in favor of a self-regulation similar to that which governs the press—self-regulation by individual producers. The OWI can continue its normal activity in issuing war information. In order to safeguard military information, military subjects can be reviewed jointly by the OWI and the services. If the OWI thinks more control is necessary, it is torturing the notion of "war information."

The road back to a democratic screen is a longer one, involving the dissolution of the vertical monopoly over production, distribution, and exhibition, the elimination of the censorial Production Code Administration of the Hays Office, the toning down of rampant commercialism, and recognition of the fact that the movies are a cultural institution as well as an amusement enterprise.

In the Wind

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE of the United States announces its war aims: "Everything must be conditioned upon a decisive military victory . . . the unrelenting pursuit of which should not suffer the loss of one vessel, one plane, one tank, or one bullet due to our yen for 'looking ahead.'"

EDWARD A. KOCH, one of the men under indictment for conspiracy to undermine the morale of the armed forces, is still publishing the Guildsman. In a recent issue he wrote, "Whatever the country's proper and legitimate objectives in war may be, we believe that the destruction of Nazism and 'fascism' generally should not be among them."

AXIS PROPAGANDISTS, ever attentive to the cultural needs of American workers, are distributing thousands of copies of poems in war plants. A typical title is "Song of the Kosher Air Wardens," and typical lines are: "You will find the Jews are ruling you in Washington's old White House," "The Gentile soldiers go marching proudly by," and "Damned if I don't think Hitler's right."

MAN-POWER NOTE: An ad in the Boston Globe calls for one scissors sharpener, one man with some experience in polishing small steel parts, two surgical-instrument repair men, and two men mechanically inclined to learn repairing of surgical instruments. The ad is headed in large black type, "Men Under Eighty."

LEWIS AND CONGER, New York store that makes a specialty of aids to sleep, woos labor with this sign in its window: "Constructive note to Captain Rickenbacker. Most absenteeism is not wilful—much absenteeism is due to sheer fatigue—for example . . . many night workers cannot sleep restfully during the day. Here are twenty helpful hints from our sleep shop."

DURING DEBATE on a bill to permit Georgia to tax federal enterprises that compete with private industry, State Senator Arnold said, "I don't know who drew this bill, whether it was drawn by the Georgia Power Company or not, but it is a damned good job. . . . Washington is controlled by New York Jews, as everybody knows."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A League of Nations survey shows that Germany is scrapping modern machinery and equipment not immediately adaptable to war work. . . . Norwegian clergymen and theological students who oppose the Quisling regime are being drafted for compulsory labor service. . . . Italian and German aviators stationed at Bari, Italy, have their food stored in the same building, but the Germans get more and better rations. Recently a group of Italians took some of the German food, and in the course of explaining the mistake several fliers were wounded and one killed.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Spread of Sinarquismo

BY FELIX DIAZ ESCOBAR

MANY people believe that with the entrance into the war of almost every Latin American country, the question of the Latin American fifth column has been resolved. My country, Mexico, offers proof that more wishful thinking lies in that assumption than reality. The Nazi-Fascist fifth column continues to work in Mexico with more intensity and vigor than it did before Pearl Harbor or before the Mexican declaration of war against the Axis. Its strongest unit, the Sinarquista movement, is numerically more powerful today than it was a year ago. The Mexican Sinarquismo is the Spanish Phalanx in guaraches.

As president of the Anti-Nazi, Anti-Fascist Committee in Mexico, I have been denouncing the activities of the fifth column for two years, in Parliament and in the press. From the first it was evident that there was a firmly established accord between the Nazi organization and the Sinarquista movement. Everything pointed to a liaison which fully justified our demands for the liquidation of the Sinarquismo. As long ago as January, 1942, I accused the former German consul in Guaymas of being a Nazi spy and chief of a fifth column in that section of the Pacific Coast where our fishing enterprises have been controlled by the Japanese for years. I gathered proof that that former German consul and Nazi spy enjoyed the cooperation of the Sinarquistas. I denounced the activities of one Jorge Hauss, a man of German nationality, owner of a beer-garden in Mazatlán (Sinaloa), chief of the local fifth column and a staunch friend of Sinarquista leaders in the city. I further denounced as one of the centers of the Nazi fifth column in Mexico the German news agency Transocean, which in other parts of South America was more concerned with spying and plotting than with securing information. Together with these specific accusations, in which I did not spare mention of names, I stated that the Sinarquismo was a Spanish Phalanx transplanted to Mexico.

The Sinarquista movement was launched in Mexico on May 23, 1927. Its real creator was a Nazi, Oscar Reichert, teacher of languages in the Colegio Civil of Guanajuato. He was assisted by two famous Spanish Phalangists, the brothers Trueba, who impressed the tone and character of the Franco organization upon the movement. The Sinarquista Party has the same organic structure as the Phalanx, and it has achieved the same strong military discipline. Its language is the language of a military organization, Phalangist or Nazi. When the Sinarquistas plan a demonstration, for instance, they do not call it a meeting or a rally. They call it "taking over a city." In one of their most important mobilizations last year they "took Morelia." From 35,000 to 40,000 persons aided in this "assault."

Each such big mobilization costs more than a quarter-million pesos. Where does the Sinarquismo obtain its financial support? Certainly not from its members. The Sinarquismo may have a membership of a million persons, but they are drawn from the poorest classes and are paid their traveling expenses and ten pesos in addition for their attendance at one of the mobilizations. I have my theory about the source of these funds, but since I prefer to base my statements on factual evidence, I shall leave the question open. One thing is certain—the Sinarquismo has enough money for its own development and for the acquisition of arms.

It has money, too, for a continuous propaganda campaign. In everything it prints, the Nazi and Phalangist tone is obvious. Its central organ, El Sinarquista, a weekly, has a circulation of 80,000, according to the editors. Whatever its actual circulation may be, it is undoubtedly widely read. It is 100 per cent anti-United Nations and 200 per cent anti-United States. It accuses those who in the interest of a democratic victory seek to make Mexico's contribution to the war effort as large as possible of being pawns of North American capitalism and of Washington. It appeals to the most primitive and confused patriotic and religious instincts of the lower classes. On one hand, it promises the Mexican people, in the event of a Nazi victory, a future in which Mexico will become greater and greater and in which the territory of Texas will be reincorporated into the Mexican state. On the other hand, it presents the Sinarquismo as the torch-bearer for "a new Christian order."

The latest development, the gravity of which seems to be ignored, is the extension of the Sinarquismo organization to the United States itself. I assert, unreservedly, that the Sinarquistas have in California today—United States California—a powerful unit of 50,000 members, well organized and looking to the Sinarquista Central Committee in Mexico for orders. I can prove my assertion. The readers of The Nation can judge for themselves what this extension implies. Sinarquista activities are a menace to the security of the Western Hemisphere, laying it open to attack from within prepared by the Nazis with the complicity of the Spanish Phalanx.

Spanish Soldiers of France

BY A. D. PRINTER

[The following article by a former legionnaire recently arrived in America exposes a situation which has had no effective publicity. At a time when the continued imprisonment of Spanish Republican refugees in North Africa is arousing the indignant protest of democrats here and abroad, the fate of the soldiers of the Legion deserves equal attention.]

THE political prisoners in French North Africa are gradually being released. One group, however, has been neglected—the men who fought as volunteers in the French Foreign Legion and who now work in the labor battalions of the Sahara. Other groups have had a voice abroad to speak for them—the stateless Jews near Casablanca, the Spanish Loyalist civilians in the work camps, the Fighting French political prisoners, and the Communists. Many of these are reported to have been freed. But the foreign volunteers who had rushed to join the French army in September, 1939, still sweat in the African desert. These groupes de démobilisés étrangers are made up chiefly of Central European Jews and Spanish Loyalists. The Jews will find support in various Jewish organizations in England and in this country. The Spaniards have hardly been heard from.

When the war started, more than 100,000 foreigners living in France joined the French colors. From 30,000 to 35,000 formed the Polish army in France; 12,000 were in the Czecho-Slovakian units; between 70,000 and 73,000 men of all nationalities were taken into the Foreign Legion. Of these, 28,000, or nearly 40 per cent, were Spaniards. Nearly 53,000 of the foreign volunteers were sent to North Africa for training; later part of these were returned to France and part were sent to the three Syrian regiments. About 25,000 were kept in metropolitan France in the so-called régiments de marche des volontaires étrangers.

The Spaniards had volunteered for the Legion from concentration camps in southern France. They had done it willingly, eager to fight again against fascism. The Legion was not an easy place to serve in. The old legionnaires, who fought only for the pay, resented the newcomers, who fought for an ideal. Often they bullied them but never when their intended victims were Spanish soldiers who had seen as much action as they and who knew how to hit back. Even from their fellow-volunteers the Spaniards met suspicion. Most of the others, having been residents or refugees in France, spoke the language and understood the people. The only French contacts the Spaniards had had before they came to the Legion were with the Gardes Mobiles or the Senegalese in the concentration camps at Gurs and Le Vernet. In order not to be lonely, they formed "cells," which were against the spirit of the Legion and which isolated them still more.

For the officers and for the non-coms, the Spanish legionnaires were a nuisance. They did not fit in. They had been members of a popular army; now they were subjected to the ironclad discipline of a mercenary unit. They brought with them their typical Spanish individualism. They brought, too, their great sense of personal dignity, which was constantly trampled upon in these units where German sergeants and veteran French colonials had formed the outlaws of Europe into soldiers. Most of the left-wing extremists had preferred to remain in the concentration camps. Those who joined the Legion were loyal young soldiers of the Republic, professionals of the Spanish army, a few intellectuals and tradesmen. But to the officers of the Legion, brilliant young reactionaries from Saint Cyr and Saumur or old troopers without any political conviction at all, every Spaniard was either a Communist or an Anarchist, to be handled with the same affection as a box of dynamite. This attitude changed when the officers began to appreciate the soldierly qualities of the men, and later the Spaniards were chosen for the hardest tasks. These young Spanish volunteers were famous for their skill as machine-gunners and for their marching ability. They were not, as a rule, good shots with light arms, lacking the phlegm that is essential. They loved the feel of steel in their hands—their great pocket knives and the vicious four-edged bayonets of the French army.

During the short campaign of 1939-40 the Spaniards fought in all units of the Legion. They made up 15 per cent of the famous 11th Regiment that had an unequaled record during the Battle of France, losing 50 per cent of its effectives with none taken prisoner, and formed 30 per cent of the 12th, which rammed through Belgium and lost 35 per cent of its men. Large numbers of them were in the 13th Demi-Brigade, which with the Poles and the Chasseurs Alpins took Narvik in a wild attack, jumping into the icy waters of the fjord, storming the barren, black mountains, and pressing crack German troops back to the Swedish border. They were in the three regiments of the Levant and in the small sun-beaten force along the Tripolitanian border, mounting guard in the burning summer days of 1940, shivering with malaria, stabbing at the Italian patrols.

When the armistice was signed, Vichy did not know what to do with these masses of men, once volunteers for the French Republic, now ideological enemies of the new system. Hesitatingly the government started to demobilize them. Those in France were discharged normally, but for the legionnaires in Africa two conditions were laid down: they must have a French carte d'identité, valid at the date of enlistment, and a guaranty of a means of livelihood for at least one year, that is, either a work contract for twelve months or the sum of 5,000 francs. Few of the volunteers could meet these conditions. They had hardly any money. The Jews found it almost impossible to obtain work contracts. The identification papers of many had been burned when the German army approached the recruiting center of the Legion near Lyon. Only a very few foreigners got a legal discharge from the African regiments.

When the German Armistice Commission came to North Africa, the French were forced to reduce the effectiveness of their garrisons. Thousands of legionnaires were ostensibly discharged but were in reality formed into new military units and sent to the southern part of Algeria and Morocco to work on roads and on the trans-Saharan railway. The men had all the disadvantages of being soldiers and none of the advantages. They wore soldiers' uniforms, but they were treated as if they were men condemned to hard labor. They worked from eight to ten hours a day in heat that at noon would rise to 40°. Until the spring of 1941 their pay was only half a franc a day, half a cent as the franc was then valued against the dollar—about a fifth of what they had to pay for a package of cigarettes. They slept in tattered tents that offered little protection against sand storms or rain. Seventeen men shared a tent built for ten. Their clothes swarmed with lice, and boils spread from one to another as they lay crowded together on their rags. In most of the camps water was scarce—hardly enough for drinking and cooking. The men didn't wash for weeks. There was not enough food. The men killed and ate everything alive around them, from dogs to lizards, from stray donkeys to the rare gazelles they could catch. They dug holes in the roads so that camels coming from the South with the date caravans would break their legs in the traps and the beasts could then be bought from the Arabs for their almost worthless meat.

There were revolts. Everybody, overseers and men, became desperate and slightly crazy after a while. The famous cafard rode the camps. In some units the officers were so terrified that they asked for Goums, Arab guards, to watch their tents at night, and hardly dared move among the men without arms. The ironical part was that the men were not prisoners but apparently just soldiers. There was no barbed wire around the camps. But there were hundreds and hundreds of miles of sand, of hot, burning death, around them to prevent escape. There were the Goums too, patrolling the desert on swift mounts, ruthless hunters of possible deserters.

In the spring of 1941 the Vichy government sent thirty new men to the camps of Colomb Bechar and Kenadza. They pretended to be deserters from the German army and navy in France. These men were met from the very beginning with distrust and were later found to be a fifth column planted in the camps by order of the Armistice Commission. The affair caused a great uproar. For the first time the travailleurs, mostly Jews and Spanish Loyalists, dared to act. As a result the "deserters" were combed out and transported to an oasis farther south. There they later started a little revolt of their own and finally asked to be brought before the Armistice Commission—very peculiar behavior for soldiers who were supposed to have committed the greatest military crime.

In the general breakdown of morale the Spaniards were in by far the worst situation. They had no families, they received no letters, no outside organization took care of them, and many of them were in constant danger of being put in the compagnie de discipline des travailleurs, a parallel institution to the famous discipline of Colomb Bechar. Into the discipline des travailleurs came not only the men who broke the rules or worked too slowly but also those who were simply suspected of being opposed to the spirit of Vichy. Into the discipline came also the men who had been guilty of serving in the International Brigades of Spain. That they had later volunteered and fought for France had not washed them clean. After this compagnie de discipline was formed, it was sent to Khersas, a lost oasis deep in the south which soon became a Devil's Island of the Sahara, viciously ruled by Corsican and German sergeants. Here the men did not even have tents. They had to scrape holes in the sand to sleep in, the famous tombeaux of the Legion, just long enough for a man to stretch out in. They had no shelter from the pitiless sun during the siesta hours of the day and no protection from the bitter cold of the desert nights. In the evening after work was finished they were not allowed to talk together or to play cards. They had to hand over their sandals to the Goums before nightfall lest somebody be crazy enough to run out into the desert.

Anyone who passed through this company came out a broken man. Even in the regular working companies nearly everybody became affected after a time—nearly everybody except the Spaniards. They built up a very intelligent collective self-defense. Like everybody else, they grabbed and stole whatever they could get outside the camps, but they shared their booty with all. They fought anybody who attacked their rights, superiors or fellow-soldiers, but they never quarreled among themselves. They were the only ones in the camps who found the strength to sing and to joke, and if once in a while they found enough wine, they showed the rest of the men the noble art of getting drunk in a decent and quiet way.

When I left Africa in December, 1941, four companies were at work around Colomb Bechar, each containing from 200 to 300 men. About a third of these men were Spaniards. The four companies all belonged to the 1st Regiment of the Foreign Legion in Algeria. Two more companies of the same regiment were farther north in Ain Sefra and Saïda. Across the Moroccan border the labor units of the three Moroccan regiments worked under similar conditions. Besides these men in uniform, thousands of Spanish civilians worked on the trans-Saharan railway and in the coal mines of Kenadza. They were paid, but their pay was outrageously small.

Today the foreign volunteers are in a paradoxical situation. They were formally discharged in October, 1940. But at the beginning of the war they had signed a contract for the duration. Now the war has started anew in Africa, and according to the regulations of the French army they are remobilisables—subject to be called from the reserves for new service. It is doubtful, however, whether they will be allowed to leave the camps of the south. A general has the right to decide how he will use a soldier, whether as a fighter or a worker on a military project.

These men are good soldiers by any standard; they are especially well trained for African warfare; they are, besides, soldiers who fought and are still fighting for an idea. And with Spanish stubbornness they will stick to their convictions. It is to be hoped that impending changes in Africa will allow these veterans of the war for democracy to take their place again in the ranks of the Allies and to exchange the pickax, which was forced into their hands, for the gun which they once chose.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ONE of the biggest hotels in the German capital, known to everybody who has ever been in Berlin, is the Hotel Bristol. In the summer of 1940 this hotel wrote a letter to a Mr. X in Switzerland. That was quite a while ago, but the letter is still interesting, and we can be grateful to the Swiss cousin of this journal, the Zurich Naïon, for publishing it now. Dated July 26, 1940, it runs as follows:

My dear Mr. X: In reply to your letter we shall be glad to reserve for you for about ten days starting August 28 a room facing Unter den Linden. The price for one of our regular guests is twenty-five marks.

At the same time we want to bring to your attention the fact that we are swamped by requests from our regular guests, of whom we have about 4,000, for rooms facing Unter den Linden, since it is the general opinion here in Germany that the war will end soon.

We have advised all those to whom we could promise

REMEMBER!

"When we achieved and the new world dawned, the old men came out again and took our victory to remake in the likeness of the former world they knew. Youth could win but had not learned to keep, and was pitifully weak against age. We clamored that we had worked for a new heaven and a new earth. They thanked us kindly and made their peace."—LAWRENCE OF ARABIA in the "Seven Pillars of Wisdom."

rooms on Unter den Linden that during the parade of the returning troops they will have to permit access to their room to four or five other regular guests who have had to take rooms facing the rear. We must attach this condition also to your reservation in the event that the entry of the returning troops should occur during your visit. On other days you will be undisturbed.

(Signed) DR. BOLLBUCK, Manager

This was not written by some excited little employee, but by the head of a great establishment with an international clientèle. The thoroughness with which this German was beginning so early to "organize" the allotment of rooms and windows for the day of triumph is in itself interesting. One's first thought, however, is how crushing the disappointment must have been and how severe the shock caused by it.

During the last few days there has been a tremendous amount of advertising in Germany for a new wage system. It is called a system of "efficiency wages" or of "plus and minus wages." Admittedly the purpose of the new wage scale is to "increase the per capita production of workers," but that has not prevented the authorities from decking it out with all sorts of social and metaphysical halos. It was first introduced at the beginning of March in the metal industry of Lower Silesia. A Breslau iron works inaugurated it with ceremonies and speeches. The Gauleiter and the commissar, according to the Angriff's report of March 6, gave it fulsome praise. For the first time in history, they declared, a truly progressive, honorable, and noble wage system had been discovered. "We thus show that our estimation of the worth of labor is worlds apart from that of the Bolshevik slave-drivers and the Jewish-plutocratic exploiters."

The joke is that the new system is nothing more than an adaptation of the Stakhanov speed-up, which for some years received similar feverish publicity in Russia and then was unceremoniously abandoned. Its derivation is quite clear where piecework is concerned. The underlying principle is that not all workers are paid according to the same wage scale; there are plus rates and minus rates. For example, if workers making screws formerly received ten pfennigs a screw, those making less than one hundred screws an hour are now paid eight pfennigs a piece, and those making more than one hundred an hour twelve pfennigs. In short, the fast worker earns more than the slow not only because he produces more but also because he is paid at a higher rate. When wages are on an hourly basis, workers are no longer divided into the traditional three classes of skilled, semi-skilled, and unskilled but are graded in eight groups.

The purpose is not, of course, to reduce the pay roll. On the contrary, if production were really increased, the Nazis would presumably be quite undisturbed by the cost. In their frantic efforts to profit from "total mobilization" money is of no concern to them; they are interested only in output. The labor movements of all countries, however, have always considered such excessive differences between the earnings of capable and less capable workers the crassest form of exploitation and have always opposed them. In its effect on total production Russian Stakhanovism was proved unsatisfactory. Whether the same system under the name of plus-minus wages will be more effective in Germany is very questionable.

File and Remember

The Axis Interprets Churchill

A LONDON broadcast beamed on Europe and recorded at the CBS short-wave listening station called attention to the following comments on Winston Churchill's speech taken from the official German News Agency and German radio:

1. "As far as Britain is concerned, Churchill suggests the adoption of National Socialist ideas."
2. "Churchill is cooperating with Bolshevism."
3. "The Prime Minister remains a tool in the hands of orthodox capitalist finance."

The Rome radio said:

We wonder whether Mr. Churchill knew when he made his last speech that he was simply copying outright every law which the Fascist government has put into effect during the past twenty-four years. Idea after idea was lifted from the steps which have been taken in Italy. He could not have followed more closely the line laid down by the Fascist government for the reorganization of Italy after Versailles. We are proud to think that Mr. Churchill considered the Fascist government the one most suitable to follow, and we are sure that he chose well, if he really wants to further the welfare of the British people.

Radio Berlin said:

Two statesmen spoke in the same afternoon; one, a man of the people, elected by the people to his executive office. His name is Adolf Hitler. The other, a scion of a family described for generations by the term plutocratic. His name—need I add—is Winston Churchill. The first of these two statesmen delivered his speech within somewhat less than one-quarter of an hour. He could afford a brief crystallization of the pan-European ideology. His theme needed no elaboration. It was just victory, victory over the enemies of our civilization, which was cradled in the beginning of the Christian era. The other man, that scowling, desperate despot of Downing Street, floundered bravely for the better part of an hour through the exposition of his reactionary program. Adolf Hitler, having delivered for the fourth consecutive year his hymn of praise for the unconquerable heroism of the German armed forces, sketched in graphic terms the grand dimensions of the Bolshevik preparation for world conquest. The climax of his speech was contained in the following words, words which will be remembered when this terrible intercontinental war has become a dry text for adolescent history students. "I repeat," said Adolf Hitler, "I repeat my former prophecy—namely, that it will not be Germany and Europe but those countries which remain servile to the Jews which will perish in this conflict; those lands which remain out of key with the new social order will pay the toll."

Et Tu, Brute?

The British Foreign Minister thought it well to smooth down the Bolsheviks by conceding them the command of Eastern Europe, at the cost of sacrificing the countries that Britain had sworn to protect.—Rome broadcast to North America.

American opinion will not look favorably on any proposal to put the small nations of Europe on the auction block in order to purchase Russian confidence and cooperation.—New York Times.

It is quite possible that in attempting to abolish the Atlantic Charter in its application to Europe Mr. Eden imagines that he may obtain a pledge that the Bolsheviks, should they be victorious, would refrain from annexing the Middle East and India. It is childish to believe, of course, that the Kremlin would honor any such promises, under the circumstances. Everybody capable of looking facts in the face will agree that the ambitions of the Soviets are bounded solely by the limits of military possibilities.—Radio Berlin.

Nor would the appeasement of Russia be more successful than the attempt to appease Hitler. On the contrary, appeasement at the surrender of principle would only whet the appetite of the appeased.—New York Times.

One has no longer a choice between the old Europe and a Europe newly ordered by the Axis powers, but only between this Europe and one which is subject to the dictatorship of Bolshevism.—Goebbels.

The Europeans are tired of both of them [Nazis and Communists]. But if they are forced to choose they may choose Hitler rather than Stalin.—New York Times.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Adventures of Monkey

MONKEY. By Wu Ch'eng-ên. Translated from the Chinese by Arthur Waley. The John Day Company. $2.75.

VERGIL guided Dante only through hell and purgatory, but even if he had been permitted to continue his exemplary way into paradise, he would still have fallen short of the Great Sage, Equal of Heaven. For the Sage—that's the Monkey—is not only a guide, at home in all three theaters of being, but the comedian as well, and is therefore, without disparagement of Vergil, a far more critical observer. Monkey also writes poetry. In short, his qualities can be multiplied by three in terms of all conceivable attributes, energies, and experiences—simian, human, immortal—up to eighty-one, which happens to be the exact number of calamities Monkey has to undergo to bring his master from China to India to seek the holy Buddhist scriptures, and gain Illumination for himself.

Monkey was created by centuries of enchanted listeners who, in the tenth century or earlier, gathered around professional story-tellers to hear of his supernatural monkey-shines. The form and content of the story were dictated largely by the audience. And in this first English translation, made from a sixteenth-century version written, significantly enough, in the vernacular, not in the classical language which the people did not understand, there are echoes of this primitive exchange between story-teller and audience. There is nothing quite like "Monkey" in Western literature. Imagine a combination of picaresque novel, fairy tale, fabliau, Mickey Mouse, Davy Crockett, and "Pilgrim's Progress"; and then imagine, if you can, all these elements welded into an artistic whole so that no matter how fantastic the adventure or how enigmatic the allegory, the characterization and meaning remain always human and realistic.

Here is a bit from the twenty-eighth chapter, where the priest and master, Tripitaka, and his three disciples—Monkey, Piggy, and Sandy—are ferried across the River of Salvation in a bottomless boat. Suddenly they notice the priest's earthly body rapidly drifting downstream Tripitaka stared at it in consternation. Monkey laughed. "Don't be frightened, Master," he said. "That's you." And Piggy said, "It's you, it's you." Sandy clapped his hands. "It's you, it's you," he cried. The ferryman too joined in the chorus. "There you go!" he cried. "My best congratulations."

There is a good deal of heartwarming satire directed against bureaucracy, which reigns in heaven as it does on earth. I liked particularly the story of the emperor who dies but is permitted to return to life because his minister gives him a letter of introduction to one of the judges of the dead, who in the nature of things is under certain obligations to the minister. "It only remains," says the judge, "to ask Your Majesty to step down and forgive us the inconvenience to which you have been put." The picture of Monkey jockeying for position in heaven is hilarious; the trials of the celestial dollar-a-year men are touching; and there is one episode that is reminiscent of Mr. Willkie in Russia. And that's not all. There are magical transformations, battles with dragons, the very amusing story of the Cart-Slow Kingdom, and much more, told with enormous gusto. It is one of the most entertaining fairy tales I have ever read; the proof of the entertainment is the real excitement of the adventures.

Mr. Waley has accomplished a magical transformation of his own in his translation. One has learned to expect such performances from Mr. Waley. (The test of a translation is a simple sentence like this: "At the fourth watch she had had a dream, half of which she could remember and half of which had faded; and she was thinking hard.") He has, however, translated only thirty of the hundred chapters, and one would be a fool not to clamor for the rest. An interesting introduction has been contributed to the American edition by Mr. Hu Shih.

H. P. LAZARUS

Russia, Reform, and Revolution

AMERICA, RUSSIA, AND THE COMMUNIST PARTY IN THE POST-WAR WORLD. By John L. Childs, George S. Counts, and Others. The John Day Company. $1.25.

A SENSITIVE ear will detect much subdued whistling in the dark these nights, and the theme of the whistling is the Soviet Union. British conservatives are moving toward post-war collaboration with the U. S. S. R., but being a little nervous of their great ally they are also looking hopefully toward the United States. Mr. Eden, sponsor of the only important treaty obligation so far contracted during this war, assures the United States that an alliance is not a bloc, or not an exclusive bloc. Mr. Churchill makes a speech which can be best described by saying that its social doctrines encouraged Arthur Krock, whose political soul is as unlovely as a Brahms violin cadenza. That speech had for one of its intentions assurance to the United States that the Anglo-Russian treaty does not mean that Britain will become socialist. The Soviets, reform, and revolution, are in everyone's mind these days and nights. It is therefore good to find someone who, like G. D. H. Cole in a book recently reviewed in The Nation, will speak out loud about the most important of all problems.

"America, Russia, and the Communist Party" because of its frankness and intransigence is a book that every Nation reader should read at least twice. It is brutally frank and thoroughly sophisticated. It is not confused, for it is written from one standpoint only, that of the reforming democrat. There is nothing revolutionary or pseudo-revolutionary about it, and there is very little admixture of modes of thought alien to the main body of its thinking. It has two defects: it is occasionally repetitious; and its conclusion concerning the Communist Party is false.

The authors' thesis is that if the Soviet Union desires peace with the world after this war it must totally repudiate the Communist International. By "repudiate" is clearly meant not plain divorce with or without alimony, but the headsman's block (a figure of speech, of course). Rather inconsistently the originators of this modest proposal do not wish the United States to suppress the American Communist Party. The authors leave no doubt of the sincerity of their demand for a square deal for the U. S. S. R., but there is, I fear, something almost menacing in the words which they employ. "This logic of fact confronts the Soviet Union in these days with a necessary and fateful choice. She [my italics] must decide whether she wants peace or war." In other words, the democracies are likely to attack the Soviet Union if the Comintern survives in the post-war period. Very clearly the authors dislike the Communist Party, but the U. S. S. R. is not likely to be intimidated by their threat.

There is nothing erratic about the book's main premises concerning the U. S. S. R. and the U. S. A. The authors do not make Louis Fischer's mistake of thinking that Russia will be an exhausted power at the end of the war. On the contrary, they believe that the only two great world powers will be this country and Russia. Nor do they agree with Alexander Werth, Max Lerner, and the others that the U. S. S. R. has ceased to be a revolutionary power. They grasp the truth that the Communist Party is nowadays a party of mingled and often conflicting objectives. They recognize, too, that much of the party's disturbing effect as well as its self-frustration derives from its dual nature as a revolutionary party and at the same time a propaganda department of the Soviet Foreign Office, which cannot at all times practice a revolutionary diplomacy. Most of what Messrs. Childs and Counts say of the party methods is true enough, though they can be guilty of colossal exaggeration, as when they write, "Experience has demonstrated that it [the Communist Party] adds not one ounce of strength to any liberal, democratic, or humane cause; on the contrary, it weakens, degrades, or destroys every cause that it touches." The Spanish Loyalist cause was a humane, democratic, and liberal cause, and it was never degraded. And let it be said clearly that in this country the organizing drive, the constancy, the cement and bond in the whole pro-Loyalist movement was provided by the Communists and those who were ready to work with them.

But putting aside all passing objections, it is the central thought of this book which is wrong. It was not the Comintern but the Soviets' social structure itself which caused Russia to be feared and hated by the reactionaries. And together with this fear they had another, equally strong—the fear of any change whatsoever, whether reformist or revolutionary. The solid inescapable fact is that the Tories were afraid of the all too possible collapse of the entire structure of Western capitalism. The authors recognize this when they declare that the threat of communism will not be removed until unnecessary and unjust conditions are removed from American society. The truth could not be better expressed than it is on page 46. A certain school of thought "holds that we have nothing in common with the Soviet Union but a common foe . . . and that in the course of time [the two countries] will necessarily engage in a bitter and violent struggle. . . . Unfortunately, evidence is accumulating that this thought is entertained by powerful forces in the United States which fear any modification of property relationships and are made uneasy by the possible existence of a powerful and successful collectivist state in the world" (my italics). The fact is that Moscow might fire every man jack of the Comintern right now, but when the European revolution breaks out, as it will, that will not prevent the Tories from demanding war with the U. S. S. R. And let this be understood: these reactionaries would have a far greater fear of the example set by a peaceful and prosperous U. S. S. R. even without the Comintern than they have had in the past.

Not only are the authors mistaken; their mistake is a dangerous one. To pose the problem of future collaboration in this way is to give the reactionaries their opportunity should the Soviets continue to support the Communist parties. The Soviets will probably make mistakes, and the Communist parties of the world will almost certainly blunder off the track from time to time, but to demand the repudiation of these parties by Moscow is, I believe, to do no more than carry on a personal political feud. There is a crisis in socialism, a profound crisis, but to ask the champion of one powerful school, the most powerful as it happens, to commit suicide to please a group of liberals is, when not dangerous, quite farcical. Another thing must be put as clearly as this. Messrs. Counts and Childs are not threatening the U. S. S. R. with their displeasures but with the might of stark reaction. It is not a pleasant spectacle. This reviewer in approaching the same problem came to quite opposite conclusions—that it was high time, for Europe at least, to rebuild the united front. This may seem to imply a total rejection of the present book, but that is not so. Above all, frankness and sincerity are needed these days, and the authors have these qualities in abundance.

RALPH BATES

"This Grace Is Dignity"

LAST POEMS OF ELINOR WYLIE. Alfred A. Knopf.

$2.75.

THIS collection of last poems by Elinor Wylie contains more substance, form, and freshness, less rubble and detritus, than is usually found in posthumous books. Fifteen years dead, Elinor Wylie was spared, by the greater humiliation, the lesser ones that have been visited on some of her contemporaries—the ignominious silence, the ignoble shrillness, the self-repetition, the false starts, the desire for growth, and the anxiety about the capacity to grow, the recognition of more vulgar claims. How much she might have grown is idle speculation now; there is a difference, to be sure, between her earlier and her later and her very latest work, but the later is not always the happier.

The point here is that when the impulse of the baroque is spent, its impetus can still carry over into the delicacy, the grace, the charm, of the rococo; and the rococo can still convey emotion. But the rococo is a dead end; persist too long in that direction, and you find yourself going around in circles. The embellishment of the shard becomes more important than that of the shell; the twisted curves of the system of design are scribbled in sand, not etched in stone; the gaiety and playfulness grow self-conscious and arch; and the end is jigsaw, gingerbread, tedium. Once devoted to the rococo, the artist can break its spell only by shattering himself: what is required is a clean break, a fresh start, a new confronting, however painful and terrified, yet humble and thankful, of reality. The risk of this necessity Miss Wylie's integrity could not have long postponed. She might have shirked it for a while, because, like everybody else, she had her peculiar foolishness; and rather more than most, she might have been spoiled by adulation. Against these risks her besetting sin was her saving virtue, that fierce fine pride.

The gratitude of the public is due Miss Jane Wise, and her assistants, for the valuable service of deciphering holograph manuscripts of many poems; and the publisher, by way of illustration, has reproduced eight pages of these. The book also contains a foreword by William Rose Benét and a tribute by Edith Olivier. The omission of this material, in my opinion, would not have been fatal: Mr. Benét offers a combination of apology and interpretation that will not endear him to the reader who would prefer to be left alone with the poet's work; and the taste of this reviewer, whether capricious or perverse, is offended to find the author of an Ode against Public Spirit made the subject of remarks, however prescient, about England and America and our common cause. There are also notes, dating, with some comment, all of the poems but one; these will be more enjoyed by scholars and bibliophiles than by those lovers of literature who do not care whether a poem was written early or late, or where it first saw print, so they have the poem.

The poems are presented in four groups, the first comprising new poems and sonnets, all transcribed from holograph manuscripts by Miss Wise. Item, "I saw Milton stand alone"—

I saw Milton stand alone
Save for great Lord Verulam,
Bearing the philosopher's stone.
And the Pentecostal lamb
Was at Milton's side, his fleece
Bright as Jason's out of Greece.

Against them came a host
Shelley stricken to the heart
'White like St. Sebastian's ghost
And taking still the weaker part
For her who quenched his keenest fires
And flung him headlong from her spites.

The second section contains a single long poem, The Golden Heifer, likewise transcribed by Miss Wise from a holograph MS. This is an extravagant excursion in the meter of Peregrine; the Peregrine thing was a good stunt once, but cannot sustain too much repetition, and the reader's delight in the lovely and gorgeous passages in The Golden Heifer is somewhat diminished if, as he reads along, he begins to have hallucinations of ladies' voices in the air around murmuring, "My dear! She can rhyme on anything!"

The poems in the third section have not been previously printed; these are, all save one, taken from typescripts, some early, some late. Item, With a Blue Honey-Jar Full of Flowers—

Here, within this honey-jar
Rose and honeysuckle are;

Keep it so, a turquoise shell
Of sweetness like a honey-cell;
Keep it so it may not miss
The richer brew, being filled with this,
Fresher and more exquisite
Than wine the bees distil from it.

The fourth section of the book has poems previously printed in periodicals, etc.; and Mr. Benét, in his foreword, also directs the attention of the reader to a few other poems, not included in Miss Wylie's collected verse, which appeared in the memorial volume written by her sister, Nancy Hoyt. From this section we might quote, as a final item, the sonnet written on the flyleaf of John Webster's plays—

Having so long walked hand in hand with Hell
I find these gentry little less than kin;
I speak their sulphurous language; we begin Straightway to cap each other's jests, and tell Fantastical adventures which befell
At midnight, some eccentric court within—
Where fiery anger plotted with pale sin—
Crime's sanctuary, murder's citadel.

Fouler the cruelties which desecrate
These later days, to poison heart and mind,
And strangle, with the bloody hand of Hate,
The thrice-stabbed soul; from such I turn to find
The black Calabrian comrade in my fate,
And Corombona, as a sister, kind.

It is good to hear this voice again, not only because it is familiar, but because even when it is being fantastical or fancy, it is always firm and fine. Apprehensive, yes, but gloomy never; amused, amusing, ironical, exquisite, precise, and proud. It is good to hear this voice again.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Pieces of Empire

RETREAT WITH STILWELL. By Jack Belden. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

SINGAPORE IS SILENT. By George Weller. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

JACK BELDEN saw the fall of an empire, or at least a piece of an empire, and it fascinated him just as the same phenomenon, spread over centuries, fascinated Edward Gibbon. In this case the crumbling and crashing of a civilization was compressed into a matter of weeks, and Belden saw it with his own eyes in Burma and at the frequent risk of his own life. The spectacle was incredibly gaudy.

Mandalay, the city of ancient Burmese kings, was a peaceful and elegant seat of British Oriental power one lovely April morning, and then came Japanese bombers. By mid-afternoon it was a roaring crematory. The British masters were helpless; a colonel whom Mr. Belden tried to interview that evening said, "I haven't got the time now, and besides I'm drunk." Burmese looters and fifth-columnists took over; their torches kept Mandalay burning for twenty-seven days and nights.

Burma was just a far-off piece of empire in that spring of 1942; too late London and Washington realized that it was the last land link with their most precious Far Eastern ally, China. Chiang Kai-shek realized it at the time and offered to send troops. For two months Britain said no, thanks. When Rangoon was burning, Chinese troops finally were admitted to help save Burma. The American General Stilwell commanded them, and Jack Belden, a Brooklyn boy who had learned Chinese, went along as a correspondent. By then it was too late. So Mr. Belden's tale is one of defeat, retreat, disaster. The theme of mounting doom gives a grim unity to his story, and his way of telling it makes his book one of the most exciting of the newspapermen's chronicles of the war.

BIRLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

George Weller, correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, saw another nearby piece of British Empire fall. He was in Singapore and the Malay Peninsula, and the story was much the same there. But Mr. Weller did not picture it as the collapse of empire. He noted many facts, in a conscientious way, and has tossed them all together in a heap. Some of the military details he saw more clearly than Mr. Belden; his account of the Japanese genius for jungle fighting is the best that has appeared. Mr. Weller analyzed the Japanese technique of filtering around behind the British and panicking them—if necessary, with mere firecrackers. Mr. Belden, who was caught in one of those rear road-block maneuvers, is vivid about the terror of it but sketchy about the mechanics.

On two things both authors agree. First, the British commanders were habitually and chronically on the defensive, and if any young military upstart suggested striking at the enemy first, he was icily put in his place. Second, the British officers in both Malaya and Burma were still fighting fuzzy-wuzzies by time-honored methods, not grasping the fact that the Japanese were a new sort of fuzzy-wuzzy.

Mr. Belden gives some appalling examples of the military stupor engendered by decades of complacent superiority over the natives. The British heroically blew up the Sittang River bridge in Burma, thinking to stop the Japanese. It developed that the Japanese were able to cross the river anyway, but the British troops trapped on the wrong side were not.

Mr. Belden keeps probing for the causes of the imperial crumbling. He noticed that the Japanese made a big play with political propaganda. They constantly urged the Burmese to rise and throw off their oppressors. This went well, because the unimaginative Burmese could not picture an oppressor worse than the one they had. The Chinese were smart enough to bring along a political department in an effort to counteract that propaganda, but they never had time to get it working. The British roused themselves to the point of putting up posters telling the Burmese: "Maintain order!"

Of course the British were under the heavy handicap of waging a war for freedom in behalf of a race they held in subjugation. This was awkward not only from a moral standpoint but also from a practical one. A British general who was surrounded with his forces sadly told Mr. Belden that he never knew where the Japanese were but they always seemed to know where he was. Apparently the Burmese were supplying information to the Japanese but not to the British.

In addition to educating the natives, the British might well have paid more attention to the political enlightenment of their own troops. The polyglot armies of Irish and Australians, Scotch and Gurkhas seem to have fought not so

FRIENDSHIP OASIS FOR INTEGRATED COUPLES

WANTED—Mature couples, married & otherwise, who are integrated & adjusted in Today, who think & permit others to think for themselves; with traits of Imagination, Analytical Insight, Ability to Articulate Ideas.

UNWANTED—Single, predatory persons, (because consciously disruptive), mustach'd villains & bedazzled hustlers competitively 'On the Make,' therefore too rugged individualists (hissed) & generating social unrest ('His sad but true').

NO EGOCENTRICS, TORCH CARRIERS, STRIKING PERSONALITIES, ISM-FANATICS.

NO EXPLOITERS OF SOCIAL SURROUNDINGS FOR EGO OR BUSINESS PURPOSES.

Social group now forming—No dues or obligations whatever. Group devises its own diversions which run to intellectual, artistic, recreational etc.

If we are your kind, write me giving a detailed autobiographical portrait, phone number, etc. Address: Box 1412, c/o The Nation.

YOU'LL WANT TO READ

freedom

A quarterly commentary on all aspects of liberty

PRYNS HOPKINS, editor

Consistently fine articles by top-notch writers on all phases of freedom—genetic, aesthetic, psychological, industrial, political and intellectual.

SUBSCRIBE NOW

Single Copies 25 Cents	1375 S. Oak Knoll Avenue
By Subscription	Dept. TN,
Twelve Issues: $2.00	Pasadena California

Coming in the April issue of

ASIA AND THE AMERICAS Geopolitics: Law of the Jungle

By LIN YUTANG

You cannot afford to miss this witty, wise and significant article, in which the inimitable Lin Yutang points out the danger as well as the absurdity of the new and growing school of geopoliticians—in America and elsewhere.

START YOUR SUBSCRIPTION WITH THE APRIL ISSUE and begin to read also the new serial—a true story which will delight you—ANNA AND THE KING OF SIAM by Margaret Landon.

April issue now on sale at all newsstands
Special Offer: 8 months for $2

ASIA AND THE AMERICAS, 38 East 49th St., New York City
Please send me ASIA AND THE AMERICAS for eight months.
I enclose check for $2.00 in full payment.

Name.....

Address..... State.....

much for the empire as for the sake of upholding the reputations of their own regiments. When things got too bad, individual soldiers developed an understandable cynicism and were willing to cede the whole blankety-blank country (Malaya or Burma) to whosoever was such a blankety-blank fool as to want it.

Only the last third of "Retreat with Stilwell" deals with the march over the mountains from Burma to India by General Stilwell and his band of 115 assorted persons—British Quakers, Burmese nurses, a handful of Chinese, and a scattering of American and English soldiers. This saga deserves a fuller treatment. General Stilwell appears to have been a competent, courageous American military product who succeeded in getting over the mountains on foot. Thousands of other less distinguished persons accomplished the same feat, among them many of General Stilwell's Chinese troops, without the aid of their general. Jack Belden implies that General Stilwell was a hero, which he may have been, but we do not get enough details about his character to form a judgment.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Miss Lucy Ludwell

JOHN PARADISE AND LUCY LUDWELL OF LONDON AND WILLIAMSBURG. By Archibald Bolling Shepperson. The Dietz Press. $4.

THOUGH a graduate of Oxford and a member of both the Royal Society and Dr. Johnson's Essex Head Club, John Paradise never wrote a book, or held an office, or had a profession, or even kept a journal. He did nothing at all to make him the subject of a biography exactly two hundred years after his birth except to marry Miss Lucy Ludwell of Virginia. That young lady, besides being a beauty and an heiress, possessed many traits of character which, even in the eighteenth century, apparently marked the behavior of the Southern belle among strangers. She was vain, ignorant, arrogant, scatter-brained, and unshakably convinced that everyone she met should be as interested as herself in her own family. The persistence with which she bent the ears of Dr. Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the other literary and artistic friends of her husband in London with tales about the Ludwells drove Paradise close to distraction. Her extravagances sank him deeper and deeper into debt.

A simple solution of the problem would have been for Mr. Paradise to take his wife back where she came from, declare himself an American citizen, and take title to her share of the vast Ludwell holdings. He would have done so in the first year of his marriage except that he was terrified of thunder, and from the papers that had been read before the Royal Society since Benjamin Franklin had become a member, got the impression that America was in the perpetual throes of cataclysmic electrical storms. For eighteen years, during which they frantically sought—but seldom followed—the advice of every prominent American they met or were related to, the Paradises prepared for and then postponed their voyage. And then when they actually made it, they were worse off than before. After a triumphal social tour of the great plantations, which ended at Mount Vernon, they quit Virginia abruptly without settling any of their problems. After this they flitted between Paris, where they now got money as well as advice from the hard-pressed Jefferson, and Italy and London. There Paradise died in 1795, sunk deep in alcoholism and melancholia. Ten years later his widow, on borrowed money but with all her airs and finery, returned to queen it over a Williamsburg that had already become the sleepy village it remained until the Rockefeller restored it. She died there in 1814, but not in the now familiar Paradise House; her last two years were spent in the public asylum for the insane.

Patient scholarly research has seldom brought to light a couple so aptly fitted for the leading figures in a costume farce. How two such zanies got themselves intimately entangled with the great literary figures of eighteenth-century London and the great political figures of America makes their story. One wonders how Jefferson, Franklin, Wythe, Jay, the Adamsons, and the Lees could spare the time from trying to straighten out the Paradises to get on with the business of founding this nation.

GRACE ADAMS

The Negro and "His Place"

PATTERNS OF NEGRO SEGREGATION. By Charles S. Johnson. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THIS book is the second volume in the study of the Negro in the United States which was carried on under the direction of a Swedish social economist and sponsored by the Carnegie Corporation. As stated in the foreword by the Editorial Committee, although the facts of Negro segregation are well known, the special contribution of this book is that it shows the great "variations in customary interracial practices" which are designed to keep the Negro in "his place."

In the ten chapters composing the first part of the book, the patterns of segregation are traced from the spatial and institutional segregation of the Negro in various parts of the country to the ideological justifications which are used to support certain beliefs and attitudes regarding the place of the Negro in our society. The areas covered by the survey include a county in each of three Southern states, a city in each of five Southern states, Baltimore and Indianapolis, which are classified as border cities, and two Northern cities—Chicago and New York. The author's analysis shows that in border states, where there are no laws concerning the segregation of the races, custom and tradition have been as effective as legal codes; whereas in the North laws against discrimination have not nullified customary practices. This section of the book contains a chapter on occupational discrimination against the Negro during the present national emergency. A chapter on the ideology of the color line based largely on evidence which field workers secured through interviewing persons in the areas mentioned above shows that Southerners still hold to their traditional ideas about the color line and that these ideas have been diffused to some extent among Northerners.

Although the facts of segregation are well known, Americans generally are not so well acquainted with the reactions of Negroes to discrimination. The second part of the book discusses the techniques which they use toward segregation and its effects on their personalities. Many of the facts presented in this section were revealed in the studies of Negro youth sponsored by the American Youth Commission, though the author has included additional data on the reactions of adult Negroes. The three chief techniques of reaction, according to his analysis, are acceptance of the situation, avoidance, and hostility and aggression. Unfortunately, we are not informed concerning the prevalence of these techniques among Negroes or whether one is increasing or displacing the others.

April 3, 1943

Since the author undertook only to delineate the forms of Negro segregation, perhaps he should not be criticized for giving a static description of race relations. However, since his book is part of a study which aims to throw new light on the Negro problem, one might expect more than a descriptive—in some places it is scarcely more than reportorial—account of the present situation. Only in the first and last chapters does the author attempt, and then in a sketchy and generalized fashion, an analysis of the dynamic forces in American life which are constantly affecting the patterns of race relations. Political factors are almost entirely ignored, though at the present time the changing character of our political structure is having an important influence. Moreover, one would like to know how the growth of large impersonal corporations and technological changes are affecting the traditional relations of the two races. A thorough-going sociological analysis of the patterns of Negro segregation must take into account the influence of such factors.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Cross-Purposes

NEW DIRECTIONS, 1942. Number Seven. Edited by James Laughlin. New Directions. $3.50.

DESPITE their flaws and occasional absurdities of selection, Mr. Laughlin's annuals have been invaluable as barometers of the advance guard in imaginative writing. The latest, as is to be expected, indicates deep depressions moving east and west from the war zones. Foreign sources yield far less than usual—a drop of Kafka, some of Joue—and the excitement level of American writing is also down. Of this year's four debuts, two are real: one from New York, the poet Marcia Nardi, and one from Boston, a poet-dramatist who calls himself Louis Second. The other two, from Illinois and Kansas, are duds. I hope this doesn't indicate a culture shift. The most distinguished writing in the book is by relatively well-established names: William Carlos Williams, Alvin Levin, Paul Goodman, Richard Eberhart. The rest is largely without style, featureless from the will to shine. But one should be grateful for what does emerge. Collections like this are among the sparse evidence that literature is not being completely displaced by journalism.

Mr. Laughlin's foreword betrays one of the reasons why so much tripe makes his grade: he lets it in as satire. Writers, he declares, have got to keep hammering at the falsities of the present order so as to increase the chances of a real people's revolution against the "shiny and delusive world imperialism" he suspects is in the offing. But this commendable wish need not make one hear a hammer-blow in a pinprick. In his

UNITED RALLY for the release of SPANISH LOYALIST PRISONERS and members of the INTERNATIONAL BRIGADE

now held in NORTH AFRICA
•
CARNEGIE HALL
Monday, April 5, at 8 P. M.

Speakers:

Dorothy Thompson	Edgar Ansel Mowrer
Jay Allen	Freda Kirchwey
José A. de Aguirre	Fernando de los Rios
J. Alvarez del Vayo	Pierre Cot
Joseph Curran	Spokesman for AFL

Sponsored by the Free World Association
(Spanish Section), in collaboration with

The Spanish Confederated Societies
The Greater New York Council of the C.I.O.
France Forever

The Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee
And others, including all the pro-democratic Spanish-speaking societies of New York City.

TICKETS — $1.65, $1.10, 55¢
Boxes seating 8, $15

on sale at

FREE WORLD ASSOCIATION

Room 1054 • 25 West 42nd Street • New York City
Telephone LAckawanna 4-5308, 2800 or from sponsoring organizations.

Available at CARNEGIE HALL, April 5th

IF YOUR COMMUNITY HAS NO BOOKSELLER ORDER YOUR GIFT BOOKS
THROUGH THE NATION

Books of any publisher will be delivered to your door at the regular list price, post free if payment accompanies order. Postage charges are paid by purchaser if books are mailed C.O.D. READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

THE Nation

25 Fifth Avenue, New York City

case I fear it has. Hence we are again exposed to reams of George Mann's interminable pseudo-satire, "Straws in the Wind." Having disposed of the Stalinists last year, Mann now polishes off the neo-Thomists; and we are promised that in future issues he will annihilate the "gentlemanly scholars" and the "sociologists." Vae victis! But even for this task it is not enough to set up a single lay figure and knock him down again and again by incidents designed to mock the trend he stands for. Such simplicisme inevitably drives the reader from amusement to irritation to boredom. A good satirist is a good puppeteer: his grotesque world has its own logic: when Punch falls down, it is because the policeman pushes him. Mann won't let the policeman have his way, but bops Punch with a great big human hand, to show he's dead and no mistake. Even less effective, because less witty, are two others to whom Laughlin attributes "satiric flair," Eve Merriam and John Edward Hart, the debutant Kansan. Each has several poems—Miss Merriam, a story too—on the iniquity of war. Miss Merriam seems subtler, having absorbed many tricks from today's vogues in poetry, but she is really only highbrow-maudlin where Hart is lowbrow-maudlin. There are also several yards of material in mock-Biblical style by Robert Clairmont, apparently intended to satirize the entire modern world: entertaining by fits and starts, but footling on the whole.

To have anything like the effect Mr. Laughlin desires, satire must be written at white heat of anger with a skill that makes it coldly terrible, eliciting the bitter mirth of self-recognition, not the facile chuckle of superiority. Besides, as Wyndham Lewis pointed out in "Men Without Art," most good writing since the Industrial Revolution has been satire in effect, whatever its immediate intention. The writer's real responsibility—to be true to himself—inevitably opposes him to socio-economic arrangements that care nothing for that sort of truth. Stephen Spender has lately restated this argument in "Life and the Poet," another essay hereby commended to blazers of new directions who might be led down the garden path by Mr. Laughlin's notion that to write well against, one had best be for some specific practical rearrangement of social mechanisms (Mr. L. seems to pine, in particular, for a gospel of Social Credit). It is enough that the artist be proudly and determinedly himself. Of the four writers praised by the editor as satirists, only Paul Goodman seems to act on this principle. His intrepidity always commands attention, even when its expression is posterous; and now he is working his way to a personal use of myth that is valid because unintimidated by precedent. His prose poem, "Alceste," subtly weaves into the life-death pattern of the old story a modern dialectic of war and peace, folly and wisdom. The least consciously satirical of the work here presented as such, it is better satire than all the rest.

It is in drama, though, that the 1942 directions seem to lead farthest. "Louis Second," in a verse playlet as intense as it is brief, evokes the potent ghost of Roman decadence to symbolize certain fissures of moral consciousness. His fifth-century bishop, Apollinaris, muttering "Never kill" as he strangles a whorish pagan woman, reminds me of the tormented protagonist of O'Flaherty's "The Puritan," whose spiritual crisis has a like result. The treatment here is not altogether sure-handed, but it has the fiercely burning quality essential for such themes. An equally adult approach to moral problems, coupled with a verve of technical experiment, characterizes Dr. Williams's play, "Many Loves," modestly subtitled "Trial Horse No. 1." I hope Williams's fertile imagination foals many more. "No. 1" concerns three one-act plays presenting different kinds of love, written by a young playwright whose intellectual and moral conflicts with an older man are the central theme of the work. Its action is a rehearsal of the three plays, which, as it goes on, vitally affects the two men and the woman they both love. This play-within-play device is of course "new" only in the sense that it is seldom tried; but Williams does really new fascinating things with it. The verse of the core-play—like Eliot's in "The Family Reunion," not blank verse Brooklynized, à la Anderson—is both flexible poetically and rooted in current speech. The prose dialogue of the three one-act plays is vivid and flowing, like that of Williams's naturalistic novels. The play might or might not "take" as theater—I think it would—but it would certainly be a joy to the ear. Experimental theaters that still experiment, please note.

In straight fiction, as distinguished from satirical "fable," Mr. Laughlin presents parts of Alvin Levin's first large-scale book, "Love Is Like Park Avenue." This has many of the virtues and few of the vices of that mordant big-city literature in which our novelists specialize. For one thing, it doesn't try to be a Novel. There is no laborious "plot," no "sentimental education" of the dumb kid around the corner. Levin works entirely within the convention of Dos Passos's "camera eye," presenting a series of individuals and incidents that add up to a portrait of mass-man, species New-yorkensis. There are weak spots, especially when the bitterness becomes apparently personal and a little shrill, as in the snapshots of Young Intellectuals. But, on the whole, the selections have penetration, swiftness, and solidity that mark them well off from most slice-of-life writing.

Apart from Jouve and Kafka, the rest of the poetry and fiction reveals very little talent. The pieces from Richard Eberhart's "Poem in Construction" are labored, and seldom flash with the profoundly simple perceptiveness of his shorter poems. A story by John Nerber shows that the Kafka influence can lead to bad imitations of Poe: a remarkable phenomenon, since—to judge from some of their acts of worship—numbers of Kafkans have not read Poe. The chiel thrill is provided by Marcia Nardi, a discovery of Dr. Williams's, who stands out so far from her surroundings that those who arrive weary and mindsore at page 415 will be strongly tempted to overrate her. As commentator on the modern scene, observer of streets and asylums and prostitutes' prisons, she has not much to offer; but in the intimate recording of situations of the heart, she is indeed—as Williams says—"much better than some of the best-known professional poets about us." There are two poems here—"When Women Talk," and "That point—believe me heart"—which belong to the real literary experiences, those which recur involuntarily to the mind, having become part of the equipment with which it meets the occasions of living. It is writing like this that makes "New Directions" an important event, even when nearly half the book is "satire" or junk by any other name.

FRANK JONES

IN BRIEF

CONRAD AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. Souvenirs by J. H. Retinger. Illustrated by Feliks Topolski. Roy Publishers. $2.50.

Both the author and the illustrator of this charming book are Poles settled in England, as Conrad was. Mr. Retinger is also an old friend of Conrad's and a member of literary circles in Paris as well as London. He has produced a piece of belles-lettres of a sort more common in France—and Ireland—than in England. It is a real contribution to the understanding of Conrad as a man and writer.

THIS IS CONGRESS. By Roland Young. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

It is to Mr. Young's credit that he has removed the thorny problem of the relationship between President and Congress from the level of contemporary politics without in the least reducing it to an exercise in abstract theory. His aim is to strengthen parliamentary government, he believes that the weaknesses of the present system may be viewed with tolerance but not with complacency, and he is convinced that improvements can be made without recourse to Constitutional amendment. Briefly, the thesis is that Congress, which grew up like Topsy, needs more centralized direction. Mr. Young offers four general suggestions for improving "the position of Congress as a thinking agency and as an agency which supervises the operation of the bureaucracy." First, and most important, he would replace the present inchoate system of committees with an arrangement of not more than ten parallel committees in each house. Second, these would be presided over by chairmen selected by party caucus instead of by seniority as at present, and the twenty chairman would comprise a Legislative Cabinet which would have authority over the committees and would be responsible for determining legislative policy. By this streamlining process Congress would be given a direction and a capacity for concerted action that would contrast strongly with the present fantastic overlapping of jurisdictions and irresponsible mushrooming of policies. The third proposal calls for better communications between the Administration and Congress, in part through an arrangement permitting Administration members to address Congress and submit themselves to questioning from the floor.

The fourth would establish an improved budget procedure. It may be hoped that Mr. Young's book has a wide circulation on Capitol Hill, because only Congress, convinced of its weaknesses, can find the way to a healthier role in the life of the nation. Mr. Young might well serve as a guide.

LORD OF ALASKA. BARANOV AND THE RUSSIAN ADVENTURE. By Hector Chevigny. The Viking Press. $3.

Everybody knows that we acquired Alaska from Russia, but the fascinating story of the Russian settlement will be fresh to almost everybody. Readable and fully documented, this book comes at a time when Alaska's potentialities are just beginning to be realized by the general public.

MEXICAN OIL. By Harlow S. Person. Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

In this brief volume the Mexican oil controversy is viewed as a clash between the humanitarian, semi-socialistic strains in Mexican culture and the harsh, materialistic elements in our Anglo-Saxon culture. In an effort to help the average American to understand Mexico's reasons for seizing the oil wells, the author traces the Mexican concept of property rights in the country's diverse culture, its history, and its law. A very careful analysis is made of the settlement between Mexico and the United States and the agreement as to the amount and terms of indemnification, which leaves the reader convinced that the arrangement was as fair as could possibly have been attained. Despite the book's brevity, the analysis of the controversy is remarkably complete with but one exception. It is unfortunate that the position of the American oil companies is not subject to the same careful historical and interpretative scrutiny that is given to Mexico's policies. This would serve the dual purpose of casting further light on the basic nature of the controversy and of offsetting the suspicion that the companies are not given a fair hearing.

ART

SOUTINE. At the Bignou Gallery, 32 East Fifty-seventh Street, until April 10.

Soutine paints in a rich indigestible style. To enjoy it one must have a strong stomach and a more than superficial acquaintance with his work. One might begin with a vivid picture of a little girl in blue called "The Abandoned Child" and work up to "The Chicken," "The Beef," and "Reclining Figures," before attempting the landscapes. This tortured sinister countryside is not a world one wishes to enter lightly; perhaps the easiest way to do so is to start with number 7, "The Winding Road."

MONDRIAN. At the Valentine Gallery, 55 East Fifty-seventh Street, until April 10.

Mondrian after Soutine is as restful as a nice clean white hospital after the turmoil of the battlefield. In spite of its name, even "Broadway Boogie Woogie" only vibrates gently around a given line like a neon light in pastel colors. The other pictures vary little from Mondrian's usual style of carefully intersecting black lines on a white background with occasional red or blue squares like the maps for a projected subway. Of the five, numbers 11 and 111 are the most interesting.

HERBERT BAYER. At the Willard Gallery, 32 East Fifty-seventh Street, until April 6.

Bright, neat pictures by one of the Bauhaus boys, who is best known, particular-

4000 PERFECT PLAYS

With
Duotone Lifetone
PHONOGRAPH
NEEDLE

Brilliant quality of reproduction, protection for your precious records — both are yours when you use the Duotone Lifetone Needle in your record player. Its precious alloy tip constructed from a union of extremely rare metals is designed to reduce friction — to protect your records from wear — to accurately reproduce the natural beauty of musical tones. Satisfaction or your money back. At your record dealer or write Duotone Company, 199 Broadway.

$1.50

IN CANADA — 151008 LEE — MONTREAL

FOR TRUER TONE Say Duotone THE WORLD'S FINEST NEEDLES

ly in this country, for his work as a designer of displays and advertising. It is bound to be said that this talent, of which he possesses so much, has influenced his more serious work. Number 3, "Experience in Atmosphere," and more particularly number 7, "Two Worlds," barely escape this accusation. Nevertheless, these are very pleasant, gay pictures, charming in design and color.

VERTES. At the Gallery of Modern Art. 18 East Fifty-seventh Street, until April 17.

This is disappointing even to an admirer of Mr. Vertès's drawings for the fashion papers. JEAN CONNOLLY

RECORDS

COLUMBIA'S March list offers the powerful orchestral introduction to the Dungeon Scene of Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Florestan's recitative and aria "Gott! welch' Dunkel hier," recorded by Leinsdorf with an unidentified orchestra and René Maison (71410-D, $1.05). The orchestral part loses force through the lack of precision in execution and contour—for example, the lack of distinctness in the powerful turns in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth measures; and Maison's voice is one that I have always found unpleasant to listen to. The sound of the orchestra is reproduced with extraordinary distinctness and spaciousness; but Maison's singing is reproduced with terrific reverberation. The Brunswick-Polydor record of a performance by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra and Völcker is no longer available; perhaps Victor will issue the H. M. V. record of a performance with Roswänge.

Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings is performed by Serkin and the Busch Quartet (Set 533, $4.73). The work is Schumann's most engaging piece of chamber music; it requires Serkin to do what he does best, which is ensemble playing with Busch; his playing is warm, sensitive, rich-sounding; and it is well integrated with the playing of the quartet, which is the opposite of warm and rich-sounding. The recorded sound of the performance is clear and spacious, but not as agreeable to the ear as it might be; and the first side of my copy wavers badly in pitch. The older Victor set offers superior reproduction of an equally well integrated performance by Sanromá and the finer-sounding Primrose Quartet.

Paul Robeson tells us that he sings the songs in the album "Songs of Free Men" (Set 534, $3.68)—"From Border to Border" and "Oh, How Proud Our Quiet Don" from Dzerzhinsky's opera "Quiet Flows the Don," Donayevsky's "Native Land," the Red Army's "Song of the Plains," the Spanish Loyalists' "Four Insurgent Generals," the German concentration camp song "Die Moorsoldaten," "The Purest Kind of a Guy" from Blitzstein's "No For an Answer," and Earl Robinson's and Alfred Hayes's "Joe Hill"—because "they issue from the present common struggle for a decent world, a struggle in which the artist must also play his part." The struggle is one in which I too am emotionally involved; the songs, nevertheless, leave me unmoved. Mr. Robeson sings them well.

A month after Victor's release of the recording of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony made by Golschmann and the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Columbia issues a performance of the work recorded by Beecham with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set 524, $3.68). Considered by itself it is an effective performance; but Beecham's faster pace for the opening section makes this section less grandly impressive than it is in Golschmann's version. As reproduced by the records the sound of the Beecham performance is voluminous but dull, hazy, smudged, without the brilliance, the richness, the clarity of the recorded sound of the Golschmann performance; and the second side of my copy wavers very badly in pitch.

As it happens, having decided to feature each month a "record classic" selected from its catalogue, Columbia has begun this month with the set of Schubert's Symphony No. 5 that Beecham made in England with the London Philharmonic (Set 366, $4.78). The symphony is only the best of Schubert's early and inconsequential copies of the works of his great predecessors; but it is superbly performed; and the recorded sound of the performance has the richness and brilliance, the transparency of texture, the sharpness of definition that are lacking in the sound of the Sibelius Seventh.

A newspaperman had occasion to remark to me recently: "Because publishers were so damned anxious for the public to buy everything they published, they brought pressure against a reviewer who wrote that a book was bad. As a result we have book columnists and reviewers for whom everything published has merit—and to whom nobody pays any attention." I mention his remark because it applies to record-reviewing. With few exceptions record-company executives dislike the reviewer who creates in his readers the confidence that will cause them to buy what he tells them is good—who creates this confidence by telling them also when he thinks something is bad. They dislike him because they want to sell everything they produce, and regard the review as only an additional kind of publicity material for that purpose—a kind for which the payment is the sample records that are sent to the reviewer gratis; and, as they have been quoted to me, "why should we give expensive records to someone who knocks them?" The reviewer they like is the one who can hear only good in the records, or who cannot believe evil even when he hears it—who, if Columbia's recording of Sibelius's First is so bad that he must say "the orchestra does not come through as richly as the Philadelphia" does in the Victor recording, hastens to add "that may be because of an inferior recording [i. e., copy] that reached us"—and who certainly would have no influence on my buying if I had to depend on someone's judgment. And what with the reviewers who have good ears but poor machines, the ones with good machines but no ears, the ones with no ears and bad machines, the ones with a desire to have the records and a willingness to be agreeable for them—most reviews are the kind that record-company executives like.

It doesn't make things any easier for the man who must report that a recording is technically defective, to have reviewers for important publications pronounce it technically excellent. Not only that, but since records are released only when approved by the artist, the reviewer is in the uncomfortable position of finding fault with recording that has been passed by Stokowski, by Serkin, by Bruno Walter, by the Budapest Quartet. But now Beecham has publicly repudiated the defective recordings of his performances of Sibelius's Seventh and other works with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; and the report of his suit to prevent their sale was published only a day before one New York reviewer pronounced the recording of the Sibelius Seventh "well made technically" and another found it "good, although not quite so expansively resonant as Victor's." And so you can understand why I have had candles burning before a picture of Beecham ever since.

E. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Americans in England

[We print here portions of a letter recently received from England.]

We are full of Americans. You go to little country places and there they are. London overflows with them. I cannot think what they must be feeling about this country during war time! Our towns are neglected; our great buildings are either wrecked or squalid or lack of being kept up. We have no light; we have no paper. But the worst of all is that we can do so little for them. We try sometimes to entertain them a little because it must be horrible so far away from the things they really care for, but it simply can't be done to any great extent because of the food question. Many of them do not understand why people won't sell them things in the shops—for the simple reason that they either haven't got them or that they have to divide them between a number of customers. I do feel so sorry that Americans should find us like this and afraid that they will think we are always so.

It is quite clear that there is an immense difference between this country and yours in war time, and it seems impossible to make this known. You see, even the bombing has been cleared up and tidied up, and no one who hasn't been through it has any idea of what it was. We have a little raid now and again, as the other day when the Germans killed all those little children, but it is nothing compared with what happened before, and so even that doesn't seem quite enough to account for the fearfulness to which we have grown accustomed, but which must be horrid for newcomers. I want to tell every American that things aren't always like this and that we aren't really mean and inhospitable.

One more thing too distresses me a little. So many Americans tell us that they have come to fight for us and then they are isolationists, as many are, they don't really want to come. I think though can't be said about the fighting or being for us, that it would be very long if it were for us; that Americans don't come in until the war was on their own doorstep and that if they are with us now in the West, we also all (do) share with them in the East. An army in another country is full of difficulties, only I don't want Americans to feel as we felt in the last war that the French, having welcomed us, later resented almost everything we did, a resentment which to some extent was returned with such stories as that the French charged for a drink of water? I wonder when this chaos will cease.

Of course we still hang on the wireless waiting for news which will indicate that the end, even if distant, is in sight. If we could go a little more quickly, perhaps Hitler wouldn't always have the chance of keeping ahead with more bullying of the continent of Europe. We are getting quicker of course, but such awful things are happening in Europe that every five minutes count. Two Jewish friends of mine committed suicide in Berlin a short time ago because they were afraid of becoming a burden to their son. I get Red Cross letters from Paris from people who are barely existing.

Here there is a lot of movement about the future. People are ahead of the government in many ways, though it is true that the government has plenty to do with the main thing—which is to get the war finished. We were rather worried the other day about our Old Man when he had pneumonia. He is the very symbol of our resistance, and we can never forget that he enabled us to hold out when we had nobody in the war but ourselves. But there are people moving all over the country on the subject of a better world. Reconstruction meetings take place in small groups everywhere. Planning a new country is very much to the fore, and there are numerous exhibitions traveling around the country to do something about it.

M. H.

London, February 28

A Good Idea

Dear Sirs: There is in America today a well-founded opinion that the present war is being fought to preserve the Four Freedoms for the common people of the world. Vice-President Henry Wallace has spoken feelingly and effectively about the Century of the Common Man. The spirit of human brotherhood seems to emanate from the White House. At times the glow almost reaches Capitol Hill.

Meanwhile across the street in the venerable mid-Victorian precincts of the State Department tory appeasement still reigns. At Mr. Hull's council table the ghosts of Chamberlain and Darlan vie for place with the butcher Franco and Otto of Hapsburg.

Would it not be proper to suggest that the President some fine day take Mr. Wallace over and introduce him to Mr. Hull. I think it would be nice if they could get to know each other.

SAMUEL BRISTOL

Whittier, Cal., March 17

A Farmer Speaks

Dear Sirs: I became acquainted with James Patton, who wrote the two articles for you on Why Food Is Scarce, shortly after he came out of college. I have been for years a Farmers' Union member. He became our part-time secretary as we were so poor. I saw at the time he was a very bright boy. His father was a coal miner, and Jim was brought up in a labor atmosphere. The first time I met him he came to my farm. It was in the fall and I was getting ready to plant fall wheat. Being very busy, I said to him if you want to talk and visit with me you will have to walk around after me, which he did.

That fall he put in considerable time going around and talking to farmers. As he was labor-inclined in his talk, he told me afterward he got his foot in it several times, as so many farmers think labor is on the other side of the fence. When the real situation is thought through, the farmer is very little more than a laborer himself. But some farmers, though their farms are mortgaged, think themselves capitalists. Jim Patton knows what he is talking about. I took those two articles to the oil station for people to read.

In The Nation of January 30 there was a paragraph saying that farmers have enough machinery. As far as I can see and hear, that is not correct. Farm machinery these last few years has been made too light, does not stand up. I bought a Deering Combine in 1918. It is running yet. It cut 330 acres last year and will cut quite a few more crops providing I can get the repairs. It was made of good material and heavy enough. It has the same motor on it. Large farmers as a rule have enough machinery, but the smaller farmers are short. The farm sales in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and the eastern part of Colorado show this. I consider this has been deliberately planned so as to throw these small farmers into the labor class for the larger farmers to hire.

The food situation is just as serious as Jim says it is. The common man is getting his eyes opened. Our best boys have been taken. I have 1,400 acres of land, most of it farm land, some of it good corn land. In 1942 I raised 7,100 bushels of corn. The cost to gather it was very high as mechanical crop pickers are not a success out here and most of the shucking is done by hand. The home front is a hard place to fight.

I have watched the State Department for, I think, five years, and our boys die for nothing.

E. L. RAMSEY

Haxtun, Col., March 21

When the Soldiers Return

Dear Sirs: I happen to be in touch with a group of soldiers in process of organization that is interested in seeing to it that after the war returning soldiers will not be used by the powers of darkness, as was the case following the other war in considerable measure. There should be coordination, and I would be glad to know about similar groups and movements. Already the forces of reaction are active, and no time is to be lost.

JOHN C. GRANBERY,

Editor of the Emancipator

San Antonio, Tex., March 15

A Few Facts and Figures

Dear Sirs: In the speech of Captain Rickenbacker delivered to the state legislature in the Assembly chamber in Albany on February 22, 1943, the following sentence struck me: "And those five million aliens who have failed to accept the responsibilities of citizenship of this nation, but who came here to enjoy its fruits and privileges, apply tomorrow for your first papers and the responsibilities that go with them—if not, go back where you come from."

Needless to say, the majority of aliens agree with the appeal of Captain Rickenbacker, although they have already accepted responsibilities in serving in the United States army, as workers in war plants, as blood donors, and as volunteers in many civil-defense activities. Therefore it is necessary to analyze the figure of five million aliens who, according to Captain Rickenbacker, "enjoy fruits and privileges" without accepting all responsibilities. The report of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization of February 1, 1943, now submitted to Congress, shows that on December 31, 1942, 4,280,056 registered aliens were living in the United States. It might be of interest that in 1941 and 1942, 547,658 aliens became citizens.

Seventy per cent of the total of registered aliens came to the United States before 1924, and 900,000 among these came prior to 1906. According to the report cited, 700,000 aliens were found to be illiterate; the percentage of illiteracy rises among those of both sexes forty-five years of age and older. These 700,000 may have their first papers, as do most of the aliens, but they can't acquire citizenship.

In the decade of 1931 to 1940 alone 1,369,479 aliens filed their first papers and 442,919 filed in 1941 and 1942. Owing to the long-drawn-out procedure for issuing second papers, we have to figure that those aliens who filed first papers during the years 1936 to 1942 are still counted as aliens, although they have accepted the responsibilities to which Captain Rickenbacker refers. Many of them are serving in the army, but the greater part of them are still "aliens."

No, there are no such five million aliens: there are, according to the official figures:

Registered aliens on December 31, 1942	4,280,056
Minus illiterate aliens	700,000
Minus aliens who filed first papers, 1936-42	1,280,132
Visitors unable to file first papers (estimated)	50,000
	2,030,132
Total	2,249,924

We could deduct, moreover, those aliens who were rejected for citizenship because they didn't pass the intelligence test, those who were unable to produce certain papers, etc.

We must bear in mind the fact that cases of aliens who filed their first papers in 1935 may be still pending. As can be proved by official statistics, more than 70 per cent of the aliens who have not, unfortunately, acquired American citizenship arrived in this country before 1924. Since we know that from 1936 to 1942, 1,280,132 aliens filed their first papers—that is, 30 per cent of the total—we have the interesting fact that all newcomers of the last seven years declared their intention to become United States citizens. These newcomers are very well aware of the big issues at stake. The struggle began for them just ten years ago. Captain Rickenbacker shouldn't overlook these facts.

KURT R. GROSSMAN

New York, March 15

Hot Jazz Wanted

Dear Sirs: A group of soldiers here have formed the Aloe Field Hot Jazz Club to provide relaxation and enjoyment during our free hours. It is still in its embryonic stage, and further development depends on cooperation from civilians on the outside—that is, on records which they may be able to contribute in addition to those which have been contributed by club members.

Records are necessary because hot jazz is seldom played on the radio—why the radio stations overlook this genuine native American art is hard to understand. By hot jazz we mean, of course, the honest expression of emotions through improvisations by small bands—not "swing," which is a dull, repetitious, prescribed, uninspired type of music that omits the essential characteristic of improvisation, or artistic expression.

The records we want are those of the orchestras of Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong, Count Basie, Earl Hines, Jimmy Lunceford, Sidney Bechet, Eddie Condon, Bud Freeman, Mugsy Spaulner, and of the Benny Goodman Trio and Quartet. We don't want records of the dance music of big orchestras like Tommy Dorsey's, Guy Lombardo's, Harry James's, Glenn Miller's, and the like.

If hot-jazz devotees among your readers have duplicate or worn records perhaps they will be willing to pass them on to us, who will receive them with gratitude.

One important thing our club will do is provide the Negro troops with a type of music which itself knows no racial barriers.

SERGEANT CY SHAIN,

President, Aloe Field Hot Jazz Club
Victoria, Tex., March 25

Is It an Error?

Dear Sirs: May I draw to your attention an error in grammar in a review by Frank Jones in your issue of February 20?

He says, "Liben feels badly . . ." Verbs of the sense of look, sound, smell, taste, and feel, and copulatives such as be, appear, and see, take an adjective to denote the quality of the subject, as "Myrtle looks pretty in her new hat"; "John feels bad today."

One does not say, "I feel so happily, coldly, gladly, etc." One should say, "I feel so happy, cold, and glad."

JOHN W. FOLLETTE

New Paltz, N. Y., March 15

Russia After the War

Dear Sirs: May I "have words with" Mr. Charles W. Sherman regarding his letter in your issue of February 27? Mr. Stalin has hardly nurtured unity among the United Nations by making clear on more than one occasion his sentiments regarding the war effort of his capitalistic allies, their spirit as contrasted to their action; and his attitude toward a second front is too well known for comment. Also, has Russia's recent rejection of Poland's boundary claims, for restoration to the pre-war dimensions, anything in common with Mr. Stalin's acceptance of "the Allies proposition to allow all people to select their own form of government"?

With reference to the assertion that in post-war Russia, internal rehabilitation will frustrate any designs on foreign or neighboring countries, this point is open at least to discussion, if not to doubt. A socialistic economy is operated for the benefit of the state and only secondarily for the good of the individual; so that when the state decides that one commodity, or one species of commodity, is to be produced at the sacrifice of others, such is the actual case. A socialistic economy also, being more flexible, can produce both sufficient consumers' goods to allow a reasonably high standard of living and, by eliminating the luxuries and frills of the capitalistic economy, can also produce, say armaments, on a scale which is impossible in a free-enterprise industrial set-up. Which means that post-war Russia, in spite of its devastated areas, will be able to shift to a peace-time economy and rebuild its internal economy, while at the same time reorganizing and reequipping its military machine with a celerity and efficiency wholly alien to the capitalistic economy of the democracies. This is not to say that such is probable, only that it is extremely possible and should be kept vitally in mind by our diplomats and statesmen.

Russia's vast resources, her near-miraculous speed in developing these resources due to her sincere emphasis on and almost worshipful faith in science, put her far ahead of post-war China; and, united with the authoritarian, bureaucratic leadership and state-controlled economy, far ahead of the more democratic countries in possible influence and power. Post-war Russia will be a stupendous potential of either world trade, international security, and universal good-will or fear and distrust by the other leading world-powers, let alone the small neighboring states. And the decision as to which she will be does not rest entirely with Russia.

Finally, there is very little tangible evidence that the "Communist International" is dead, and more to the effect that it has just been put to sleep "for the duration."

HAROLD C. FRANCIS

London, Ontario, March 7

The Evian Farce

Dear Sirs: May I express to you my sincere gratitude and admiration for Miss Kirchwey's excellent article in The Nation of March 13, While the Jews Die. It is honest, courageous, and moving. I am particularly grateful to her for having exposed the farce of the Evian conference and the tragic mockery and insincerity surrounding the whole affair. Thirty-eight nations were represented at Evian, and the net result was the admission of a few hundred refugees to Santa Domingo, at an exorbitant cost of millions of dollars to American Jews.

The world has become so accustomed to persecution of the Jewish race for almost 2,000 years that it accepts it with silence and now and then with an expression of meaningless and insincere sympathy. There is, however, a difference, a difference that affects not only the Jews but the future of all humanity. What is happening now to the Jews of Europe—the openly conducted mass murder on a scientific scale of millions of human beings—without shaking the soul and the conscience of humanity to its very foundations, spells the doom not only of the Jews but also of the whole human race.

Who can take the proclamations and protestations that we are fighting to save democracy and for the establishment of the Four Freedoms as embodied in the so-called Atlantic Charter seriously? Who can believe in it in the face of cynical statements that our country together with Great Britain will undertake "preliminary explorations" on the subject?

Even before the Ottawa conference convenes, there may not be a single Jew left alive in Hitler-occupied Europe. How can one expect people who make themselves accessories to the greatest crime in history to build a new world and carry out their high-sounding and lofty proclamations? It leaves millions of thinking men and women the world over with a sense of bitter frustration and hopelessness.

Please do not be disturbed by my pessimistic note. The Nation has always been a beacon light in the wilderness of human greed, selfishness, and lust for power commonly known as "politics." I am happy to see that you are not only carrying on the old tradition of your magnificent publication but that you have considerably extended and improved it. ARTHUR MEYEROWITZ
New York, March 19

CONTRIBUTORS

SELDEN C. MENEFEE is a writer on labor and politics and a regular contributor to the Christian Science Monitor and the Washington Post.

FRITZ STERNBERG, a German economist now in this country, has made a special study of the economics of war. He is a frequent contributor to the Army Journal in England and the Infantry Journal in this country, and has written two books, "From Nazi Sources: Germany's War Chances," and "Five-fold Aid to Britain."

JOHN McDONALD is editor of Film News, a magazine of documentary and educational films which he founded in 1939. He has written a number of documentary films, and has contributed to Public Opinion Quarterly, Town and Country, and other magazines.

A. FELIX DIAZ ESCOBAR is a deputy in the Mexican Parliament and chairman of the Anti-Nazi, Anti-Fascist National Committee.

RALPH BATES, distinguished English novelist, has contributed to many liberal magazines. His books include "The Olive Field," "Rainbow Fish," "The Fields of Paradise," "The Undiscoverables," and "Sirocco."

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER is head of the Department of Sociology at Howard University and author of "The Negro Family in the United States."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 7

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Is the German press chief's food highly seasoned?
- 5 Found in iron age records
- 10 Women war workers use them, but they are almost unnecessary
- 11 Refers to brief advertisements, apparently.
- 12 A change of stance shows what Congress does in regard to legislation
- 14 Ancient engines of war that should be highly popular with people living in glass houses
- 16 Anger with sweet savor
- 17 Narrow escape at the barber's
- 18 The WPA found work for these hands: the devil still does
- 20 It brings pain to a head
- 24 What to expect after a bull rush
- 24 He can't see much farther than the end of his nose
- 26 What the Government is most interested in collecting
- 27 Was in the chair, though not necessarily the presidential one
- 28 These foreign drinking-vessels come in sets
- 32 Advice at target practice serving no useful purpose
- 34 Scene of operas, and operations
- 34 Emphasis
- 35 A listening device Canute would have found useful (two words, 4 and 4)

DOWN

- 1 Political emblem which stood Sancho Panza in good stead
- 2 Humbug with two trees at the end of it

- 3 Nepotism may prove a boon to him
- 4 May be made to suit a suit
- 6 A beginner with a spotless character?
- 7 Thus mutilated, no wonder the fish shed gore!
- 8 Put up a fight
- 9 This dog is made to show where bones are buried
- 13 Came by wrongfully, or went by furtively
- 14 Late in bed—and the result!
- 15 This sum is of geographical significance
- 19 Not the sort of measures that should be used in the present emergency (hyphen, 4 and 4)
- 21 When Republicans and Democrats see this they will be in perfect agreement (3 words, 3, 2 and 3)
- 23 Provides a sea term, very naturally
- 25 Dog which might be useful in a class room
- 26 Our law-maker's afterthoughts
- 27 Is the free variety most popular in Scotland?
- 28 A snake without shelter in a state of unconsciousness
- 31 A neat arrangement

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 6

ACROSS:—1 HAD EGG; 4 ILLINOIS; 10 REMORSE; 11 VILLAIN; 12 ADAGE; 13 ILL; 14 THIER; 15 NOSH; 17 ARMINIAN; 21 HARRISON; 23 BLEAT; 26 YACRE; 28 OAP; 29 VERRA; 30 GRIMACE; 31 SEGMENT; 32 RENDERED; 33 GENTLY.
DOWN:—1 BARGAINS; 2 DEMAANS; 3 GONGE; 4 LEVEL; 6 ISLET; 7 OCARINA; 8 SENTRY; 9 PELICANS; 10 SIR; 18 MANIFEST; 19 NIB; 20 STEALTHY; 22 AUCTION; 24 EARNEST; 25 ONAGER; 27 ELATE; 28 OBSESS; 29 VAGUE.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Philosopher's Holiday.* By Irwin Edman. Penguin. 25 cents.
- War and Peace in the Pacific.* Issued by the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations. $1.25.
- Formalization of Logic.* By Rudolf Carnap. Harvard. $3.
- Summary of the World Federation Plan: An Outline of a Practical and Detailed Plan for World Settlement.* By Ely Culbertson. Garden City Publishing Company. $1.
- A Mirror for Witches.* By Esther Forbes. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
- Round Trip to Russia.* By Walter Gracner. Lippincott. $3.
- George Washington Carver: An American Biography.* By Rackham Holt. Doubleday, Doran. $3.50.
- Year Book of Labour Statistics, 1942.* International Labor Office. $3.
- The Amazing Petroleum Industry.* By V. A. Kalichevsky. Reinhold Publishing Corporation. $2.25.
- Handbook of Life Insurance.* By R. Wilfred Kelsey and Arthur C. Daniels. Putnam's. $1.
- Maritime: A Historical Sketch.* A Worker's Program. By Frederick J. Lang. Pioneer Publishers. $1.
- Conflicts: Studies in Contemporary History.* By L. B. Namier Macmillan. $2.50.
- Beware of Parents: A Bachelor's Book for Children.* By George Jean Nathan, Farrar and Rinehart. $2.
- Pacific Blackout.* By John McCutcheon Raleigh. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
- Russia.* By Bernard Pares. Penguin. 25 cents.
- Fantastic Interim: A Hindsight History of American Manners, Morals, and Mistakes Between Versailles and Pearl Harbor.* By Henry Morton Robinson. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
- The Tragedy of European Labor, 1918-1939.* By Adolf Sturmthal. Columbia. $3.50.
- Never Again! Ten Years of Hitler: A Symposium.* Edited by Stephen S. Wise. Jewish Opinion Publishing Company. $1.
- Tunis Expedition.* By Colonel Darryl P. Zanuck. Random House. $2.

Summary of the World Federation Plan

By ELY CULBERTSON

Sold only 25¢ for the paper edition, at $1 for the cloth-bound.

Also the Hierarchy Report, complete, for $1. Just published: One World by Wendell Willkie, $1 (Free S. A. postage only).

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

Classified Advertisements

62 cents a line (six words)

Minimum — three lines

$6.16 per inch

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue, New York City
ALgonquin 4-3311

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 10, 1943

NUMBER 15

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Competition for Planes 508
- The Rum! Fiasco 509
- Cost-Plus War at Sea 510
- The Spanish Prisoners by Freda Kirchwey 510

ARTICLES

- Capital Notes by I. F. Stone 512
- Hitler's Last Year of Hope by Peter Saar 513
- "Jap Crow" Experiment by John Larison 517
- 75 Years Ago in The Nation 519
- Rubber from the Farm by Ross L. Holman 520
- Letters from a Pfc 522
- In the Wind 523

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- The Sudetenland Today by F. C. Weisskopf 524
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 528

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Ullstein Papers by Leopold Schwarzschild 529
- Points East by Marcus Duffield 530
- The Historian as Prophet by Reinhold Niebuhr 530
- Print-Makers by James Johnson Sweeney 531
- Assignment in Tokyo by W. L. Holland 532
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 533
- Drama: So Much for Buckingham by Joseph Wood Krutch 534
- Music by B. H. Haggin 534

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

- CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 8 by Jack Barrett 540

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART
Music Critic Drama Critic
B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

THE DISLOCATION OF WORLD TRADE CAUSED by the war must eventually be reflected in the complete breakdown of the international exchanges unless, before the present rigid emergency controls are removed, some new method of stabilizing currencies can be inaugurated. And as Secretary Morgenthau told a combined session of the appropriate Senate committees on April 5, "this formidable task can be successfully handled only through international cooperation." To this end the United States has now issued an invitation to all members of the United Nations to take part in a conference on monetary problems which will meet in the near future. Two major plans, at least, are likely to be discussed by this conference, one British and one American; and while these are being spoken of as "rivals," it seems clear, from the details that have been allowed to leak out, that they have much in common. The American plan, which is understood to have been devised largely by Harry White, the Treasury's director of monetary research, represents a development of the pre-war tripartite agreement between the United States, France, and Britain. Instead of national stabilization funds, with close cooperation between their managers, a single international stabilization fund is proposed. The control of this fund would be in the hands of an international board appointed by the governments of participating nations, with voting power related to the contribution made by each to the required fund. However, no one nation would have more than 25 per cent of the voting power.

✱

SINCE THE PRIMARY OBJECTIVE OF THE PLAN is to eliminate the hazards to trade of wildly fluctuating exchanges, it would be necessary for the participating governments to agree not to engage in competitive depreciation of currencies. The value of currencies would be fixed in terms of gold by directors of the international stabilization fund representing at least four-fifths of the votes, and alterations in the exchange rates could only be made by the same method. The British plan, whose author is Lord Keynes, financial adviser to the British Treasury, carries these ideas a stage farther. It visualizes a world bank or clearing-house which would have a relationship to the national banks of the member countries somewhat similar to that of the Federal Reserve Board to the Federal Reserve banks. It provides for a new world currency—"bancor"—which would be solely a money of account representing a fixed weight of gold. National currencies would be valued in terms of gold and would thus have a definite relation to gold and to each other. The operating funds of the new institution would be contributed by the national banks of each member in the form of gold or national currencies, or both, and each would receive an overdraft limit based on pre-war trade and similar factors. Thus if Britain, for instance, incurred an unfavorable balance of international payments, it could, for a time, finance the difference by means of this overdraft. But if it exceeded the limit it would automatically be called upon by the management of the international bank to adjust its position by surrendering gold, taking steps to check imports, or curbing the flow of external capital payments.

*

NEITHER THE AMERICAN NOR THE BRITISH plan, it is clear, would function at all effectively, any more than the pre-1914 gold-standard system, unless trade policies were adopted that permitted an expanding international exchange of goods. For this reason we welcome the recent speech of Sumner Welles urging a renewal of the Trade Agreements Act before its expiration in June. Even though this measure is a fairly modest contribution to the problem of freeing world trade, its lapse would, as Mr. Welles pointed out, be regarded by other nations as an indication of America's intention to return to economic isolation.

*

THE BATTLE OF INFLATION REACHES ITS crucial stage this week as Congress reconsiders the Bankhead bill in the light of President Roosevelt's stinging veto. Although the bill to exclude government benefit payments from "parity" calculations was originally passed in both houses by large majorities, the President posed the inflation issue so clearly in his veto message that there is a good possibility that at least one of the houses will sustain his action. Mr. Roosevelt did not refer directly to the United Mine Workers' demand for a $2-a-day wage increase, but he intimated that a further increase in the cost of food, such as is inevitable if the Bankhead bill becomes law, would force an abandonment of the Little Steel formula for wages. This would start an "inflationary spiral that would ultimately cancel out whatever gains labor has made" . . . and "make it infinitely harder for the farmer to protect himself from . . . post-war chaos." Congress may, of course, choose to ignore the President's warning and pass the bill over his veto, but if it does so, it will have to take full responsibility before the public for wrecking the President's inflation-control program. And Congress is beginning to realize that by the time 1944 rolls around, the cost of living will transcend all other domestic issues in the mind of the average voter.

*

ALTHOUGH THE NEGOTIATIONS OVER COAL wages have been extended through April, the situation remains filled with explosive possibilities. At the moment the operators are split on how to proceed. With the aid of Federal Conciliator John R. Steelman, the Northern operators are said to be making progress in their negotiations with the United Mine Workers. In the hope of working out a compromise that would not disturb the Little Steel formula, they are reported to be willing to discuss the miners' demand that pay be computed on a portal-to-portal basis instead of the present face-to-face basis. The Southern operators, on the other hand, have refused to negotiate this point and are seeking to have the entire dispute transferred to the National War Labor Board. John L. Lewis's attitude toward the WLB makes such a move at this time of doubtful value. The resignation from the Labor Board last week of Thomas Kennedy, secretary-treasurer of the U. M. W., because of express dissatisfaction with the Little Steel formula suggests that Lewis is prepared to fight the board's handling of the coal dispute. His bitterness will be no less if, as is reported in Washington, Van A. Bittner, whom Lewis ousted as a member of the U. M. W., is appointed to succeed Mr. Kennedy on the board. The best chance for a peaceful settlement of the controversy seems to lie in giving Mr. Steelman firm support in his efforts to negotiate a compromise.

*

IN A SPEECH AT READING ADOLF A. BERLE, Assistant Secretary of State, declared that "the idea of a buffer state is as dead as a dodo." We agree, but we still want to know why the odor of the corpse hangs so persistently around the corridors of State. And while we are glad to have Mr. Berle go on record as an opponent of the cordon sanitaire policy we propose to keep our fingers crossed until we learn that Hapsburg, Eckhardt, and emissaries of Catholic reaction have become personae non gratae at the State Department. In attacking the unkind people who have criticized recent developments in American foreign policy, Mr. Berle used the common and shabby rhetorical device of bracketing together as "meddlers or loose thinkers or plain liars" those who have attacked public officials both as too friendly toward Russia and as not friendly enough. This shows ingratitude toward the Russophobes who have consistently praised every reactionary move by the State Department, while it is unfair to those who have stood fast against attempting to wage a war against fascism by encouraging fascists. The evidence is all too clear that some high officials in the State Department have at least been toying with the idea of creating a Central European bloc which can be relied upon to keep the Continent safe from bolshevism. We have always thought this the surest way of driving all Europe to communism. If Mr. Berle has now grasped this fact we will acclaim his return to realism. But we await stronger evidence than one speech.

✱

ONE SALUTARY ACTION WHICH WOULD HELP us to believe that Mr. Berle means what he says would be a reorganization of the hitherto unpublishized Inter-departmental Committee for Nationality Problems, of which he is the head. The function of this committee is to handle relations with foreign groups in this country, and it is presumably responsible for some of the odd choices which the State Department has made in dealing with such groups. Its work is secret and confidential, and its secretary is a Miss Rebecca G. Wellington. Miss Wellington is listed in the State Department Register for 1942 as having been private and social secretary to the German embassy from 1928 to 1939, to the Italian embassy from 1933 to 1939, and to the Finnish legation from 1939 to 1941. She was also social secretary to Mrs. Evalyn Walsh McLean and entered the employ of the State Department six days after Pearl Harbor at $2,600. A Washington society reporter defended the State Department appointment on the ground that Miss Wellington had long experience in "dealing with foreigners." Long experience in helping to make Nazis and Fascists socially successful hardly seems the proper background for dealing with Austrian Socialists or Czech democrats.

✱

SEVERAL WEEKS AGO WE EXPRESSED THE view that while the Soviet government was responsible for having outraged public opinion by the execution of Alter and Ehrlich, it was well to remember that "the enemy in this war is still the international fascist conspiracy headed by Adolf Hitler," that it would be well, as it were, to keep our eye on the ball. That is still our belief, and we think that no good purpose is served at this moment in history by rehearsing the grim details at mass-meetings and in newspaper advertisements. It is hard to maintain this perspective, however, in the kind of atmosphere generated by our domestic Communists. Not content with Ambassador Litvinov's vague explanation, Earl Browder, though admitting that "we do not know upon what evidence a Soviet court convicted Ehrlich and Alter," proceeds, like Pooh Bah, to add "corroborative detail intended to lend verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative." In the allegedly subversive acts of the two veteran Socialists he sees "a conspiratorial effort of American citizens, organized on American soil, to overthrow the government of the Soviet Union." The two principals in the case, outstanding leaders in the struggle against Hitler, are branded "pro-Nazis," and American labor leaders who, like James Carey, expressed their resentment of the executions are accused of stabbing the Red Army in the back, a charge that will do little to further unity on the trade-union front.

✱

ACTUALLY THE COMMUNISTS NEED LOSE little sleep over Mr. Browder's fear that "the hullabaloo about Ehrlich and Alter . . . is part of the preparation for what Vice-President Wallace warned against as a 'double-cross' of the Soviet Union." If the Scripps-Howard papers grow maudlin over the two Socialists, the executions have won the Soviets such new friends as Representative Rankin of Mississippi. "I think I am justified," he told the House in reference to the Ehrlich-Alter affair, "in calling attention to some of the Jewish propaganda that is being used in this country to stir up trouble between us and Russia." Passing easily beyond the bounds of Congressional decorum, Rankin assailed "the Jewish gentleman from New York" (Representative Celler) for not having exposed PM and other publications that did not share the Browder-Rankin view of the "two Jewish agitators." Stalin's stature has increased immeasurably in the mind of this Southern primitive. "In other words, as Eddie Rickenbacker said the other day," he expounded to the House, "communism has left Russia. When this war is over, those Russian soldiers will go back and be permitted to own their own homes, own their own land, and to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience." The Soviets should not be held responsible for the antics of the un-Christian gentleman from Mississippi, but his speech in the House indicates how much aid and comfort has been afforded the most natural double-crossers of the Soviet Union by this particular piece of Soviet justice.

✱

THE SLOGAN "EQUAL RIGHTS FOR WOMEN" has a fine sound, but we are convinced that the Equal Rights Amendment, which has been favorably recommended to the judiciary committees of both houses of Congress, would lower rather than raise the status of women, particularly in industry. It would provide a perfect instrument for breaking down the protective legislation which has been painfully built up in the several states; these laws may be "discriminatory," but we doubt that working women consider such regulations invasions of their "rights." So simple and sweeping an amendment would create great confusion and give rise to endless litigation in both state and federal courts; it would not accomplish its avowed purpose. We think it particularly unwise to press such an amendment at a time when, in the name of the war effort, there is a strong tendency to reduce the standards and safeguards of workers in general.

EUROPE'S REMAINING 5,000,000 JEWS ARE dying at an ever-accelerating rate, but the United States government still neglects to take the most elementary steps in their behalf. A month ago we were assured that the executive committee of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees would soon meet in Ottawa to undertake a "preliminary exploration" of the problem. But like many promises in the past, the announcement has not materialized. Moreover, as Representative Celler recently pointed out, the State Department continues its "glacier-like attitude" toward the few anti-Nazi refugees that have reached our shores. The indorsement of reputable relief agencies is of little weight in helping refugees to gain sanctuary within our gates. Nothing whatever has been done to facilitate the possible emigration of Jews in Hitler-occupied Europe to temporary asylums in Allied or neutral countries, to open havens in Latin America, or otherwise to carry out the moderate program set up at the March 1 mass-meeting in New York. We approve of the efforts now being made to assure universal freedom and justice in the post-war world, but it is intolerable that our State Department should let millions die while it concerns itself with these distant goals.

Competition for Planes

ALTHOUGH one still hears complaints that the American High Command is not sufficiently "air-minded," it is clear that in all theaters where our forces are engaged the plane is playing an ever-greater part. In all his victories, including the latest, Montgomery's tactics have been based on intensive use of air bombing and strafing both as a preliminary to attack and in pursuit, and he has acknowledged that the cooperation he has received from American and British fliers has been "superb." At the same time the strategic bombing force in North Africa under the command of General Doolittle has been systematically pounding the enemy's distant bases—as in the two recent mass raids on Sardinia and Naples—and ceaselessly harrying his communications. And apart from their immediate influence on operations, these activities are paving the way for future invasions of Europe.

Similarly, the ever-heavier attacks being made on Germany and the occupied countries by the R. A. F. and the American Eighth Air Force are serving more than one purpose. Their main object is to weaken the enemy economically and thus to prepare the way for an assault on the "fortress" which he boasts is impregnable. But they also ease the load on other fronts by keeping an important fraction of the Luftwaffe pinned down in the west. Finally, constant raids have an effect on German morale which, while difficult to measure, cannot be left out of account.

In the Pacific, too, the plane is playing a major role in the aggressive defensive which General MacArthur and Admiral Halsey are waging to the discomfiture of Japanese hopes. In the New Guinea campaign General MacArthur, lacking naval support, has relied on his fliers to block enemy efforts to supply and reinforce their ground troops, and again and again they have succeeded brilliantly. The Battle of the Bismarck Sea was not only one of the decisive victories of air history but impressive proof of the helplessness of a surface force in narrow waters against a determined attack made by land-based planes.

With our airmen so busily and usefully engaged all over the world, it is not surprising that there should be competition for new machines between the different fronts. It is no secret that the high officers from the Pacific theater who gathered in Washington recently for a conference with the joint General Staff were particularly intent on arguing their need for more planes. One of MacArthur's generals has been quoted by Barry Faris of the International News Service as saying: "Give us the equivalent of just two days' production of planes a month, 7 per cent of our total output, and I guarantee we can blast a path through to Tokyo. But give those little so-and-so's another year like the one just past . . . and the job of licking them will be monumental."

It is easy to sympathize with the men who have accomplished so much with such limited means in their desire for more and better tools to exploit their victories. But their cause has not been helped by the newspapers of the Hearst-McCormick axis, which have insisted on making this a political issue. The policy of beating Hitler first has been definitely agreed upon between us and our allies, and there is no doubt that it is the correct one. Germany is basically immensely stronger than Japan, but it has become vulnerable to an early concerted attack through its exhausting attempts to conquer Russia. On the other hand, it is capable of rapid recuperation if the pressure is relaxed and Hitler is given an opportunity to organize the territories he has conquered. Even now we cannot match Germany in armed man-power, but we can overwhelm it with equipment, and particularly planes, provided we resist the temptation to disperse our striking power.

The idea that Japan can also dig in, if subjected merely to "holding" attacks for a period, is open to question. True, Japan has won immense supplies of basic raw materials, but it still remains a second-rate industrial power. Years not months would be required to overcome that handicap, and meanwhile there is a good deal of evidence that it is suffering from a shortage of ships, without which the treasures of its far-flung "empire" will be of little use. It has been reported recently that Japan has concentrated large numbers of planes in islands to the north of Australia, but they have not been very much in evidence, and it is doubtful whether its productive capacity in this department is able to do more than keep pace with its losses. Moreover, according to General Kenney, MacArthur's air commander, the quality of Japanese pilots has deteriorated. "Their highly skilled first-string team is gone," he told a reporter, "while our first team is just beginning to get into line."

There has been much talk lately of Japanese activities in the islands dotting the Timor Sea, and fears have been expressed that these may become bases for an attack on Australia. We would hesitate to say that this was impossible, but we regard it as unlikely, and even if the Japanese succeeded in invading northern Australia, they would still be many hundreds of miles from any vital objective. Nor are we much impressed by the theory that, by allowing the Japanese to fortify their conquered islands undisturbed, we are committing ourselves to a long, painful, and costly process of reconquest. Eventually, we suspect, Japan will be beaten by an immense Allied naval concentration in the Pacific, including dozens of carriers, in combination with a land offensive in China. By maintaining the line in the southern Pacific until the defeat of Hitler frees the necessary naval forces, General MacArthur and Admiral Halsey are playing a vital role, and we hope some aerial reinforcements can be spared to them. But unless the threat to their positions can be demonstrated to be more dangerous than it appears at present, we suspect they will have to make do with a priority second to Europe and, perhaps, to the China-Burma theater as well.

The Ruml Fiasco

AFTER giving the Ruml plan a well-deserved trouncing on the House floor, the Democratic majority in Congress has apparently decided to rest on its laurels. Chairman Doughton of the Ways and Means Committee has declared that it will be May or June before his committee is prepared to take up the subject of taxes again. There is talk of a two weeks' Easter vacation for the legislators, who might as well not have convened so far as their most vital job—raising revenue to pay for the war—is concerned. In view of Congressional apathy, Secretary Morgenthau has expressed serious doubt as to whether a withholding tax can be put into operation before 1944.

A large section of the press, particularly in New York City, has sought to lay the responsibility for the whole tax fiasco on the Administration, declaring that if the Treasury had not opposed the Ruml plan we should now have a pay-as-you-go tax system on the statute books. This is disingenuous, but if it were true we should be grateful to the Administration for blocking a plan that would have precipitated a buying spree and thereby wrought havoc with the entire anti-inflation program. The truth, as a reading of the newspaper comment during the weeks before the House vote will readily disclose, is that the tremendous build-up given the Ruml plan was responsible for diverting both public and Congressional attention from the necessity for an immediate and substantial increase in revenue. The need for additional revenue, and not the dubious value of putting taxes on a current basis, is the primary reason why an effective plan for collecting taxes at the source must be set up as quickly as possible. Advocates of the Ruml plan deliberately sought to give the impression that their plan and theirs alone would accomplish this objective. Actually, the Ways and Means Committee bill, feeble though it was, provided the same withholding tax as the Carlson bill and had the additional advantage of offering an inducement for prepayment of taxes.

Now that the Ruml plan has been defeated, it is to be hoped that the press will drop the extraneous issue of tax forgiveness and help focus public attention on the urgency of increasing taxes as a means of controlling inflation. This has been the main issue from the beginning, and it is not a matter that will wait "until May or June." The danger of a runaway inflation grows daily. It may be seen in the increased pressure of labor for higher wages, of the farm bloc for higher agricultural prices, and of the consumer for protection against infringement of price ceilings. The growth of the black markets is a direct reflection of our failure to come to grips with the problem of excess spending power, an excess which a recent OPA study shows to be concentrated almost entirely among families in the income-tax-paying brackets.

A general increase in tax rates that would not go into effect until January 1, 1944, and would not influence tax collections before next March 15 obviously is not going to be of much use in curbing the huge excess spending power already in people's hands. A withholding tax that starts on July 1 at the latest is the only feasible plan for meeting the problem directly. Since both Democrats and Republicans have agreed on the necessity for such a tax, there can be no excuse for further procrastination. The question whether the tax should be credited against 1942 or 1943 incomes is wholly unimportant. Preferably the withholding tax should be graduated, so as to permit more than 20 per cent collections from the higher income groups. And a method should be worked out for applying the pay-as-you-go principle to interest and dividends as well as to wages and salaries. But refinements of this sort may have to be sacrificed in the interest of getting a collection-at-the-source system in operation at the earliest possible moment. Far too much time has already been lost. Neither party considerations nor technicalities should be allowed to stand in the way of immediate action.

Cost-Plus War at Sea

THE lie that members of the National Maritime Union refused to unload ships at Guadalcanal was given wide circulation. It will be interesting to see how much attention is accorded the report submitted to Senator Downey of California by President Philip Murray of the C. I. O. This report was made on behalf of the National Maritime Union, the International Longshoremen and Warehousemen, the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, and the American Communications Commission. It gives in detail a long list of cases of mismanagement and inefficiency in the handling of ships and cargoes. The report was made public after repeated attempts in private to get action on these cases from the War Shipping Administration. The effort was unsuccessful, perhaps because the cases reflect on the WSA, the great shipping companies, and the profitable but wasteful practice of carrying on the war at sea on a cost-plus basis.

Though the Guadalcanal story was made up out of whole cloth by an employee of the Brewster Aeronautical Corporation and has been disowned by the Navy Department, there is a somewhat similar case in the C. I. O. report. If true, it reflects on a shipping company and a commanding officer rather than on labor. "A ship lay 100 days in the South Pacific," the report says, "during which time crew members were not permitted to help unload the ship by order of the shipping operators. A crew delegation went ashore and told the United States army major in charge of the port that they had volunteered their work in unloading, without extra compensation, and that their offer was rejected. The major welcomed their offer, but they were still not allowed to work." This should be read in connection with another statement in the report. "At Southwest Pacific ports ships unloading dump tons of trucks, guns, ammunition, and supplies into the sea. The fighting men in the services ashore make jokes about swimming out and diving down to get these supplies." These stories have implications so shocking that we should expect the War Shipping Administration and the shipping companies to join with Senator Downey in his demand that the Truman committee and the Senate Commerce Committee investigate.

Luxury cargoes, according to the report, are still being carried in the Pacific, and ships that could carry goods carry ballast. "Private shipping operators," the C. I. O. charges, "through cost-plus contracts, prefer slow and inefficient methods of cargo handling and ship operation inasmuch as greater profit accrues to them." There is inadequate training of new seamen. Survivors of torpedoed ships are poorly treated. Radio communications are inadequate, and ships often miss submarine warnings and distress signals because they carry only one radio officer and thus have no twenty-four-hour radio watch.

Most tragic of all are the charges that the report makes as to the handling of shipments from West Coast ports to the Soviet Union. In one West Coast port area, though 250,000 tons of lend-lease cargo awaited shipment on the docks, hundreds of skilled longshoremen stood idly by for two days before being-given orders to load. At the height of the Soviet winter offensive, according to the C. I. O., while hundreds of thousands of tons of cargo for the Russians lay on the docks, shipments were handled at a rate of 50,000 tons a month when facilities could have handled 200,000 tons. "At the same time," the report says, "as many as ten old ships were awaiting repairs in the same port. These were formerly owned by United States shipping companies and turned over to the Russians, and new ships given to the shipping companies." A new 10,000-ton Liberty ship costs $1,600,000. Repairs on the old ones cost from $500,000 to $1,250,000 a ship and took weeks of work but were still insufficient to enable them to carry heavy cargoes. There has been no more disgusting set of revelations in this war. We join the C. I. O. in demanding a full investigation, with punishment of the greedy interests and complaisant WSA officials responsible.

The Spanish Prisoners

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

SPANISH Republicans, meeting this past Monday in New York at Carnegie Hall, asked our government for the release of the thousands of Spanish refugees and ex-soldiers still imprisoned in North Africa. For the first time since the Spanish War every faction and political tendency joined in this demonstration, and their plea was echoed from Mexico and Cuba and all over South America. From Mexico, in particular, came a message of solidarity signed by leaders of every important group from the Basque Catholics and the right Republicans to the Communists. The plight of the prisoners, whose physical sufferings have been described by many observers returning from North Africa, has stirred to bitter protest their fellow-countrymen in exile in the Americas. That these men are still in filthy concentration camps long after the political prisoners of every other nationality have been released—five months after President Roosevelt promised the release of all anti-fascist prisoners—is an outrage that no Spanish-speaking people could be expected to ignore.

But for Americans it holds an even more serious meaning. The Loyalists in North Africa are not accidental left-overs of a system that has slowly been liquidated. These men are held precisely because they are Spaniards—Spanish anti-fascists. They are not merely men who fought against Hitler and Mussolini while the United States and Britain were trying to appease the dictators. Today we are fighting Hitler and Mussolini ourselves; so that crime could presumably be forgiven. But they are the enemies, the tough and steadfast enemies, of the miserable little dictator who is held in power in Spain by the joint support of Nazi arms and American food and oil. That is their real offense. And so, just as they were kept in prison for Franco's benefit by Hitler's orders during the Vichy era in North Africa, they are today kept in prison for Franco's benefit by American orders.

This is a fact—ugly and undeniable—which Spaniards may politely ignore but which Americans must face: because the American government and also the British government are trying to buy the favors of the fascist dictator of Spain, 5,000 or 20,000 Spanish Republicans—even the number is in dispute—are suffering in prison camps in Africa. It is not a pretty fact to have to face. It would be pleasanter to pretend that the fate of those men was due to confusion and inefficiency or the ill-will of French officials. Pleasanter, but wholly unrealistic. They could and would be released tomorrow if the United States said they should be released.

The treatment of the Spanish prisoners in North Africa by the American government is a replica on a small scale of the treatment of the Spanish Republic by the American government in 1936 and 1937 and 1938. Like Spain itself, these men are a living sacrifice on the altar of the fascist war lords—only this time the particular god to be appeased is the smallest of the lot, with neither the will nor the freedom to bestow the favors this great government has demeaned itself to ask. And so Americans must demand the freedom of the Spanish prisoners, partly as an act of justice, but far more as a political act—as a guaranty of the end of a policy of shameful connivance with the Franco regime—with forces that hate and openly condemn every purpose for which this war is being fought.

P.S.: As we go to press the Joint Commission for Political Refugees in North Africa has announced that arrangements have been made to free most political prisoners. Encouraging announcements have been made before. If this one turns out to be true, it will be due largely to the powerful movement throughout Latin America in behalf of the Spaniards—a movement which has made a profound impression in Allied circles.

WHAT ABOUT US?

Capital Notes

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 4

DAFFIEST bit of Washington correspondence in a long time was a Chicago Tribune story from the capital which was also carried here last week by Cissie Patterson's Times-Herald. The dispatch, by Walter Trohan, quoted "word . . . from the underground of patriots" in occupied Europe that American short-wave propaganda "extolling the Soviets" was hurting the Allied cause. American broadcasts, according to the Chicago Tribune's secret underground sources, confirmed Nazi propaganda "that Britain has betrayed the small nations into the hands of the Bolsheviks and that the deal has been made with the consent of the United States." The broadcasts, as a result, were "increasing the efficiency of so-called slave labor in German industry. In deciding to throw in their lot with the Nazis as against the Reds," Trohan reports, straight from the underground, "many captive workers no longer attempt to delay production." Note the phrase "so-called." OWI sources declare that short-wave broadcasts about the Soviet Union have been objective news reports, but these reports in recent months, of course, have consistently told of victories. Perhaps the Chicago Tribune thinks it would encourage the underground more if we spread word that Hitler was winning.

When the history of this period comes to be written, I believe it will be found that the State Department and not North African influence was largely responsible for the abrogation of the Cremieux decree of 1870, which conferred French citizenship on the Jews of Algeria. I do not know who the "unbiased specialist" was whom Under Secretary Welles quoted in his letter to Baron Edouard de Rothschild, but the State Department "specialist" with whom I discussed the problem several months ago was extraordinarily vague and flighty on his facts and reflected the anxiety of some forces within the department to find an excuse for abrogating the Cremieux decree.

The European division of the department, which has always been pro-Franco and anti-Soviet, is also streaked with anti-Semitism, and in the case of the Cremieux decree seem to have maneuvered the Under Secretary, who is above the State Department average, into being its spokesman. A. A. Berle, Jr., is one of those who have opposed sending a Jew to North Africa lest it "offend the Arabs" (on the same principle one ought also to object to sending a Christian). But the people who show such consideration for the supposed susceptibilities of the Arabs were also the ones who supported the appointment of Peyrouton as Governor General of Algeria, though Peyrouton's previous service as Governor General of Tunisia had made his name synonymous with persecution of Arab nationalism.

Representatives Warren G. Magnuson and John M. Coffee of Washington are forming a group of progressive members of the House to take up with the War Department charges made by the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. Two veterans who fought in Spain with the brigade have distinguished themselves in New Guinea, where one was decorated with the Distinguished Service Cross by General MacArthur. Five hundred members of the brigade are in the American armed forces, and three hundred more are in the merchant marine, where eight have lost their lives. There are branches of the government which realize that the experience of these men in Spain makes them of particular value—I can say no more—in some of the military tasks ahead of us. But the brigade claims that there have been many cases of discrimination against veterans of the Spanish War, some of whom have been barred from combat duty and from advancement. One of the men the brigade declares was barred from combat service is John Gates, now a sergeant in the United States Army. Vincent Sheean and Herbert Matthews have written of the courage and skill in combat Gates showed in Spain as morale officer of the Fifteenth International Brigade.

It takes a little while to catch on to the extent to which Washington is a Jim Crow town. Although the Negro press reaches 4,000,000 readers every week, its correspondents are barred from the House and Senate press galleries and from White House press conferences. The Washington correspondents, though as likable and pleasant a crowd as one can meet anywhere, are dominated in this respect by Southern mores. I came up against this myself the other day—if I may be forgiven a personal note—when I asked William H. Hastie to lunch. I had never met the Judge before and wanted to talk with him of his experiences in the War Department, where he had served for two years as civilian aide to Secretary Stimson. Judge Hastie is a Negro, and on inquiry I found that the only place I could take a Negro to lunch was the Union Station. I strongly disliked the idea of being forced to take a man of his distinction to a counter in a railroad station, and asked his permission to invite him to be my guest at the National Press Club. Judge Hastie is not one of those members of a minority who, having achieved some position in the world, prefer to shut their eyes to the wrongs of their fellows rather than endanger that standing. He has picketed drugstores here which refused to hire Negroes, and he was as willing as I to run the risk of some possible embarrassment.

It seems that this was the first time in the history of the club that anyone had ever taken a Negro there to lunch. Elmer Davis was addressing a special luncheon in the auditorium that day; so we got a table before anyone seemed to realize what had happened. A moment after we were seated, a page told me I was wanted on the telephone. In the hall I found that this was a ruse. The manager asked me if that was a colored man with me. I said it was. He declared that we would not be served. I said that as a member of the club I insisted on service for my guest and went back to the table. There we sat unserved until two o'clock, when we left for a Chinese restaurant.

The Judge, besides being the least stuffy of individuals and a thoroughly swell guy, is at least as cultivated as some of the third-rate advertising men and fourth-rate politicians who belong to the club. He is a Harvard Law School graduate, dean of Howard University Law School, a former member of the federal judiciary in the Virgin Islands, and has just won the Spingarn medal for 1942. Under the constitution of the club special meetings must be called on petition of twenty-five members. I managed to obtain nine signatures, and a diverse collection of arguments from well-meaning people who agreed with me but. . . . Some people think the punctilio governing a supposed "private club" more important than elementary considerations of human decency. I resigned from the club.

Hitler's Last Year of Hope

BY PETER SAAR

THE German High Command's concept of the strategy that would promise success to the Reich was the same in 1914 as it was in 1939. It called for a surprise attack of overpowering force, preservation of the initiative, and a campaign of brief duration ending with a total victory for German arms. A blitzkrieg is indeed the only strategy adapted to the geographic, economic, and military situation of Germany.

In 1914 the German troops went into battle in the belief that they would be home again in a few weeks. France's mobilization had not been completed, and French soil was occupied as if it were a field of maneuver. The rapid forward thrust got as far as the Marne. There, in September of the first year of war, General Joffre brought the German offensive to a halt. The battle of the Marne has understandably assumed legendary proportions in both Germany and France, for it decided the First World War. The Marne miracle enabled France, with the aid of its allies, to gird for the final struggle, which lasted another fifty months.

The Second World War started out like the First. Who in Germany would even remotely have thought of defeat in June, 1940? France had been overrun, and to every German the conquest of England seemed a matter of weeks. But two years later the Reich again faced the fateful dilemma from which Hitler thought his military and political preparations had saved it.

The compulsion to wage a ruthless campaign with quick and decisive victories presents the German General Staff with a clearly outlined dual task: (1) the destruction of enemy power, that is, of the enemy's fighting forces; (2) the occupation of enemy bases for armament and supply. If these two objectives cannot be attained in the first onslaught, if, after overcoming the element of surprise, the opponent has time and opportunity to reinforce and regroup his armies, to secure their supply, and to mobilize allies, then the Reich has only the choice between immediate capitulation and a protracted war of attrition. Choice of the latter leaves but one chance of victory for Germany—the undermining of the enemy's morale, the collapse of his home front. It is no longer a problem in strategy; it is a matter of speculation.

A war of attrition forces Germany constantly to conquer new supply bases for the ever-growing needs of that war. But every such move reduces its man-power reserves; so that in the event of a prolonged war and superior enemy strategy, the moment must come when the Reich no longer has enough hands to hold and utilize what it has conquered.

When in the second half of October, 1918, discussion in Imperial German headquarters revolved around the question whether the Ukraine could be given up and the last divisions left there sent to the west, General Ludendorff warned: "The Supreme Command, with the agreement of the government, marched into the Ukraine because we needed the region for the implementation of our economy. . . . If we withdraw, the situation of our war industry will gravely deteriorate. One could in any event have foreseen that if we were to emerge from this war with our present frontiers, we would be in a much worse position than before both militarily and industrially."

The National Socialist government finds itself in the fourth year of World War II in the same spot. After enumerating the large territorial gains made last summer, Hitler, in his speech of September 30, said that "after all, we are not interested in telling only how many thousands of kilometers we marched. We were mainly interested in obtaining the great space for the purpose of rendering it usable for our warfare." This confession makes wholly understandable the desperate effort Germany is now making to keep the Ukraine and the Donets Basin.

Despite its overwhelming initial successes the German High Command did not attain the two major objectives of its war planning either in 1914 or in 1941. In both instances, however, it was capable, in a later phase of the war, of speculating along the lines described above.

The very costly German spring offensives on the western front in March and May, 1918, did not bring the expected victory. But the Allies, too, suffered heavy losses in men and matériel. Intelligence reports of increasing war weariness in the ranks of the Entente determined the German High Command to attempt a decisive blow in the west in order to bring the war to a successful conclusion. According to the estimate of the General Staff, Germany's 205 divisions on the western front in the spring of 1918 still exceeded the Allied forces by about twenty to twenty-five divisions. To be sure, the heavy casualties suffered in the May offensive had reduced the German battalions from 800 to about 700 men. Yet the use of all available reserves, including Austro-Hungarian units, and the withdrawal of all but twelve divisions from the east were depended upon to decide the final battle in Germany's favor.

When the offensive was launched on July 15, Imperial headquarters were confident that they would coerce the enemy into making peace this time. General Ludendorff, the brains of the German General Staff, albeit overshadowed by von Hindenburg, openly expressed this conviction in a talk with Foreign Secretary von Hintze. In reply to the direct and official question of the Foreign Secretary whether Ludendorff was certain that this offensive could definitely vanquish the enemy, and for good, the General declared: "I can answer this question with a definite yes!" But the Germans found themselves unable to withstand the large-scale use of tanks and the intervention of fresh American troops. On August 8 the British pierced the German lines in northern France and overwhelmed six to seven German divisions within a few hours. The offensive force of the German army was from then on definitely broken. In a headquarters staff talk on August 14 Field Marshal von Hindenburg, in the presence of the Kaiser, defined the military situation by saying: "We can no longer hope to break the enemy's will to war by military operations. Our conduct of the war must set as its goal the paralysis of that will by a strategic defensive."

Von Hindenburg's strategic defensive proved only too soon to be a makeshift, not a solution. The rapid exhaustion of its man-power reserves caused the German High Command as early as the beginning of September to suggest to the government that it seek a neutral peace mediator. By the end of September the size of the German battalions had shrunk to about 540 men. In those days Ludendorff admitted to a representative of the German Foreign Ministry: "I feel like a gambler; at any time a division might fall somewhere." On November 11 Germany was forced to lay down its arms—"unvanquished in the field," as the generals hastened to emphasize, but drained of all blood nevertheless; 2,000,000 Germans out of a total of 13,250,000 mobilized in the course of fifty-two months of war covered the battlefields of three continents. This was 15.1 per cent of the German effectives, and did not include prisoners or those incapacitated by wounds or disease. The man-power reserves of the Second Reich had been used up.

When the present war broke out, the National Socialist Third Reich, including Austria and the Sudeten regions, numbered 79,000,000 people, 40,000,000 of whom, more than half, were men. Of these men, 27,000,000 were between sixteen and sixty-five, that is, they belonged to the age class that the Germany of today considers able-bodied. The draft laws of 1935 provided also for national service for women. When the war broke out, Germany had about 17,000,000 women between seventeen and forty-five, the age group regarded as able-bodied. Any calculation of German man-power reserves must therefore be based on this figure of 44,000,000 men and women able to work or do military service. How many can the Reich mobilize from this reservoir in the fourth year of war for its great spring offensive on the fighting and labor fronts?

The peace strength of the Nazi armies was about 1,500,000 men, including military police; this force was divided into twelve army corps and thirty-six divisions. To bring this nucleus up to war-time strength the German High Command had about 17,000,000 men of draft age, between eighteen and forty-five, theoretically available in September, 1939. Actually, of course, the group available for immediate army duty was a relatively small fraction of the total.

According to the conditions of the Versailles treaty, Germany was permitted to maintain a standing army of 100,000 men only. Since the Reichswehr, in accordance with the treaty regulations, consisted of professional soldiers with long-term service contracts, the age classes between 1901 and 1917 were excluded from military service. These fifteen age classes comprised approximately 10,000,000 men, or nearly 60 per cent of all those of draft age. Of the remaining 7,000,000 trained men of draft age, 2,500,000 were between thirty-nine and forty-five—the youngest active age classes from the last World War. The other 4,500,000 were made up of young men between eighteen and twenty-two, who had been trained since compulsory military service had been reintroduced, and of subsequent age classes trained within the framework of the available cadres. Thus in the first half of the war the burden of military duty lay on the shoulders of the young men between eighteen and twenty-eight, who had been trained since 1935, and on those of "old" World War veterans between thirty-nine and forty-five. The gigantic production of war materials, on the other hand, was the task of the thirty-to-forty-year-olds. It was an almost ideal state of affairs.

The loss of labor on the production front caused by mobilization was comparatively easy to meet. Working hours were increased, foreign workers and women were hired, war prisoners were put to work; the growing number of forced laborers dispatched to Germany from the occupied regions also helped to replace the men at the fronts. In addition, the economic systems of the occupied or German-controlled countries were harnessed in growing measure for the needs of the Reich; so that in the second year of war the German productive capacity was even increased.

This state of affairs permitted Adolf Hitler to utilize to the full the lull in the fighting between the collapse of France and the invasion of Russia, a lull that lasted precisely twelve months. Apart from the prodigious accumulation of war materials, this period brought a considerable increment to the Reich's fighting reserves. The large-scale temporary furloughs given to soldiers of the advanced age classes to permit them to work in industry notably accelerated the recruiting drive. Thus prepared, the Führer launched his campaign in the east.

The intended blitzkrieg against the Red Army and the anticipated occupation of vast regions forced the German.

INTERVAL
FOR 20 odd YEARS of STAGNATION UNEMPLOYMENT MISERY & CHAOS ENDING IN WORLD WAR II

WHAT, AGAIN ?

High Command to mobilize on a much larger scale than heretofore. One may estimate the number of German soldiers under arms in June, 1941, at 8,000,000—nearly half of all available men between eighteen and forty-five. This tangible weakening of German productive strength could be only insufficiently balanced by the above-mentioned labor-recruiting measures. But it was hoped such a situation would be temporary, lasting only during a comparatively brief campaign. The unexpected ferocity and prolongation of the Russian war upset the calculations of the Nazi General Staff.

If we assume the probable mobilization of 70 per cent of all men between seventeen and fifty-five for military duty at the front or at home—in World War I Germany mobilized 65 per cent of its active male population—then Germany would be in a position, on the basis of its population in 1939, to mobilize an army of 16,000,000. Huge as this figure may seem, it loses its threat on closer scrutiny. Let us be liberal and assume that 90 per cent of the age classes that can be considered for modern front-line service, the men between seventeen and forty, could be mobilized. When war broke out, Germany had about 13,500,000 men in these age classes. Let us place the losses of this group, the only one used at the front, at only 2,500,000 men dead or captured or permanently incapacitated. One of the Allied staffs in London recently estimated the number of permanently incapacitated alone at about 2,000,000. But a large proportion of these incapacitated can again be used in production, where they will release other men for active service. Thus they cannot be considered an absolute loss of man-power.

So there remain, after deduction of losses of 2,500,000, 11,000,000 able-bodied men for front-line service. From this number must be deducted the indispensable forces of such organizations as the Waffen-S. S., the S. S. Verfügungstruppen (garrison Elite Guards), the Gestapo, the Nazi Party machinery, and the general-security police, which are taken from the same age groups; these must be put at 2,500,000 men at least. The Nazis have therefore, carefully estimated, about 8,500,000 men who could be used as front-line fighters. Eight and a half million men for the front and two and a half million for service at home and in the occupied countries—this is the strongest army the Reich can still muster against its external enemies if it exploits its man-power reserves to the limit, and many of these require a training period of at least six to eight weeks. If we add to this figure 4,000,000 that could be mobilized in Italy and the other satellite countries, we reach a total of 13,000,000 men with whom Adolf Hitler can confront the United Nations in the final battle.

Then there is the equally gigantic task of equipping and supplying such an army, for which additional millions of men are needed. Estimates put the number of men at present working in German mines, arms factories, and other vital fields of industry at 10,000,000. The number employed by the government, the railroads, and the post office is set at 4,000,000. It appears that a nucleus of 14,000,000 men of German nationality is indispensable for the maintenance of the industrial war machine and the administrative and communications set-up.

The mobilization of a German army numbering at present 11,000,000 effectives would leave to the Reich 11,000,000 male workers between fifteen and sixty-five. Since these masses include a considerable number of people whose working capacity is either not fully developed (fifteen- and sixteen-year-olds) or already lessened (fifty-to-sixty-five-year-olds), their total productive capacity can hardly be evaluated at more than 70 per cent of the performance of the same number of normal male workers; especially if one considers the long hours and the stringent living conditions of war time. That means that the 11,000,000 men still available can do the work of 7,500,000 to 8,000,000 men at best. And this estimate does not include the normal reduction in performance due to lack of skill and experience, increased accident rates, and passive resistance.

If we deduct from the labor force about 1,000,000 persons needed to maintain health, youth, and professional training and other experts indispensable or irreplaceable at short notice, persons who are essential to the maintenance of the physical and moral stamina of a "fighting and working community," then the government of the Reich retains barely 7,000,000 to meet requirements calling for 14,000,000. Even if it were possible to make up the needed 7,000,000 by increasing by another 4,000,000 the army of foreign workers, which now stands at 6,000,000, and by mobilizing another 3,000,000 women, in addition to the 3,000,000 already working in industry, the German man-power situation would still remain extremely tenuous. And every day of battle taxes it further, without hope of relief.

When Adolf Hitler, in order to banish memories of the horrors of the preceding winter in Russia, announced his "very simple program" for the fourth year of war, he summarized the essence of his modified strategy in these words: "We must hold everything and must wait to see who tires soonest." That was a new note for Hitler, although it was old for Germany. It was simply a new version of Hindenburg's defensive strategy of the last hours of the Second Reich. But Adolf Hitler knows that he cannot wait for the exhaustion of his enemies today. He must act. In the preamble of the latest mobilization order "the speedy attainment of victory" is designated as the paramount goal of the war. What the Imperial General Staff could not achieve in 1918—win the war before American armies landed on the Continent—the Nazi High Command is trying to force at all costs in 1943. Under Hitler's leadership the Reich will start its final spurt six months earlier than Germany did in 1918 and thus at a relatively more advantageous moment. The Nazis are more determined than ever to fight to the limit. And despite their dilemma, they are still strong enough to set far goals for themselves.

The task of the Allies in this situation is evident. It found expression in the resolution of the Casablanca conference—to wage war against the Axis until "unconditional surrender" is attained. But it is equally evident that the capitulation of the Reich and thus also of Japan and Italy can be accomplished only if Hitler is given no breathing spell in 1943.

Hitler's levée en masse will undoubtedly disrupt the course of the Nazi war machine considerably for some time to come. The iron necessity to replace the huge losses of men and matériel suffered in the second Russian winter campaign from the already reduced effectives at home is bound to weaken the fighting and production front of the Reich. That gives the Allies their chance. The length and outcome of the war will largely depend on whether it is utilized.

"Jap Crow" Experiment

BY JOHN LARISON

ENOUGH time has rolled by since we evacuated the Japanese from the West Coast and relocated them in the interior to enable us to appraise the undertaking and perhaps to project a better way out of one of the strangest dilemmas in our history. The majority of the evacuated are American citizens, and now that we have regained our poise after the shock of Pearl Harbor we ought to be able to work out some wise and just means of reintegrating them into the American community.

It is no secret that ten months' experience with the relocation centers has not been a happy one either for the administrators or for the citizens and aliens taken into "protective custody." It can be said at the outset that the enterprise as a whole has been humanely administered by men of good-will, though it has never been the Sunday School picnic or the Boy Scout jamboree that some of our more imaginative reporters have tried to make it out.

The évacués are distributed among ten centers in California, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, and Arkansas. They live in standard army barracks built of lumber covered with tarpaper. Originally it was intended to allot one room about twenty feet square to each family, but owing to shortages in building materials this space allotment could not be followed, and a good many families had to double up, sometimes with strangers, at best with friends. These living quarters obviously permit little in the way of home life, since they lack both privacy and cooking facilities. Dining-halls, toilet and bath houses, and laundries are communal, one of each to a block. Meals are fair, with some provision of Japanese dishes for the older people. The food cost is about forty cents a person a day, and food is rationed as in other communities.

The centers have few facilities for recreation. The recreation halls, of which there is one in each block, have in many cases had to be preempted for temporary schools and other purposes. Moving pictures are few and far between. Mostly the people have had to make their own amusements, and have leaned heavily on baseball, theatricals, and gardening and landscaping. Books, newspapers, and magazines are scarce and in great demand. As an offset to the meager recreational facilities, the authorities plan to operate the schools eleven months a year, on the theory that the devil finds work for idle hands to do. The elementary and high schools are making every endeavor to meet the standards of the states in which they are situated, although there is a shortage of Caucasian teachers, and inexperienced évacués have had to be hastily trained to meet the need. It is significant of the strong trend toward Americanization that the parents urge the employment of Caucasian teachers.

The government does not provide education beyond high school, although there are large numbers of college students whose work has been interrupted by relocation, as well as recent high-school graduates ready to enter college. With the cooperation of a number of Western universities, the War Relocation Authority has been able to provide some facilities for adult education but nothing adequate for the need. Through the admirable work of the National Student Relocation Committee, a private agency, several hundred évacués have been released to attend colleges outside the evacuated areas.

The economic condition of the évacués is very bad. The original intent of the WRA was to develop agriculture and to some extent industries on a scale sufficient not only to make the centers self-supporting but to create a surplus for the war effort. Three things have caused this program to fall short of accomplishing its purpose. One is the surprisingly large outside demand for Japanese-American labor that developed during the 1942 harvest season. About ten thousand workers left the centers, after official investigation and permission, largely for beet and cotton picking. This demand will undoubtedly increase in the coming season.

A second obstacle to industrial and agricultural development in the centers has been the wage scale. In addition to furnishing board, lodging, and hospitalization or other medical care to all évacués, the government has set up a system of cash wages for all workers for whom jobs could be found in the centers. These wages amount to $12, $16, and $19 a month, depending on the nature of the work, whether unskilled, skilled, or professional. Almost half the inhabitants are thus employed—many in essential services such as clerical work, transportation, warehousing, and mess-hall operation, others in agriculture and industry. Even if to the cash wages we add the cost of food and quarters, it is clear that for most of them the resultant wage scale is very meager and far out of line with what is being paid elsewhere in this country. Resident aliens of course would expect to receive the customary perquisites of interned enemy aliens, and, figured on this basis, the allowances would be considered generous. With our American citizens of Japanese ancestry, however, the case is different. They regard the wage scale as unfairly discriminatory and do not work with any enthusiasm. Nevertheless, they have collectively done a surprising amount of work in agriculture, in running the essential public services, in organizing community stores, and in operating certain industries such as camouflage net factories—in which, however, a more attractive wage scale had to be established after a preliminary failure to attract workers at the standard relocation-center rates. During the calendar year 1942, with most of the centers getting into production only by midsummer, about $800,000 worth of vegetables and other crops were produced. In 1943 crop production will run to almost $3,000,000, and by midsummer of 1944 the value of livestock and livestock products will amount to another $2,000,000.

Thirdly, the évacués have been too much bossed and managed by unnecessarily large administrative staffs. Among the évacués are highly skilled farmers, artisans, engineers, technicians, scientists, doctors, business men, mechanics, foremen, nurses, and artists. As a group they are unusually well educated, have a tradition of good workmanship, and are in general competent to organize and manage their own affairs. If they had been given free rein, they could have done a far better job than they have been able to do in bureaucratic leading-strings and with a superfluity of Caucasian bosses. Even in their own civic affairs they have been restricted, the community councils being only advisory and hampered moreover by the arbitrary ruling that no Issei—first-generation, elderly people—could hold public office in a center, with the result that the civic responsibilities have fallen largely on the shoulders of the Nissei—second generation—most of whom are so young that a community council meeting is almost like a meeting in Boys' Town.

The unexpectedly large demand for évacué workers outside the centers has led to an important shift in the basic policy of the WRA, which is now to encourage and assist as many of the évacués as possible to obtain outside employment, and to keep the centers unattractive enough to persuade most of them to leave instead of to stay. If this plan could be handled wisely, skilfully, and gradually, with emphasis on those best fitted to work outside, it might be one step toward a final solution.

Thus far, this report might convey the impression that aside from some material inconveniences and low wage scales, relocation has been pretty satisfactory. But it cannot be too strongly emphasized that the evil of relocation is its psychic and emotional effect; much damage has already been done and will be permanent unless great skill and insight go into the future handling of this minority problem. It must be remembered that about 70 per cent of the évacués are American citizens by birth. Moreover, with a few exceptions they are eagerly, indeed pathetically, American in speech, manners, and ambitions. So Americanized are they, in fact, that a very troublesome aspect of administration in the centers is the deep schism between the young generation and the old.

These young citizens are for the most part courteous, industrious, earnest, and intelligent. They strike an unbiased observer as unusually good human material. Moreover, they approach their own minority problem in a spirit of humility, candor, and cooperation. Yet they are deeply troubled by the paradox of their detention despite their citizenship in a country whose constitution is conspicuously devoted to safeguards of liberty and equality. Like all young people, they lean heavily on the security, continuity, and predictability of a meaningful environment. Yet these supports have been snatched away from them. They, along with their elders, were removed from their homes, vocations, and schools, from their friends and social ties, often at great financial loss. And they have been confronted with an unpredictable and consequently terrifying future. Worst of all, relocation has fastened on them the galling stigma of suspicion. In this atmosphere it was inevitable that they should be subject to psychic and emotional deterioration, which in some cases has become overt in strikes and riots.

The first step toward the moral rehabilitation of this unhappy group is to clear the innocent of unjust suspicion by segregating the disloyal. And the evidence is that the great majority are innocent of any subversive design or intent. In Harper's for last October an anonymous intelligence officer of the armed forces who had carried on a long investigation of our West Coast Japanese published his conclusion that at least 75 per cent were loyal. It is likely that this figure is purposely conservative: the responsible administrators of the centers would probably place the percentage well above 90. More convincing is the fact that the army has recently begun to recruit Japanese-American regiments on a voluntary-enlistment basis. Army recruitment has done a great deal to restore the self-respect of the évacués. Even more effective would be inducting them under the draft, after segregation of the disloyal. The young men are eager to serve their country, but they want to serve it on a basis of equality; they regard voluntary enlistment as in itself a form of discrimination, and they have dubbed the special Japanese-American contingents "Jap Crow" regiments. As a result, voluntary enlistments have been relatively few.

A second necessary step is to begin to work out now the permanent solution of the problem. Merely to encourage or to use pressure on the Japanese to leave the centers for outside employment is not a complete solution. Many of them can and should go out, but many of them have been disqualified by "war-shock" from going out and starting life anew without considerable support and advance preparation. A careful family survey, by qualified social workers, would determine which are qualified to go out and which had better stay in the centers until a permanent resettlement plan is devised.

For those who remain in the centers a more normal life should be worked out, better recreational and adult-education facilities provided, and a system of normal economic enterprise developed. Cooperative agricultural and industrial projects on the orthodox profit-making pattern would restore the initiative of the évacués and greatly reduce costs in operating the centers. Genuine civic self-government should be part of the program.

As to permanent resettlement, the government should by all means begin to lay down the broad lines now, lest at the end of the war the whole question be approached on the basis of emotional politics and racial prejudice. Many of the évacués can doubtless shift for themselves and regain a worth-while place in the American community. But many others, probably the majority, if left to themselves would sink to the status of migratory workers. There is especial need for a permanent agricultural-settlement program for the highly skilled farmers among them, preferably in small groups to safeguard them from race discrimination on the one hand and from segregation in ghettos on the other. To effect permanent resettlement, the government must ally itself with liberal community and religious leaders and groups to assure fair play and non-violence.

Only a few hotheads among us need whipping-boys as an emotional outlet during the war. The rest of us might reflect on how best to emerge from the relocation enterprise with a minimum of damage to the évacués and to our own national dignity.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

SINCE the New Hampshire election Democrats no longer talk of carrying Connecticut by a majority of four or five thousand. The Republicans . . . grow more and more confident. . . . Furthermore, the Republicans are not this year, as they were last, weighted with Mr. P. T. Barnum, who in his Congressional district ran some hundreds—267—"behind his ticket," and whose name undoubtedly hurt the Republican Party throughout the state.—April 2, 1868.

THE ACCOUNTS of the operations of the "Kuklux Klan," the secret organization which has been formed by Southern "Conservatives" for the purpose of making the South unpleasant for Yankees and Negroes—or, to put the matter more plainly, for the purpose of breaking up the Radical organization at the South—are anything but pleasant reading. . . . The "Klan" . . . has established a reign of terror in Tennessee and Georgia, and is spreading into other states.—April 9, 1868.

ONE OF THE DOCUMENTS with which the "Ku Klux Klan" are intimidating their opponents . . . is adorned with . . . cannon, . . . a coffin with a white cross, a skull and cross-bones, a dagger, a chain, a coiled snake, a sword, a heart, two crescent moons, a black flag with "K. K. K." upon it, a hound, a bugle-horn, and such inscriptions as these: "Klansmen—the deed without a name is done"; "Many thanks, O Ghenghis Khan, thou whose crown is" [device of skull and cross-bones]; "Attend the Cabala, and the curse of Nemesis upon him who speeds not the foot at its mystic summons." To be put to death by persons of the mental caliber of the inventors of these placards—to furnish in one's own person the tragic conclusion to so trivial a farce as the "Klan" performances would be if cowardly murder were not the end of them—this must be peculiarly trying to a victim whose taste is not wholly unformed.—April 16, 1868.

NOVEL-READERS who got a sensation as of something fresh and new when they made the acquaintance of Ivan Turgenev's "Fathers and Sons," will be pleased to hear that another of his very clever books has been translated into French. Its Russian title is "Duim," which means "smoke" or "vapor."—April 16, 1868.

THE PRESS DINNER to Dickens, in spite of some conspicuous drawbacks, was a success. . . . The speeches . . . were more than usually good. Mr. Greeley's at the opening was both happy and graceful; was, in short, done in his best vein—which, whatever one may think of his worst vein, is in most particulars admirable.—April 23, 1868.

THE GALAXY comes to us enlarged and improved, and contains good light reading. . . . "Personalism" is by Mr. Walt Whitman, whose power of brain does not seem sufficient to make his prose remarks valuable.—April 30, 1868.

Rubber from the Farm

BY ROSS L. HOLMAN

ALITTLE over a year ago rubber became America's nightmare number one. When war broke out in the Pacific, and we were cut off from the rubber plantations of the East, we were faced squarely with the problem of finding something to keep our rubberized economy from running on flat tires. Under pressure of the emergency we have turned up more new rubber sources than we had ever dreamed could exist, though some synthetic rubber had been in the making for several years, and many processes were already past the experimental stage. In fact, it was on test-tube rubber that Hitler's blitzkrieg rolled into Paris, and it was Soviet synthetics that turned it back in Russia.

Buna S rubber, which has had warmer government blessing than any other synthetic rubber, is made from petroleum, but a majority of the new processes use farm products. Much of the emergency rubber will be made from grain alcohol. The petroleum product going into rubber is known as butadiene, and butadiene can also be manufactured from wheat, corn, and other grains. It can be made from potatoes, blackstrap molasses, peanuts, and many other farm crops. Other plant products can be utilized by other processes, and the government is expending money and materials to develop every substance that promises bounce and stretch.

When the war is over, many of these processes for making rubber from farm products will be so well developed—with respect to both quality of output and manufacturing facilities—that they are not likely to be discarded by a peace-time economy. Some will have competitive economic advantages over others. It appears now that nearly every form of artificial rubber has certain peculiar properties not possessed by others, or even by the natural rubber of which we have been deprived.

Grain, as the chief source of alcohol, has had more build-up than any other farm crop as a source of butadiene for rubber. In Russia rubber has been successfully made from grain for fifteen years. We do not yet know just what part of the rubber program will be allotted to grain alcohol, but the plant of the Carbide and Carbon Chemicals Corporation at Charlestown, West Virginia, has been producing butadiene from it at the rate of 5,000 tons a year since November, and other plants of this company at Institute, West Virginia, Louisville, Kentucky, and Pittsburgh will be in production by June. The program approved by the Baruch committee provided for a continuance of present refining facilities and for the construction of new plants. Liquor distilleries have offered to convert their facilities to the manufacture of industrial alcohol. By such means we could obtain three times as much alcohol for 1943 as we had in 1941. At the time of the Baruch report, existing manufacturing plants could produce 200,000,000 gallons of agricultural alcohol a year. This amount of alcohol would give 250,000 tons of rubber a year, which is a little more than a third of our peace-time requirements. It is authoritatively stated that factories to turn alcohol into butadiene could be put into operation much more quickly than factories to obtain butadiene from petroleum. The manufacture of 250,000 tons of rubber, Secretary Wickard says, would provide a market for 80,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Outside the butadiene-producing crops, the plant on which the government is counting most for a supply of rubber is guayule. The petroleum-rubber program has recently slowed down because materials for new plant facilities had to be diverted to other uses, but the guayule picture looks decidedly more encouraging than it did when the Baruch report was issued. The chief bottleneck in guayule rubber is seed. Fortunately, the seed harvest last fall from the government's project at Salinas, California, was six times as large as was anticipated.

Guayule is a short bushy shrub native to Mexico. Under the direction of Dr. W. B. McCallum, the chemist most responsible for its development, it has been grown successfully in the Southwest and, more extensively, in California. At Salinas the Intercontinental Rubber Company, which employed McCallum for several years, has set up a pilot plant and made rubber that stands up under every conceivable test. By patient selection of better plant varieties Dr. McCallum has stepped up the rubber content of guayule from 5 to 25 per cent. He says that acre for acre it will outproduce the Hevea tree of the Far East, and that 40,000 farmers, each growing 100 acres, could give this country all the rubber it needs. Thousands of tires have been manufactured from it.

To get rubber from guayule the plant is pulled up, roots and all, and ground into small pieces. These pieces are then pulverized in a rotating drum containing smooth pebbles and water. In a settling tank the wood pulp sinks to the bottom; the rubber rises to the top and is skimmed off like cream. The rubber is placed in trays, dried under vacuum, and pressed into hundred-pound cakes. It is then ready for manufacture.

When the rubber crisis became acute more than a year ago, the government bought out the Intercontinental interests in California and is now promoting the possibilities of this plant to the limit. At first it did not anticipate saving enough seed to make more than a minor contribution to the war effort. But the prospect is now that the Salinas factory will manufacture 600 tons in 1943, 21,000 tons in 1944, and 88,000 tons in 1945. While this production does not promise to meet a very large proportion of our normal demand for 600,000 tons, it pieces out the supply splendidly and presages a fine post-war crop for the Southwestern farmer.

Another foreign plant on which the government is spending some effort is the Russian dandelion, or kok-saghyz. The Russian government devotes 2,000,000 acres a year to it and has been very successful in processing dandelion rubber. Grasping at rubber straws, the United States had a large shipment of kok-saghyz seed brought in by plane from Kuibyshev. This was turned over to twenty-three experiment stations, which were told to do what they could with it. The foliage of the plant forms a spreading rosette of from twenty to fifty leaves growing close to the ground. Rubber is obtained chiefly from the roots, which extend deep into the ground.

Reports on the amount of rubber per acre that kok-saghyz will produce range from thirty to two hundred tons. For the present emergency it has two distinct advantages: the plant stores its rubber in nine months; and since it is processed somewhat as are beets for sugar, manufacturing facilities are probably already available. Many experts believe our beet-sugar factories can do the job in their off season. The first harvest in this country was completed last fall, and the government's laboratory at St. Paul, Minnesota, is testing the possibilities. The yield at the Michigan State College station, said to be the best of the twenty-three experimental projects, was around 5,000 pounds of roots per acre, from which 100 to 200 pounds of rubber are expected to be obtained. According to reports, the government intends to expand the acreage to 2,000,000 in the hope of getting 200,000 to 400,000 tons of kok-saghyz rubber a year.

One strictly American plant showing great promise is the milkweed. The scientist who has probably done the most work on it is Dr. William A. Sharpe of Alhambra, California. Like the other new rubbers mentioned milkweed rubber has passed some hard tests. Douglas Aircraft, testing it as a lining for plane tanks, found it as tough as shoe leather. One plane tank fitted with a self-vulcanizing lining of this rubber was riddled with bullets without a drop of gasoline being lost.

The milkweed grows almost everywhere in the United States and can be harvested nine months after seeding. Its juices are extracted by crushing, much as sap is extracted from sugar cane. The juice goes through a fermenting process, with cream or latex rising to the top. This is skimmed off and after churning and cooking becomes smooth and plastic. It is then spread on metal trays, treated with infra-red lights to dry it, and rolled into slabs.

The soy bean, which has probably more industrial uses than any other American crop, has rubber possibilities also. Recently Reichholds Chemicals, Inc., in co-operation with the United States regional laboratory at Peoria, manufactured a soy rubber known by the trade name of Agripol. Reichholds is reported to be going into production of Agripol at the rate of 25,000 tons a year. Agripol is not considered suitable for tires as yet, but it can take the place of natural rubber in gaskets, belting, insulating mats, chemical apparatus, and the like. The fatty acids of soy oil are combined with ethylene glycol and the ordinary fillers used in natural rubber. The chemical name for soy rubber is Norepol. Some companies are manufacturing it under that name, while Reichholds and one other firm use their own trade name.

In a hearing recently held before a Senate agricultural subcommittee, John A. Tolman and Alfred Spanier, chemical engineers of Detroit, explained a process for obtaining rubber which indicates that our South has rubber trees and far more of them than are found in the Far East. The only difference is that the Eastern trees go by the name of Hevea. In the South we call them pines. These engineers believe that rubber can be made from turpentine, and that six million acres of pines could supply all our peace-time requirements. As Spanier explains it, to make turpentine yield rubber you take from it pinene, split it, and by running it through a filter disc subject it to somewhat the same conditioning that the sap of the rubber tree gets in seeping through the bark. From the resulting isoprene a fine rubber is obtained. He insists that it can be made for eight cents a pound.

While government scientists are pooling their brains to discover new rubber processes, many industrial corporations are devoting their resources to the same end. The General Tire and Rubber Company is concentrating heavily on guayule, believing it the coming rubber of America. Du Pont has a very efficient non-agricultural, non-petroleum rubber called neoprene. The Goodrich Rubber Company is specializing on kok-saghyz and two other plants not heretofore mentioned—goldenrod and cryptostegia. Goldenrod was the plant to which Thomas A. Edison devoted his declining years in an effort to find an economical domestic source of rubber. Cryptostegia is a perennial which grows wild in Mexico and is cultivated in Florida for its handsome foliage and flowers. It contains rubber in all its parts, and the tops can be harvested thirty times a year.

All the processes described show promise, and our problem appears to be not what to do but how to get started. It takes time, money, and skilled management to build factories and organize production on a large scale. But the developments in this field since Pearl Harbor indicate that a new rubber industry will not only meet our war needs but provide a vast new market for the farmer.

Letters from a Pfc

[This is the first of a series of intermittent letters which we hope to receive from a veteran contributor to The Nation who has just acquired his first stripe in the army of the United States.]

Atlantic City, March 30

SOLDIERING here, with hotels as barracks and the city's famed boardwalk as a drill field, has a distinctly musical-comedy ring. As a result, some of the folks back home, under the influence of Hollywood, envisage our training here as the sort of affair in which Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers whirl gracefully about, while we loll around and smilingly beat out an appropriate rhythm on our helmets. A moderately truthful young man in my room insists that he received a letter from an aunt in Little Rock which concluded sadly, "Poor boy, it must be difficult. You never could carry a tune."

Actually, as any buck private will groaningly assure you, life here follows a somewhat sterner pattern. In fact, those of us who are undergoing "basic training" suspect that it bears a fairly close resemblance to purgatory on a busy day. Several young men from Brooklyn who thought when they arrived a number of days ago that it was to be a "snap, like a visit to Coney Island," were swiftly disillusioned. Yesterday one of them muttered darkly that he would do anything, "even become a Yankee fan," to be shipped elsewhere.

Basic training, which almost everyone survives, though not without a certain degree of astonishment, consists mainly of marching and calisthenics, of an especially strenuous and exhausting kind, and some useful instruction in the care and operation of various instruments of destruction. It also includes, at least in Atlantic City, an inordinate amount of floor scrubbing and numerous lectures, most of them tryingly dull, on such subjects as military courtesy, military law, and the proper way to make up a bed. Floor scrubbing, most of us are convinced, is very bad for our morale, but this conviction is rudely disregarded by those in authority. Having such cherished convictions ignored, along with getting out of bed at 4:45 a.m., is perhaps the most painful adjustment that army life imposes.

There are others, of course, each with its own special torment. The first time my group was cursed out by a drill master, which was about seven minutes after we piled out at the Atlantic City station, one fellow grinned calmly and said, "O. K., bud, have your fun." Lacking the same philosophical bent, the rest of us writhed in humiliation. It is impossible to exaggerate the lacerating effect of your first "cursings out." Fortunately, after two or three weeks your feelings acquire a kind of insulation. If you are so constructed, the cursing, which usually is unimaginative and somewhat redundant, continues to disturb your aesthetic sense, but it leaves you personally untouched. One goes through a similar metamorphosis with regard to most army grievances. Things which at first seem unbearable and set many recruits to talking recklessly about "going over the hill," fade in magnitude after two or three weeks, leaving most soldiers mildly irritated still, but feeling slightly foolish over their early rather histrionic indignation.

An essential part of basic training, though at the last check it had not yet worked its way into any official manual, is the art of griping. This, among other things, is a new kind of folk art, and the average recruit masters it long before he has learned the intricacies of left and right face. In its crudest form it consists of complaining about every, including the most minute and unoffending, aspect of army life. But in true griping, which is both a safety valve for all sorts of emotional distress and a magnificent form of humor, the complaint is built up and embroidered to the limits of the griper's imagination.

A soldier, on finding a seed or two in his grapefruit, will solemnly inform his friends that all he got was a "skin full of pits." After breakfasting one morning on fruit, cereal, two glasses of milk, four hard-boiled eggs, five slices of toast, doughnuts, and coffee, a lanky Missourian with whom I roomed declaimed loudly, "Hell, the trouble with this place is that you never get anything to eat." A civilian eavesdropping on a griping session might excusably conclude that the army was on the verge of mutiny, but very few soldiers would consider accepting an honorable discharge. My Missouri roommate, easily one of the most proficient gripers in Atlantic City, was once asked whether he would accept such a discharge. After recovering from his surprise that the question should be asked, he drawled, "Hell, no. Not for all the dollars in the national budget."

Before a recruit has been in the army for many days he is started through an apparently endless series of inoculations or "shots," to immunize him against smallpox, tetanus, typhoid, malaria, cholera, and other fearful diseases. These shots usually are painless, but the veteran soldiers—a veteran being anyone who has experienced yesterday what you are scheduled to do today—make a practice of depicting each new shot as something dreadful. The recruit is warned pleasantly "to watch out for the needle with the hook," or the "corkscrew," or "the one with the propeller on it." This has infinite variations, all of them at least mildly terrifying to the gullible. However, the next day brings its compensation. The recruit who has just received, say, his second tetanus, will invariably be overheard commiserating with some hapless soul about to receive it. "Pretty tough," he will say, "you're going to get the fish hook this time."

In the Wind

One of the first things you notice in the army is the wide disparity of reading habits. There is a fellow down the hall whose most precious possession is a copy of Matthew Arnold's "Culture and Anarchy"; another reads everything published on the advisability of teaching Greek and Latin in the colleges. But several boys I know find all the mental stimulus they require in "Superman" and other books of comics. They are voracious readers of these "picture books," and some of them miss painfully the comic strips in their home-town newspapers. "That's all I used to read at home," a young man from Long Island confided to me a week ago. "You know," he said thoughtfully, "you can't believe the rest of the stuff in newspapers anyway."

Generally, soldiers, no matter what their tastes, read very little. Asking why they do not read more, at least during their basic training, is reminiscent of the old vaudeville joke in which one vaudevillean approached another, burdened down with packages, and said, "Hey, bud, how about a match?" The fact, vehemently deplored here, is that the extent of our free time is a hair line from zero. Theoretically we have several hours in the evening to ourselves, but our non-commissioned officers, with great ingenuity, manage to occupy these with inspections, special work details, and other such diabolical schemes. Not one of us could be dissuaded from believing that these are cooked up for the sole purpose of preventing us from enjoying sixty consecutive minutes of leisure or from writing letters home, in the army a sacred but often-interrupted rite. As a result, the few minutes of leisure we have are often devoted to maligning our non-coms, which in itself is in the best tradition of griping.

Perhaps because Atlantic City is a "civilian post," that is, one not set apart from the regular community, they are rather prissy here about dress and other such superficial aspects of soldiering. For example, shoes must be polished to a bright gloss. Hats must be worn precisely one finger over the right eye and one finger over the right ear. We are expected also to sing as we march, probably, one of our non-coms once observed vaguely, "because it's good for civilian morale or something like that." The effect is that at Atlantic City at the moment we are down on civilian morale, and some of us derive real pleasure from telling stray civilians about the glories of the army cuisine. This sort of thing helps to make army life not too difficult to bear. Of course, each day brings its jarring notes, as these paragraphs suggest, but Thoreau found even at Walden that "serenity is never complete." And after all, this is the army.

THE NEW JERSEY Senate, not unmindful of the future, has voted unanimously to issue free peddlers' licenses to veterans of the present war.

PROFESSOR R. E. MONROE of Ohio State College, chairman of a ration-board panel at Columbus, has informed the OPA that he will disregard its requirement that a member of a labor union be included in every panel. He has written to Senator Taft and to columnists and radio commentators for support.

WORKERS at the Boeing plant in Seattle are passing around a slip of paper, with a slot at one end, bearing this message: "The 'Our Hero' Committee is collecting donations to buy Eddie Rickenbacker another seagull. Please drop your contribution in this slot."

NANTICOKE, PENNSYLVANIA, teachers feel that their profession has been insulted by the terms of a recent school-board rule providing maternity leave for married women. This is the sentence that angers them: "The provisions of this rule shall not apply to any unmarried teacher who shall make application for leave of absence for reason of pregnancy or maternity."

THANKS ARE DUE Harley L. Lutz, professor of economics at Princeton, for clarifying the tax problem. He writes in the Tax Review, "The transfer of tax liability from past income to present income is one involving only a modification of statutory phrasing."

THE VOLUNTARY COMMITTEE to Aid Republican Party Policy Reorganization believes, according to one of its bulletins, that "the President's post-war program . . . can be better administered and put into execution by the Republican Party."

FESTUNG EUROPA: So many things happen to troop trains in Belgium that the Nazis have decreed that a certain number of Belgians must be on each train. . . . Fifteen thousand Dutch farmers who went to German-occupied Latvia and Lithuania in the belief that they would be given land there are now working as farm hands on German estates. . . . In order to encourage "collaboration" by Czecho-Slovakians the Nazis have set up in every town a special "commission" composed of S. S. men and a representative of the population appointed by the Town Council. In a Bohemian town the council appointed an idiot. After the first sitting of the "commission" the whole Town Council was sent to a concentration camp.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $3 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Sudetenland Today

BY F. C. WEISKOPF

Sudetenland, Sudetenland, for twenty years the Czechs have wronged thee. Now thy day has come. The Führer takes thee into the Reich.—Slogan of welcome for Hitler at Eger, first Sudeten town to be entered by him in October, 1938.

A PRESS dispatch from London, published a short time ago rather inconspicuously on the back pages of the big New York newspapers, told about an exchange of notes between the British and Czechoslovak governments. "Mr. Eden, in behalf of the British government," it said, "declared that the Munich agreement is henceforth considered void, and that no territorial change brought about by that agreement will be recognized by His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom. This refers mainly to the transfer of the Sudeten region in 1938. . . ."

The Sudeten region in 1938! It was there that the spark was struck which, ten months later, kindled the great European fire on the plains of Poland.

I remember a day that I spent late in May, 1938, at Eger, where Konrad Henlein, Hitler's man in the Sudeten territory, had his headquarters. I had come to Eger with two friends, newspapermen from Paris and London. The town was tense. Czechoslovak border guards had shot two of Henlein's storm troopers as they were attempting to cross the border illegally to get arms from an S. S. post in the Reich. Under pressure from Chamberlain and Daladier, and from its own appeasers, the Czechoslovak government permitted the Henlein party to arrange a funeral parade for the two men. The streets were handed over to the Henlein storm troopers, who goose-stepped over the market place to Prussian military marches and Nazi songs. It was a sign of things to come, and the thousands of people lining the streets and squares of Eger took it as it was meant. They were by no means all Nazis. Throughout the Sudeten territory the majority of those who attended the rallies and parades of the Henlein party were shifting "quicksands." But when they saw that the troopers were policing the streets, and that the little Führer had the attachés of the big Führer at his side, to the last man they raised their arms in the Nazi salute and shouted, "Ein Volk, ein Führer, ein Reich!"

"They are drunk," said my English friend as we left the town. "No," answered the Frenchman, "they're on the march again, as they were in 1914."

Today, four years after the "liberation of the Sudetenland," they are still on the march. But where has the march led them? What does life in the Sudeten region look like in 1942-43? What do the people of Eger and Reichenberg and Troppau think today? How do they like being a part of Hitler's Greater German Empire?

It is not easy to get a reliable picture of the situation in the Sudeten territory in this fourth year of war. The Nazi censorship watches with especial zeal every bit of news that refers to the real state of affairs in the so-called liberated regions—Austria, the Saar area, Danzig, and the Sudetenland. You have to piece together the elements of the picture from the letters that seep across the borders, from the leaflets and mimeographed papers of the hidden opposition that find their way to neutral Sweden or Switzerland, from the broadcasts of the secret Free Sudeten Radio, which can be heard in England and Russia, from the Nazi-controlled Sudeten press, from the talk of the refugees who still manage to escape, from the diaries found on the bodies of dead Sudeten soldiers, and from information given by prisoners of war.

From all the news we get, whatever its source, one thing becomes clear: the political temperature in the Sudeten region is pretty low—lower than in the Altreich (Germany proper). There, even more than in other parts of Greater Germany, the population seems to have lost its soul. This is true not only of the politically unstable masses, but also of many who earlier were staunch followers of Henlein and Hitler. As a neutral observer, a Swiss business man who made a trip through the northern part of Bohemia early in 1942, put it, "If the Sudeten population could express its sentiments in free elections today, the 75 per cent majority Henlein got in 1938 would shrink to perhaps 15 per cent, this remainder of allzeit Getreue (always loyal ones) being exactly the group of Nazi officials, S. S. men, police, and other compromised people who know that the end of the present regime means their physical extermination."

Foremost among the reasons for the spreading anxiety and unrest in the Sudeten region is the loss of human lives in Hitler's Russian campaigns. The population of the Sudetenland has been literally bled white. The Nazi High Command, it is well known, considers the Sudeten Germans, along with the Austrians, second-class Menschennmaterial (human stuff). Accordingly, regiments made up of them have been used as cannon fodder on the eastern front just as have the Rumanian, Hungarian, Italian, Finnish, and other vassal regiments.

"We were driven to the third attack by the officers and Feldjäger (special military police) with pistols and machine-guns," reported Private Anton H— of Aussig after he had surrendered to the Russians near Voronezh. "The officers were all from the Reich, mostly Prussians and Westphalians. They called us half-Czechs and cucumber-noses and mongrels, and they threatened us with shooting. One of the current punishments for a minor offense was chaining you up at a tree so that you could stand only on your tiptoes. After a half-hour you fainted, but they just left you hanging there for two full hours. Losses were extremely heavy. In the course of the summer offensive our company had to be replenished and reformed three times. When I surrendered, there were only eleven men left of the original complement."

Meanwhile the people back home are anxiously scanning the war communiqués for the announcement of the often-promised end of the Russian campaign. "There is too much idle talk and moaning about the length of the war," declared the chief of the Nazi organization of Lerchenfeld-Aussig in a letter to all party members sent out in August, 1942; "that is not the way in which our soldiers want us to follow their tremendous battles on the eastern front. We must concentrate all our thoughts and wishes upon winning the war at any cost. The home front must become as hard as the battle front."

But neither instructions of this kind, nor new Gestapo campaigns "to defeat grumblers and cowards," nor special propaganda tours by Baldur von Schirach and Dr. Goebbels can harden the Sudeten home front against the steady assaults of the casualty lists. In June, 1942, before Hitler's summer offensive got under way, the official number of Sudeten officers and men killed was 162,000—out of a total population of 3,000,000. The sale of mourning was prohibited in the spring of 1941. An article carried by the whole Sudeten press pointed out that "too many obituary notices in the papers are of a kind which the dead heroes would dislike vehemently. It is inadmissible to say that the dear dead one had no other wish than to see his relatives again, or that the Family X, having lost three sons, has nothing left but grief. A hero's death on the field of honor must not be looked at from such a point of view."

Wounded soldiers from the Sudeten region are usually brought to hospitals in Poland and Slovakia. Trains of wounded men pass through Sudeten towns only by night. On August 12, 1942, a train of thirty cars, all filled with disabled men from the eastern front, reached Reichenberg a few hours earlier than planned. It was held outside the station. Children who were playing in the neighborhood heard the groans of the wounded soldiers. Half an hour later several thousand persons gathered beside the train and demanded permission to see the wounded. Troops intervened, shooting one old worker to death and wounding a score of others.

An underground report from Bodenbach relates the following incident: A woman employed in a grenade factory came late to work and began to read some letters instead of working. The foreman, who used to hold up this woman as a model to the whole department, went over to her to ask what was the matter. Thereupon she began to throw grenades from the box in which they were packed, shouting, "We are all murderers. I have killed my husband. With grenades like these." She was declared mentally sick and taken to an insane asylum. From there she managed to send this letter to her fellow-workers: "My husband has been killed on the eastern front. One of his comrades wrote me about his death and inclosed a steel splinter. It was a splinter from the grenade which killed my Oskar. Now, I ask you women, how can you continue to make grenades in order to prolong this cursed war of the Nazis?" A short time later the woman died in the asylum. Underground leaflets charged that she had been poisoned by the Gestapo. More acts of sabotage were the answer of her fellow-workers.

Rations are smaller in the Sudetenland than in many parts of Germany proper. The region always depended on food supplies from other territories; now, with the transportation system under heavy strain, many of the cities remain for days without potatoes or flour. In the market place of Saaz the following "Hitler menu" was written in huge letters on the pavement:

Drawing by Hoffmeister

Water soup with Ersatz air bubbles
Lean roasted rat
Salad of withered laurels
Propaganda pie in the sky

With such meals in our stomachs, we cannot but march to victory. Sieg Heil!

Black markets are to be found in every town despite the new severe decrees threatening illegal traders with prison terms up to thirty years. Franz Höller, the Sudeten Goebbels, wrote in the Nazi paper Die Zeit in September, 1942: "An army of criminals is bargaining over food stuffs, which are fraudulently kept from the community." The "pig murderers" are particularly condemned—peasants who slaughter their pigs secretly rather than deliver them to the market commissioners.

The court reports of the Nazi paper Der Neue Tag are most revealing. They list many sentences like the following: one month in prison and a fine of 1,500 marks for illegal sale of tea substitutes; two months in prison and a fine of 2,000 marks for the illegal grinding of sixty pounds of flour; three months in prison for black slaughter of a goat; nine months in prison and a fine of 200 marks for illegal purchase of two chickens and a quantity of butter and eggs.

But the prize was certainly carried off by a "rationing order" for "weddings in war time." This document, issued by the Nazi mayor of Komotau, decreed that "not more than twelve additional wedding rations will be allotted in case of soldier weddings, each ration amounting to five ounces of meat, two ounces of margarine or butter, five ounces of flour, three ounces of sugar or honey substitute, one ounce of malt coffee, and one egg powder. Infringers of this decree face a prison sentence of one month and fines of from 200 to 2,000 marks."

The turtle sketched with chalk or coal on factory walls to remind the workers of the underground slogan "Go slow and hamper the Nazi war output" is crossing the border from the Bohemian Protectorate to the Sudeten region. The Gestapo has placed large posters in the armament plants at Komotau, Aussig, and Teplitz warning the workers to report any "subversive propaganda for slow-down or sabotage." The penalty for "turtle painters" was increased twice between January and August of 1942.

Sudeten workers not only "go slow," wreck tools and machines, and damage war products as they pack them; they are also adept at chemical sabotage. Railroad men of the Oderberg-Kaschau line, over which Rumanian oil is frequently transported, repeatedly dropped into the tank cars a chemical substance which rendered the oil unfit for use in airplane motors. It took the Gestapo five months to discover this trick. Workers of the Liebig textile plant at Reichenberg spoiled 5,000 meters of uniform cloth by adding too much sulphuric acid to the liquid used for the finishing process. Forty workers were arrested, but the culprits were not discovered. Airplane motors fabricated at the Mannesmann works near Komotau burned out with amazing rapidity because the mixture of metals used for certain essential parts had been wilfully changed.

"The lack of enthusiasm among the Sudeten population calls for the greatest efforts on our part"—these words were used by S. S. Obergruppenführer Benesch from Friedland at a meeting of the high-ranking Nazi officials of northern Bohemia in September, 1942. At the same meeting Sturmführer Konrad from Reichenberg pointed out that his storm troopers had to work in day and night shifts "in order to maintain quiet, order, and an average of fairly good mood." Sturmführer Neumann from Kamnitz spoke of the "alarming apathy which has replaced the former keenness of the S. A., as if they were infected with the creeping evil of grumbling and defeatism."

That creeping evil seems to spread from the homeland even to the Sudeten soldiers at the front. In a letter to members of his organization in the battle zone the leader of the Nazi Party group at Althabendorf advised them not to give credence to complaints about the priva-

Drawing by Hoffmeister

tions and hardships of the people back home. "Such complaints are caused either by misunderstandings and casual mistakes or by influences which are hostile to the very cause you are fighting for."

No pep talks, no victory communiqués, no parades are able to lift the spirits of the people. It is characteristic of their mood that the market-place concerts of the Reichenberg garrison, which in former years attracted a large crowd of people, were suspended in the summer of 1942 for lack of attendance.

Circulation of the Nazi-controlled press, according to official accounts which certainly understate the real situation, decreased in the last year and a half about 20 per cent. The distrust of Nazi news and Nazi propaganda, even among those who have been all-out supporters of Hitler's cause, is shown by the case of a certain Willi Kromholz, a charter member of the Henlein party, who was tried at Iglau for "remarks detrimental to the war effort of the Reich." Kromholz had proposed, at a "morale meeting," to ration the lies of the High Command and of the Ministry of Propaganda.

The secret Sudeten German Freedom Station usually closes its program of news about the real situation at the front with the following appeal: "A soldier who deserts from the front, or does not obey the mobilization order, or gets lost on the way to the battle zone is sure to find a hiding place. Soldiers from the Sudetenland, go to the woods and wait for the end of the war. There must not be a quiet hinterland any more. There are guerrilla groups in the Czech regions and in Slovakia. It is necessary to join them or to begin to organize guerrilla bands in our own Sudeten districts. . . . Don't let Hitler continue to slaughter you. Down with the Nazi war!"

There must be a vast network of reporters and informers feeding the news desk of the Freedom Station. Its voice reports happenings in the large towns as well as incidents in small villages, disasters at the front as well as sabotage acts in the factories. In the Town Hall of Aussig, Sudeten industrialists were told by a member of the Armament Council that production was lagging and had to be stepped up. The secret radio station was able to inform its listeners of what went on at this meeting. Agents of the Freedom Station are even among the storm troopers. One of them sent in detailed information about the mood of the S. A. formations of Reichenberg: "They are generally fed up with the war. Last November, at a meeting in the Turnhalle, they were told that there would not be another winter of war. Now their own wives torment them with ceaseless questions about the end of the war. They have to go on patrol duty every third night. They have no free Sunday any more. The Gestapo office in the Laufergasse spies on them. After the execution of Reinhard Heydrich, Gestapo chief at Prague, by Czech patriots, a detachment of Sudeten

Strategy and Politics

"Desert Victory," to be shown in the United States in the coming weeks, is not only indisputably the best film that the war has produced but a major lesson in political warfare. It shows British soldiers in Africa participating from the very beginning of the campaign in the study of the great battle they are going to fight. The Eighth Army appears suddenly as a real army of the people fighting a people's war. Like the Russian army now, the Loyalist army during the Spanish War, and the armies of the French Revolution 150 years ago, the British Eighth Army, as it is presented in "Desert Victory," embodies all the popular inspiration that calls forth the expression of a "nation in arms." Strategy, the film shows us, is not a branch of knowledge available only to the General Staff and other high-ranking officers; it is a very human problem, to the solution of which the ordinary fighting man can contribute if he is taken into the confidence of the commander. The proof is in the record of the Eighth Army. Together with the Red Army, it has done some of the best fighting yet seen in this war.

storm troopers from Reichenberg was sent to the Czech town of Mladá Boleslav to reinforce German garrison troops and S.S. formations. The storm troopers were sure that their last hour had come. Quite a few of them failed to report because of 'sudden illness.'"

Special features of the Freedom broadcasts are the warnings issued to the Sudeten population against Nazi spies. In the first week of last July a Gestapo agent, Erich Peter from Trautenau, was described in detail. Some time later the secret radio denounced three Gestapo spies in the iron works at Witkowitz, giving their false and real names, addresses, habits, and tricks.

"The Rats Are Beginning to Leave the Ship!" This was the title of an underground leaflet circulated in the Sudeten territory in the late summer of 1942. It told of many high Nazi officials who were moving their families back to the Reich and trying to sell property which they bought very cheap only a few years ago.

At Reichenberg, Eger, Troppau, and Oderberg all male Nazi Party members have been ordered to join the S. A. reserve. Every member of the party has been warned to keep weapons handy and to maintain a three days' supply of food "for the event of a sudden emergency."

Arrests of people suspected to be in contact with the underground movement in Bohemia and Slovakia multiplied during the summer of 1942. The Gestapo initiated a campaign of intimidation, but the hidden opposition countered with an efficient war of nerves against the Sudeten Nazis. White crosses were chalked time and again on the doors of houses where Gestapo agents and Nazis known for their cruelty were living. A Gestapo stooge at Neuern, Otto Wondrak, tried to escape the threatening crosses by twice moving to a new apartment and finally leaving town. But the crosses followed him. He gave up and hanged himself.

Such is the feeling now in a country in which four years ago a large proportion of the people clamored for union with Hitler's Reich. One can well imagine what is happening in occupied countries where Hitler would never have been welcomed. Conquered Europe is a vast, fertile field for anti-Hitler effort, only awaiting the hour when the democracies will finally learn the value of political war.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE strangest psychological campaign that has been launched in Germany in this war began on March 18. The first shot was fired by the great radio speaker Herr Ministerial Director Hans Fritzsche. "It is a good indication of the military worth of a company," he said, "when the soldiers wash and shave and pay attention to their appearance even under circumstances which make it difficult for them to do so." The same rule, he continued, applies to the civil population. "Some people," however, are evidently of the opinion that appearances are no longer important. In a time of "total mobilization" they feel justified in being "apathetic" or "indifferent" to such matters. "They regard total mobilization as license for going around ill-kempt and dirty." Some no longer keep their clothes clean; some do not shine their shoes; others have ceased to have a bowing acquaintance with water and sponge or comb and brush. People who thus let themselves go injure the public morale. They have a depressing effect on their associates.

A threadbare suit is not a disgrace any more, but even a threadbare suit should be clean. We can cheer up our companions by taking pains and not going about as careless of how we look as our ancestors who climbed among the trees. We want to be at least as well dressed as possible. Total war means a scarcity of many of the necessities of life, but it does not mean losing caste or becoming indifferent to rags and dirt.

The reproving voice forgot to mention that there is a soap famine in Germany and that it is one of the calamities which people feel most bitterly. But at any rate the admonition gives us some information about current conditions. The campaign has continued, and from the various turns it has taken we learn further interesting details. An article in the Berlin 12 Uhr Blatt of March 17 implies a development worth noting:

Occasionally there are more-than-a-hundred-percenters who take advantage of total war to heckle people in the subway and on the streets, criticizing women, for example, because they have dressed up for the theater after a hard day's work in an armament factory. If you meet such an ass, give him tit for tat. . . . Must a woman wear a patched dress to show that she works? Must she drag her hat in the mud? If such bleaters had their way, the use of soap would soon be a sign of sabotage. In these times we must work, not spy.

On March 27, in his weekly article in the Reich, Goebbels took considerable space to break a lance for people, especially women, who are still well dressed. The new habit of heckling them, he said, must stop. It calls forth more than the usual amount of social irritation and irritability.

Many buildings of great cultural value, buildings that cannot be replaced, are being destroyed in the bombardments that Germany is undergoing. Friends of art everywhere are saddened by it, and certainly the Germans not least. Will it comfort them to hear that substitutes are being planned? The Führer is known to be interested in architecture. He has often talked of the magnificent structures with which he will adorn the world after his victory. Now for the first time we are allowed a glimpse of them. Professor Wilhelm Kreis is considered a great architect in his own country. He is known internationally by his enormous heathen monument for the battlefield of Tannenberg, in which Hindenburg was buried. The master has just passed his seventieth birthday; and on this occasion it was revealed to the public that for two years he has been exclusively occupied with sketches and plans for a whole collection of colossal war memorials to be erected throughout Nazi Europe.

The correspondent of the Stockholm Dagens Nyheter has seen some of these plans, and on March 15 he described them for his paper. All the huge monuments will have a profoundly symbolic form. One will be erected high on the cliffs above the fjord at Trondheim. It will be like a "square fortress approached by a tunnel"—which is supposed to have some philosophical significance. A Balkan monument, to be built on Greek soil on the former Metaxas line, will have the form, appropriately enough, of a gigantic bunker. But the most grandiose of the projects will be a ne plus ultra structure erected to the memory of the war in the east somewhere on the Russian battlefield. "It is intended to symbolize," the Swedish correspondent reports, "the hardest battle the Germans were ever forced to fight. Forty half-lighted cupolas will illuminate a pyramidal building approached by a long dark passage. It will be the largest building in the world."

So far as it depends on Hitler, the reconstruction of Europe in greater beauty than ever before is assured.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Ullstein Papers

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE HOUSE OF ULLSTEIN.

By Herman Ullstein. Simon and Schuster. $3.

IT BEGAN in the year 1877. In that summer Leopold Ullstein, a successful Jewish paper merchant, bought a small half-bankrupt newspaper in Berlin. It ended in the year 1934. In that fall the founder's five sons were obliged to "sell" the firm to a purchaser—presumably Adolf Hitler—whose name was not revealed then or later.

In the fifty-seven years between these dates the enterprise had grown to mammoth size. Four Berlin newspapers of various types belonged to it, and countless magazines; the most popular sold more than two million copies. The firm had its own worldwide news service and a gigantic transportation system, including a sizable air fleet. It published books of every price and quality, one of which, "All Quiet on the Western Front," became the ne plus ultra of all international best-sellers. It employed ten thousand persons. Its two palatial places of business with their immense presses were sights to be visited. By far the largest and most prosperous publishing house in Europe, it was valued at sixty million marks. The anonymous purchaser acquired it for twelve million—but of course the former owners could not keep this sum. The mills of legal and illegal plundering began to grind, and when the surviving brothers were at last allowed to leave the country, they had only the ten marks apiece that a traveler is permitted to take with him.

One of the brothers now tells the story. Herman Ullstein was the great concern's publicity specialist. His work in this field was praised by those who could observe it closely, and any self-assurance that he retains derives from the memory of his achievements in that line. In other respects he is very modest about himself. "With average gifts as I see them," he writes, "it was my privilege when I finally did enter the firm to be instrumental in helping it to make many millions." When he writes of the years of success, he hardly digresses into the matters that make the biography of a newspaper enterprise really interesting—into the biography of the whole historical period. This larger background he sees today about as the average German saw it at the time, and as the papers of the house of Ullstein described it. It would be going too far to say that in this way a correct picture of events and of the role played by the Ullstein colossus is put together. I would not even swear that many of the figures which in the years of success aroused Mr. Ullstein's admiration did not in reality deserve just the opposite. But that is snow of yesteryear, and the future historian is not restricted to these reminiscences.

The period of which Mr. Ullstein can be most proud, after that of his business success, is the last melancholy period of the Nazis' rise to power, from 1930 to 1933. We learn from him that he considered the danger much greater than most people did and that he was in despair over the absence of serious reactions. He entitles his chapter dealing with these years The Unexploited Power, meaning by that the power of the press. He tells of his efforts to induce the middle-of-the-road German press to offer stiffer resistance to the rising tide. But even in his own firm his efforts were fruitless. The other partners and especially their sons and sons-in-law were apathetic. They feared that a more decided stand would "lose us half our readers" and hoped, inconsistently, "that my pessimism went too far."

It is questionable whether in the years after 1930 the press could have done much against Hitler. The affair had already advanced far beyond the spiritual sphere. However that may be, the great liberal press of Germany did not gather its strength for a sharpened struggle but month by month showed greater weakness. Against the will of Brother Herman, as he tells it, his own house accommodated itself more and more to the current trend—not exactly the trend toward Nazism but toward other forms of a victorious, onward-pressing nationalism. At a frown from the Reichswehr ministry, which threatened prosecution for treason because news about rearmament doings had been published, the editorial staff was purged. When Goebbels raised an unheard-of row about the Hollywood film "All Quiet on the Western Front," and demanded and obtained the suppression of this "insult to Germany," the firm did not make a move to intercede publicly for its own book. And it fitted into the tragedy that just at this time hateful quarrels about property broke out in the family and, draped with "patriotic" motives, were thoroughly aired in public. That was an extraordinary manifestation of the general decay in Germany. But there was nothing extraordinary about the political drama in those last days of Pompeii. As uncomprehending, irresolute, and inglorious as the powerful Ullstein newspapers, all republican Germany at this final stage moved as in a dream toward the slaughter. Not the fact that it was defeated but that it gave up without a fight is the greatest handicap of any restoration movement.

From the day of Hitler's coming to power the Ullstein papers, like all others, were no longer written by their publishers and editors. From that day on Goebbels wrote every line, and it made practically no difference whether the management was conciliatory or intransigent in bowing to the inevitable. The Ullstein brothers grasped the situation; they yielded without useless resistance. They were less quick to understand other inescapable consequences—to their misfortune. It was plain enough not only that the Nazis would now dictate the contents of the papers but that they would soon own them also. This was not foreseen by the firm which had been for so long the mentor of millions of persons. There were warnings, "but we didn't heed the warning immediately. Who, after all, would have thrown up the sponge so soon? The Ullsteins in any case were trying to find some way of keeping their heads above water till the deluge should end, and we thought there was a chance of doing so."

Since they were wrong in thinking so, the public catastrophe was completed by private ruin. The wealth which might have been saved by a quick decision in 1933 was lost by waiting till the fall of 1934. Herman Ullstein censures such shortsightedness. "So many people refused to emigrate in spite of the fact that at that time there was nothing to stop them. It won't be as bad as all that, they insisted. And, anyway, they had such a good life. Change all that? No, that was asking too much. So they went on waiting, investing all their hopes in the miracle." It is a sad story in more than one respect. But it has perhaps a comforting implication: if even private interests were so arrantly miscalculated, there is no reason to doubt that the political misadventures were made in good faith. LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD

Points East

SOUTH FROM CORREGIDOR. By Lieutenant Commander John Morrill, U. S. N., and Pete Martin. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THEY CALL IT PACIFIC. By Clark Lee. The Viking Press. $3.

SOUTHWEST PASSAGE. By John Lardner. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

ON THE day Corregidor fell, Commander Morrill and the crew of the minesweeper Quail were ashore on nearby Fort Hughes. They were ordered to sink the Quail, which lay at anchor in Manila Bay, having unaccountably survived Japanese bombs. This involved a quarter-mile swim in a rain of enemy bullets; but they did it, ducking their heads under water to fool the dive-bombers into thinking they had been hit. Then they wondered whether to return to Fort Hughes and surrender to the Japanese or take the Quail's thirty-six-foot open Diesel boat and head for Australia, 2,000 miles away across enemy-infested seas. Seventeen men and Morrill headed for Australia, and "South from Corregidor" is their odyssey.

It is a tale of high adventure and hairbreadth escapes. Their trip, however, was not harrowing like the voyages of Captains Bligh and Rickenbacker, for there was plenty of food, coffee, and fuel oil. Filipinos, both rich and poor, helped the fugitives as they dodged furtively from island to island. The scraggly-bearded Americans landed one night on the private beach of a Filipino grand seigneur, who feted them; he said Americans would do the same for him if he were cast up, dirty and unshaven, on a California beach, wouldn't they? Commander Morrill wondered.

This book, like "They Were Expendable," shows one small facet of the epic of Bataan. Clark Lee gives a newspaperman's-eye view of the whole disaster in "They Call It Pacific." He was in Manila for the Associated Press, and like most Americans there was positive that the Japanese invaders would be crushed in short order. The communiqués kept saying, "Our forces are holding firmly on all fronts," and the people of Manila were utterly surprised to discover on New Year's Day that the army had left.

The same appalling optimism prevailed on Bataan. The troops did not know they were being spent. Day after day they scanned the skies and the seas for planes and ships that never came. Even on Corregidor they clung to hope. "They did not know, and would not have believed, that no help was going to be sent." Someone in Washington thought it couldn't be done, Mr. Lee adds bitterly. He thinks it could have been. He feels that the navy was stunned into timorous passivity by Pearl Harbor.

Mr. Lee's account of life on Bataan and Corregidor is excellent. The last part of the book is less interesting. He goes to Australia about the same time MacArthur did, and later went out with the navy from Honolulu. He flew from an aircraft carrier into Guadalcanal. Here he goes into a phase of the war which has been more fully covered in other books.

John Lardner, another newspaperman, picks up the story of America's war in the Pacific at Australia, to which continent he journeyed aboard a crowded troopship. "Southwest Passage" is a thoroughly beguiling book. Mr. Lardner intentionally avoids "profundities and earth-shaking conclusions" and interests himself in the human and humorous trivia of American boys coping with a strange new world. He is concerned with such matters as "the mosquitoes of the jungle of Darwin; mass wassail at Lennon's Hotel in Port Moresby . . . a soldiers' band concert in the night in Brisbane . . . brawls in Melbourne; crap games and racing and lotteries." He is fascinating on the topic of the Australian rhyming slang which stems from the English underworld of two centuries ago. The term for wife, for instance, is "trouble and strife," which is now shortened to just "trouble." "Plates of meat," now shortened to "plates," means feet, and is regularly so used by the Diggers. Mr. Lardner saw signs of a possible interchange of cultures; "my men," an Australian captain told him, "are using 'goddam' quite a lot more than they did before you chaps came here. Very interesting expression."

Mr. Lardner's book kept this reader chuckling long past his bedtime. Although this son of Ring Lardner may eschew the usual profundities, there is a lot to be seen through his shrewd eyes.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

The Historian as Prophet

FORCE AND FREEDOM: REFLECTIONS ON HISTORY. By Jacob Burckhardt. Edited by James Hastings Nichols. Pantheon Books. $3.50.

JACOB BURCKHARDT, the great Swiss historian, is known to the Anglo-Saxon world primarily as the author of "Civilization of the Renaissance." But he was a philosopher of history as well as a historian, and thus it is fortunate that his reflections on history have finally been made available to us. The material represents Burckhardt's notes for three lecture series prepared for publication by his nephew. The translator, a young American historian, James Hastings Nichols, has added a very able introduction to Burckhardt's thought.

As a philosopher of history Burckhardt accepted neither the idea of progress which the French Enlightenment had popularized nor yet the cyclical interpretation of history which German romanticism had borrowed from classicism and which is best known to us in the thought of that late romantic, Oswald Spengler. On the whole he belonged in the tradition of Ranke, who sought to give history meaning not primarily as a continuum but in terms of the unique value of each moment and epoch. Burckhardt saw little more in the idea of progress than the vulgar illusion "that our time is the consummation of all time" and "that the whole past may be regarded as fulfilled in us."

In seeking to interpret the unique significance of various epochs he analyzed them from the standpoint of the particular balance achieved in each era among three factors—religion, culture, and the state. In making this analysis he refused to accept either the thesis that all cultural realities are but rationalizations of economic and political circumstances or the idealistic interpretation which makes cultural forces primary and all political and economic facts derivative. He had a lively sense of the constant interaction between civilization as the body of a culture and culture as the soul of a civilization, and his insights into these complexities represent a permanent antidote to simple deterministic theories, whether idealistic or materialistic.

Flourishing in the latter half of the nineteenth century and able to point up his historical reflections by contemporary observations which cover post-Napoleonic Europe until the Franco-German war, Burckhardt may be defined as a humanistic anti-democrat. He feared democracy because he thought it would contribute to the development of the totalitarian state. Some of his fears were prompted by the tragic history of France from the generous impulses of the Revolution to the sorry realities of the Napoleonic dictatorship. But it is not merely this bit of history that prompted his fears for the future but profound reflection on the necessity of a delicate balance between traditional cultural factors and emerging forces which he thought the rise of democracy had disturbed.

Though he had little understanding for the positive and creative elements in the bourgeois democratic movement and interpreted its passion for justice quite perversely, he must be credited with the most precise kind of prescience in regard to the twentieth century. No one predicted the modern totalitarian state more accurately. He was certain that its secularized power would be more vexatious than the sacred power of ancient states. He foresaw that peculiar relation between the industrial workshop and the battlefield, between industrial and military power, which characterizes modern militarism. He believed that modern tyrants would use methods which even the most terrible despots of the past would not have had the heart to use. "My mental picture of the terribles simplificateurs who will overrun Europe is not a pleasant one," he wrote a friend. Burckhardt even predicted fairly accurately to what degree a liberal culture in totalitarian countries would capitulate to tyranny through failure to understand the foe.

The accuracy of historical predictions does not necessarily validate the philosophical convictions upon which they are based. Burckhardt's thought, indeed, contains some apprehensions about democracy which history has refuted as definitely as it has justified his fears of the totalitarian state. Nevertheless, Burckhardt's view into the future was something more than successful guessing. He was one of the most profound historical minds of the last century, and he provides a quite unique illumination of our present difficulties.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Print-Makers

THE ARTIST IN AMERICA. By Carl Zigrosser. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THERE is a story of an eminent English artist, by reputation and character above any suspicion of irony, who was heard to reprove a grudging critic of one of W. Russell Flint's water colors by saying that it showed remarkable technical ability, "and, besides, that sort of picture of pretty girls gives great pleasure to City men." Like the critic, the reviewer should appreciate things on their merits without reference to unpurposed aims. Mr. Zigrosser has brought together twenty-four stories—thumbnail "profiles"—of American artists as print-makers. Out of some twenty thousand artists in the country, these—twenty-three real figures and one satirical—were selected by the author "partly by chance, partly by design, chiefly because I have known them best." Interpretation rather than criticism was his aim. His model, on a reduced scale, was Vasari's "racy and vivid record of the artists of his day"; his approach, "to draw faithful and just and convincing portraits," often using the artist's own words, "and in most cases with a knowledge based on lifelong friendship." The publisher's intention was evidently a book "for the table"—not for the shelf. And the result, readable, gossipy, well produced, diversified in content and illustration, like Russell Flint's water colors will undoubtedly give pleasure.

Still, without grudging, one may regret that Mr. Zigrosser did not adopt a tighter framework for his portraits. Each has its individuality. But unfortunately they seem to have no common link beyond an interest in print-making of one sort or another. For all the author's conscious avoidance of a critical approach, a closer consideration of the work of each artist in the light of his own statements of aim and against the general historical background of print-making in the period would have added greatly to the value and interest of the book. Mr. Zigrosser's ability to do this is evident in the two sketches of Federico Castellón and the late Emil Ganso, which stand head and shoulders above the rest. In these the author really shows us both men primarily "as print-makers." We see the personality of Castellón through his interest in contemporary painters and his technical ambitions; we see Ganso's character through his struggle for a mastery of graphic expression and his ambition in his painter-like approach to the medium. But in most of the other sketches the author is apparently distracted from a more scrupulous consideration of the artists "as print-makers" by the availability of autobiographical anecdotes supplied by the artists. This contributes greatly to the general narrative appeal but, through a lack of objective editing, adds little to the pictures of the artists as such. In the case of Castellón and Ganso, whether because biographical anecdotes were lacking or because the author was more interested in the work of these artists than in many of the others, Mr. Zigrosser shows himself a sound and instructive critic. There is no reason he could not have adopted a similar approach to his other subjects with a considerable enhancement of his work. And because of the popular character of the print—its temptation to sacrifice so many aspirations to a ready legibility and the seductions of technical virtuosity —an exacting critical volume along the lines of Mr. Zigrosser's "cross-section" would be particularly valuable today. But if "The Artist in America" does not help us directly toward a critical view of the contemporary print-maker's art in this country, it opens up a surprising vista of activity. And had it no other claim, we should still be in its author's debt for having included among his reproductions of lithographs, woodcuts, and etchings Stieglitz's magnificent photographs—Georgia O'Keefe—Hands, IV, 1919 and Dorothy True, 1919.

JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY

Assignment in Tokyo

TOKYO RECORD. By Otto D. Tolischus. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

BEHIND THE JAPANESE MASK. By Jesse F. Steiner. The Macmillan Company. $2.

MR. TOLISCHUS'S record of his ten months' assignment as a correspondent in Tokyo and his six months' imprisonment after Pearl Harbor makes an important if somewhat indigestible book. The reader with the patience to wade through many pages of dull excerpts from the Japanese press and portions of the author's own dispatches will find scattered here and there observations that really illuminate the dark enigma of Nipponism and some significant new items of information on Japanese politics in those nine months when the militarists were seizing the last remaining controls of the engine of state. Moreover, the last four chapters, in which Mr. Tolischus tells the story of his grim experiences and reflections in prison, have, naturally enough, a vivid and compelling quality which goes some way to redeem the stodginess of the first 300 pages.

It is easy enough to find reasons for these defects. In part they are a testimony to Mr. Tolischus's honesty. He steadfastly refuses to pose as a Japanologist or to indulge in the windy generalizations about the Japanese spirit and way of life that have filled many other recent books on Japan. In the generalizations he does make—about the Japanese political structure, the influence of Shinto, the similarities between Nipponism and Nazism—he presents his facts for the reader to see. Japan was never an easy country to understand, even in the heyday of the so-called liberal era. After the Manchurian grab in 1931 and much more after the assault on China in 1937, even the wisest old hands among the Westerners in Japan found it increasingly hard to judge the shifting balance of political forces and to measure the real strength of the totalitarian tide which was uniting the new technical tricks of Nazism with the old never-extinguished spirit of native feudal militarism and regimentation. The task was made doubly difficult by the incredibly obscure language in which the apostles of the new Japan clothed their reactionary doctrines: two good examples of this literary befuddlement are printed as appendices in Mr. Tolischus's book—one "the Way of Subjects" and the other Fujisawa's "Great Shinto Purification Ritual and the Divine Mission of Nippon." By February, 1941, when Mr. Tolischus reached Tokyo, this process of verbal intoxication had been applied to practically all sections of this population, and the nation was ideologically conditioned for the great military adventure.

Thus the Japanese nation that Mr. Tolischus then met for the first time was already a different political and social creature from the Japan described in most of the standard books. One can therefore hardly blame him if his descriptive passages on Japan, which he intersperses among the notes of his interviews and conversations, are lacking in freshness and in sensitivity to the queer combination of beauty, inhibition, cruelty, and mysticism which characterizes so much of the ordinary life of the Japanese. Mr. Tolischus makes much—probably over much—of the fantastic obscenities which abound in parts of the ancient Japanese books, the "Kojiki" and the "Nihongi," and rightly stresses the Japanese domination of man over woman, but aside from a reference to the gentleness and kindness of the women, he shows little awareness of the everyday life of Suzuki, the Japanese Mr. Smith. That of course was not the purpose of the book. Yet a little more of the daily sights, sounds, and smells of Tokyo and less relash of editorials and news dispatches would have made a vastly more readable and truer book.

Mr. Tolischus was approached by the irrepressible Matsuoka to transmit a "peace plan" for China to the American government—the idea being that President Roosevelt should "advise" Chiang Kai-shek to sue for peace with Japan! Mr. Tolischus himself later took a hand in peace-making by trying to promote—without success—a scheme for sending Matsuoka to Washington. The idea was well received in some quarters in Tokyo, but Matsuoka himself shrewdly declined to go. Having brought home the bacon from Moscow, he probably was loath to spoil his fame by what could only have been a futile mission. The Japanese, as we now know, made the counter-proposal that the President should meet Konoye on a warship in the Pacific.

Those discredited "experts" in the United States who guessed so wrongly about Japan's unwillingness to fight Britain and America may find some slight solace in the fact that practically none of the Americans in Japan were really prepared for December 7. The blustering, the threats, and the political crises had come and gone so often that the last stages in the preparations after Tojo and his gang took control could hardly be distinguished from the previous false alarms. And of course no one, not even the most cynical pessimist, could have foreseen the tragic depths of our military unpreparedness at Pearl Harbor, Manila, and Singapore.

A good general book on contemporary Japan is long overdue and would make an invaluable complement to "Tokyo Record." Professor Steiner's little book, "Behind the Japanese Mask," might well have met this need had it only been couched in a more attractive and less moralizing tone. Even so, the book is a useful introduction for the ordinary reader and gives a sober, simplified account of Japanese religion, militarism, education, women, recreation, regimentation, poverty, and other social characteristics. Because of its dry style the book fails to convey to a non-expert reader any intimate picture of how the ordinary Japanese lives, thinks, and acts, though Professor Steiner from his personal knowledge of small-town Japan is well qualified for just that task. Some enterprising publisher must find another writer who can combine the best of Steiner, Byas, Chamberlin, and Helen Mears before we have the book we really need on Japan.

W. L. HOLLAND

Fiction in Review

TWO books published as novels in recent weeks—"Search for a Key" by Walter Duranty (Simon and Schuster, $2.50) and "A Time to Live" by Michael Blankfort (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50)—can, it seems to me, be called fiction chiefly by virtue of the fact that their authors appear in them under fictional names. Mr. Duranty's book is such out-and-out personal history—it is about a certain Oliver Joby who is born in England, becomes a newspaperman, is lamed in an accident, becomes a foreign correspondent, etc., etc.—that it is hard to understand why it was not frankly presented as autobiography, a form which would have more easily accounted for the sparseness of the narrative and more gracefully accommodated Mr. Duranty's constant excursion into anecdote and reflection. Less patently autobiographical and making more of an effort at conventional fiction form, Mr. Blankfort's book is a perfect textbook of self-castigation and so little creative on any level that it is more case history than novel. But of the two books, Mr. Blankfort's is much the more interesting if only because it is so much sicker. My feeling about "Search for a Key" is largely a rather dreary amazement that a person of Mr. Duranty's worldly experience can be so sophomoric; my feeling about "A Time to Live" is vivid horror before an extensive clinical footnote to the history of the radical movement among American intellectuals.

On the day Pearl Harbor is bombed Mr. Blankfort's Ernie Crompton, a young left-wing playwright, stands upon a peak in Hollywood as upon a cozy bed of hot coals, casting up the score of his moral failures. The trouble with Crompton-Blankfort is that, although he has been a devoted fellow-traveler, he has never had the courage or faith to become a member of the Communist Party. This is the central guilt of his life; around it are circle after circle of related guilts—guilt because as a young boy Ernie had been afraid to go to his father's death bed, guilt because as a young man he had had an income of $50 a week while others starved, guilt because he had continued to write plays instead of going to fight in Spain—guilt, guilt, nothing but guilt. Between Crompton and his hair shirt (or between Blankfort and his hair shirt: Blankfort speaks for himself clearly through his protagonist) there is room for neither irony nor pity, nor yet for common sense. For instance, to his inability, in matters of Communist politics, to substitute the act of faith for the questioning of the mind, Crompton traces the death of his baby at birth (lacking confidence in a C. P. future, Crompton had been unsure he wanted a child) and the death of his wife from leukemia (the disease in which the white blood corpuscles destroy the red blood corpuscles)! "A Time to Live" is a strange psychological document indeed, the most cheerless published evidence I know of the frightening connection between personal guilt and social conscience, and proof, if proof be needed, that if there is little fictional good to be got from a writer's hatred of his friends, there is even less fictional good to be got from a writer's hatred of himself.

To read the even better-than-average short story nowadays is to have an experience so tangential to the real thing that it is rather like having a conversation in a language in which one has had considerable training but in which one is still not fluent. John Cheever's stories, which for the most part have appeared in the New Yorker and which are even more talented than the average stories printed in that magazine, are now collected in a volume called "The Way Some People Live" (Random House, $2): to read them one after another is to end with an intense feeling of frustration. For even the best of Mr. Cheever's pieces, such as The Pleasure of Solitude or The Edge of the World, are strongly worded hints rather than completely communicated statements, and I am led to the conclusion that one of the troubles with short-story writers today, even more than with novelists, is that they not only choose inarticulate characters to write about but then refuse to be articulate for them. It is an artificial and completely self-imposed limitation, of the same order as the fashionable time-limitation in the short story, and I suspect that the sooner it is got rid of, the better for this branch of contemporary fiction.

Hervey Allen's "The Forest and the Fort" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.50) is announced as the first in a series of six long early-American novels. Never having read "Anthony Adverse" I am unable to report how Mr. Allen's new venture measures up to his previous best-seller; but I can report that after a dull and self-conscious start, full of scholarly coyness, "The Forest and the Fort" is a conventionally engrossing story about a little English boy who is captured by the Indians but who in maturity rejoins his own people. Although Mr. Allen could wear his learning more lightly and certainly do more, on the psychological side, with the conflict between Salathiel's English blood and Indian upbringing, his novel is full of absorbing local color and interesting historical incident.

Surely the nicest title of the year is "You Can't Do That to Svoboda" on a little book by John Pen (The Dial Press, $2). It is a nice book, too, on the worm-that-turned theme which is always so heartening both in fiction and in life, and especially endearing when the worm is a Slovakian station porter who turns against the Nazis.

DIANA TRILLING

AMUSEMENTS

John Steinbeck's

THE MOON IS DOWN

Now!

A 20th Century-Fox
Picture

Rivoli
B'WAY AT 40th ST.

LECTURES

SIX LECTURES BY BERTRAND RUSSELL
Philosophy in the Twentieth Century
WEDNESDAYS 8 P. M.

Apr. 18 Henri BERGSON
Apr. 21 George SANTAYANA
Apr. 28 William JAMES

May 5 DIALECTICAL MATERIALISM
May 12 JOHN DEWEY
May 19 BERTRAND RUSSELL

Fee: $3.50 for course, 75c single admission

Rand School 7 East 15th Street ALgonquin 4-3004

DRAMA

So Much for Buckingham

GEORGE COULOURIS'S ambitious revival of "Richard III" (Forrest Theater) gave me a very pleasant evening. How it strikes another will probably depend to a considerable extent upon just what that other is expecting, and the danger is that he will be either insufficiently naive or insufficiently sophisticated. If he is simple-minded enough he ought to find old Crookback's melodramatic villainy entirely to his taste. After all, the play was a prime favorite for more than a century during the period when Shakespeare was a popular playwright in the simplest sense of the phrase, and drew better than "Hamlet" despite the fact that even then critics and scholars shook their heads over what seemed to them an unworthy preference. Middlebrows, on the other hand, will certainly discover sufficient reasons for refusing to take the whole thing seriously, and it no doubt requires more interest in a certain sort of thing than the average citizen can stir up to find fascination in contemplating the fact that a play can be alternately so good and so bad, so obviously puerile and at the same time so obviously the work of a man of genius.

"Richard III" is of course one of the very earliest of Shakespeare's plays and indisputably prentice work despite the expertness with which language is handled by a writer who was not yet much of anything except a man of words. Of course a playwright who could set down as the very first line of an immature play such a sentence as "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by this son of York" would be, by the evidence of that one line alone, a man of mark. On the one hand, it fills both the mouth of the speaker and the ear of the hearer with some kind of majestic music serving far better than any flourish of trumpets could to announce tragedy and to set a mood. On the other hand, it is also great poetry by virtue of qualities other than the merely musical, for it makes a clearly intelligible statement at the same time that it enriches the meaning of that statement by a series of words each highly evocative, and in the play of meaning on "son" it demonstrates that the author had already mastered one of his finest tricks—the trick of making a pun serve the highest purposes of poetry. Just suppose that one of our own most ambitious and most talented aspirants toward tragedy—Eugene O'Neill or Maxwell Anderson let us say—could achieve one remotely comparable line, not at the beginning of a play, but at some climax where the situation cries out for beauty and dignity of language. How the whole play would then be lifted, how what the author now seems barely able to raise off the ground would soar on wings of emotion! Many times in the course of "Richard III" Shakespeare writes lines and whole passages almost as fine, though sometimes, as in the case of Richmond's speech to the soldiers, he falls back on feeble commonplaces that leave the hearer, who has been led to expect something better, depressed and almost embarrassed.

But of course the unevenness of the play as a play is even more striking. There are three or four brilliantly executed scenes, but if you were to take them away you would have left only a limping chronicle set forth in a form which has hardly evolved beyond that of the morality play and in which both action and characters seem less genuinely dramatic than parts of a stiffly formal pageant. For the most part the character drawing is of the most primitive sort, and the author seems to know so little of the world that one is tempted to call the play part of some Child's History of England or to say that the kings, queens, and courtiers seem at times to have stepped out of Alice's Wonderland, or that the author is anticipating either "The Young Visitors" or "1066 and All That." When Colley Cibber added his famous line "Off with his head! So much for Buckingham," he was as much in the manner of part of the play as he was out of the manner of other parts of it. There are, indeed, times when Richard is a good deal like Lewis Carroll's irascible queen who responded to all difficulties with the same command.

Mr. Coulouris's production wisely attempts no new or forced "interpretation"; instead it presents the play simply, intelligibly, and forcefully for just what it obviously is—a rather primitive melodrama lighted by flashes of genius. Mr. Coulouris himself reads the lines very well, and so does every major member of the cast.

"Kiss and Tell" (Biltmore Theater) gave me another very enjoyable evening of a different sort. Probably it is not so important to explain that the plot has to do with a complicated situation which compels a nice young girl to pretend to her parents that she is pregnant by the adolescent lout who lives next door as it is to say simply that "Kiss and Tell" is what is called "a typical Abbott farce" and is just that at very nearly its best. Two or three commercially successful plays of the season have attempted to provide fun of the same sort; none of the others came off so far as I am concerned, but "Kiss and Tell" very decidedly does. Possibly the author of the script, which doesn't sound like very much in description, has more to do with the happy results than one is at first inclined to give him credit for. The fact remains, however, that the whole thing might be pretty flat if it were not for Mr. Abbott's skilful touch and for a fine cast which includes the always expert Jessie Royce Landis as well as an assortment of good performers of various ages from about twelve on up.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

IT WAS Mr. Downes—when Mr. Petrillo was trying to unionize the Boston Symphony—who used to contend that the members of this orchestra were better off than the members of the union orchestras. Now—when the Boston Symphony has just signed up with the union—it is a member of one of the union orchestras who tells us* that all these years the Boston Symphony men have been better off than his fellow-players in the New York Philharmonic. But it happens not to be true. Mr. Downes's statements led me a couple of years ago to do a little investigating, the results of which I gave in this column and now give again.

During the season of 1939-40, I found, a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra who was paid the minimum weekly rate provided by the union contract (about half of an orchestra gets this rate) received $80 a week for the 32 weeks of the winter season, $80 a week plus a $7.25 per diem allowance for the two weeks of the post-season tour, and $60 a week for the eight weeks of the Dell summer season. The analogous player in the non-union Boston Symphony received $70 a week for the 30 weeks of the winter season, $60 a week for the ten weeks of the "Pops" season, and $70 a week for the three weeks of the Berkshire Festival; and he may or may not have been one of the 50 men who received $50 a week for the three weeks of the Esplanade season. The Philadelphia man worked 42 weeks for $3,200—making the average during the year $61 a week; the Boston man worked either 43 weeks for $2,910 or 46 weeks for $3,060—making his average either $56 or $59 a week.

* See Mr. Calmen Fiebig's letter on page 330.

What now of the analogous player in the New York Philharmonic? Since 1935-36 his minimum pay for the winter season under the union contract has been $90 a week; the 1935-36 contract brought him this amount for 30 weeks, the 1936-37 contract for 24 weeks, the 1937-38 contract for 28 weeks, the next four contracts for 30 weeks, this year's contract for 28 weeks. During 1939-40, therefore, and as recently as 1941-42 he received $90 a week for 30 weeks, then $92 a week for the eight weeks of the Stadium season; which is to say that he worked 38 weeks for $3,436—making his average $66 a week. And even during the present year he will have worked 36 weeks for $3,256—making the average $62.50. In other words, he has worked fewer weeks to earn more money than the non-union Boston Symphony man and even the union Philadelphia man.

The union contract also specifies the number of "services"—units of playing time, whether in rehearsal or concert—which the player must give each week in return for his pay. In the case of the New York Philharmonic it is five rehearsals of two and a half hours each, and three or four concerts; and I feel safe in saying that this amounts to no more than the Philadelphia Orchestra man must give under his contract. It is in fact a standard to which even the non-union Boston Symphony has adhered for the most part; but whereas the union has held the New York Philharmonic rigidly to the five rehearsals of exactly two and a half hours each, and exacted additional pay for any additional rehearsal, Koussevitzky has been able to call the Boston Symphony to an additional rehearsal without additional pay when he has wished to do so.

The standard five two-and-a-half-hour rehearsals are what have been found necessary and sufficient for the preparation of the week's programs: the program for the pair of concerts in the chief series—Friday and Saturday in Boston and Philadelphia, Thursday and Friday in New York—takes most of the week's rehearsals; at the other concerts—Monday and Tuesday in Boston, Saturday and Sunday in New York—there are repetitions of some of the works prepared for the chief series, and some new works prepared in the remaining rehearsal time. The New York Philharmonic sometimes prepares only one program for all four concerts of the week; sometimes it repeats part of the Thursday-Friday program on Saturday and Sunday, with new works prepared at the Saturday morning rehearsal; sometimes it combines these new works with works from earlier Thursday-Friday programs. But almost never does it prepare even two completely new programs in one week.

Not only has the New York Philharmonic played fewer weeks in the year than the Boston Symphony, and rehearsed fewer hours in the week, but it has in recent years not worked with the taxing, fatiguing, exhausting intensity of effort and concentration with which the Boston Symphony has had to work under Koussevitzky at rehearsals and concerts to produce the precision and finish and tonal beauty of its performances. It was when it was exhausted by work of this kind under Toscanini that the Philharmonic played with similar precision and finish and tonal beauty. But the next week, under another conductor, it would sit back and take things easy and play sloppily; whereas the Boston Symphony under Szell recently maintained itself a great orchestra. And that difference has nothing to do with wages and hours and democratic dismissal machinery—any more than the difference between the Philadelphia Orchestra which has maintained itself a great orchestra under Ormandy, and the Philharmonic which deteriorated during the three seasons when it had Barbirolli as permanent conductor to make work easy and dismissals a thing not of the Philharmonic world.

Orchestras which behave like the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia are entitled to a say on dismissals; but with the Philharmonic one would fear that it might do what in fact it is doing now. Through its spokesman it contends that the present unjustified, terroristic dismissals by a new conductor who doesn't know the orchestra make necessary an orchestra committee to review them; but the demand for the committee seems rather to be part of an attempt to prevent dismissals that are legitimate. Rodzinski conducted the orchestra for two weeks in the season of 1934-35, eight weeks in 1936-37, four weeks in 1941-42, four weeks in 1942-43, and a few periods at the Stadium; by now he knows the orchestra well enough to know who he thinks should be out of it for one reason or another; and most of his decisions seem justified.

B. H. HAGGIN

UNITED NATIONS IN AMERICA DINNER

HOTEL BILTMORE

Saturday, April 17, 1943, 6:30 P. M.

DONALD OGDEN STEWART, Chairman

SPEAKERS:

DOROTHY THOMPSON WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

EDWARD G. ROBINSON

GRACE MOORE will sing the National Anthem, with RAY LEV at the piano

DR. IRA deA. REID, in a testimonial to Prof. Franz Boas
EARL G. HARRISON, United States Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, will be presented with the Annual Award of the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born by CONGRESSMAN VITO MARCONANTONIO

CANADA LEE will read a poem by Stephen Vincent Benet

The 40 Guests of Honor will include:

DR. JOSE ANTONIO AGUIRRE ARCHBISHOP ATHENAGORAS
ELISABETH BERGNER
STEFAN HEYM
MAURICE HINDUS
LEO KRZYCKI
YASUO KUNIYOSHI

PROF. MAX LERNER
DR. LI YU YING
LT. COL. WILLIAM O'DWYER
GREGOR PIATIGORSKY
KRISHNALAL SHRIDHARANI
VILHJALMUR STEFANSSON
GENEVIEVE TABOUIS

Reservations: $3.50 per person

Auspices:

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR PROTECTION OF FOREIGN BORN
512 Fifth Avenue ■ PENNSYLVANIA 6-8508 • New York, N. Y.

Next week—

another NEW REPUBLIC supplement!

CHARTER for AMERICA

A summary and exposition of the NRPB report

Contained within the massive reports of The National Resources Planning Board are stirring proposals affecting the future welfare of every American. This is our Beveridge Plan, to be discussed, debated and finally enacted into laws which will give the people a new charter of rights and liberties.

The editors of the NEW REPUBLIC have assumed the task of translating these Reports into a clear and simple exposition of the Plan. They have gone carefully over the documents submitted by the President to Congress. They have analyzed the proposals, explained them, and in some instances offered criticisms and suggestions.

To be published next week as the latest of the celebrated NEW REPUBLIC Supplements, theirs is the first exposition of the Report and is likely to be the clearest and fairest that will be offered to the public in short and readable form.

Charter for America, like "A Congress to Win the War," "This Man Willkie," and many others, will be widely read as a political document. It will appear as a separately bound supplement to the issue dated April 19.

Paper restriction this year prevents an increase in newsstand distribution. To be sure of getting your copy of Charter for America, you must subscribe NOW.

Special introductory rate: 13 weeks for $1

SCISSORS.

REGULAR RATES

One Year: $5.00
Two Years: $8.00
Three Years: $11.00

Armed Services
Special Rate:
$3.00 a Year

Canadian and foreign postage $1.00 extra

The NEW REPUBLIC

40 East 49th Street, New York City

For the enclosed $..... enter my subscription to THE NEW REPUBLIC { weeks
{ year(s)

Name.....

Address.....

in full.....

N 4-10-43

Letters to the Editors

Russia and the Communist Party

Dear Sirs: Ralph Bates's review of "America, Russia, and the Communist Party in the Post-War World" by Counts and Childs strikes me as curiously anachronistic. It smells of the good old days of the "united front" when all good liberals were terrified into silence by the fear that any mild criticism of Communist policy might encourage the reactionaries to "red-baiting." Thus Mr. Bates chides the authors for their very reasoned criticism of the policies of the Communist Party by suggesting that "Messrs. Counts and Childs are not threatening the U. S. S. R. with their displeasure but with the might of stark reaction." In fact Counts and Childs are anxious to achieve genuine collaboration with Russia in the post-war world and are afraid that the irrelevancies of local Communists will imperil that collaboration by seeming to justify reactionary opposition to partnership with Russia.

We desperately need a united front between the United Nations, but Mr. Bates is very much in error if he thinks that the only way it can be established is by the old "united-front" domestic strategy in which the Communist Party always called the tune. He is also in error if he thinks that the arguments advanced in this book represent no more than "a personal political feud" and that the book advocates a policy to "please a group of liberals." Let him read the speech of Jim Carey, secretary of the C. I. O., at the Ehrlich-Alter protest meeting and meditate upon the significance of the refusal of the British Labor Party to receive the Communist Party into the parliamentary Labor Party, despite the very strong sentiment in British labor for collaboration with Russia. There is a good deal more than liberal squeamishness behind the belief that a political party owing primary allegiance to another nation cannot effectively serve either the cause of labor in our nation or the cause of partnership with Russia.

Mr. Bates thinks that to "ask the champion of one powerful school [of socialism], the most powerful as it happens, to commit suicide to please a group of liberals is, when not dangerous, quite farcical." Such a formulation of the thesis of Counts and Childs is nonsensical. Russia is the champion of this "most powerful school of socialism"; and no one is asking Russia to commit suicide. No one is suggesting that any demands be made upon Russia with reference to its political life. Without Russia the Communist Party is not the most powerful school of socialism; and it is not being asked to commit suicide. The question is whether it would not be wise to demand, as a minor price for our eventual alliance with Russia, that it refrain from interfering in our political life through a party obviously, all too obviously, controlled by Russia.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, April 3

A Challenge to Reaction

Dear Sirs: In 1919-20 the American Senate refused to ratify the Treaty of Versailles and the Covenant of the League of Nations, which was an integral part of that treaty. Thereby our country turned its face away from Woodrow Wilson's concept of collective security and embarked on an isolationist course, the fruits of which we are reaping today. In the years since the close of the last war American historians have often debated the following two questions: (1) Was a majority of the American people really opposed to our entry into the League of Nations? (2) Was the League of Nations the real issue in the elections of 1920? It is interesting to note that the answers to both questions, according to many authorities, are in the negative.

Once again we find ourselves in a position which parallels to a remarkable extent the situation of 1919-20. Our present Congress may be called upon to ratify the peace treaty at the close of the Second World War. In this Congress, however, we find a large number of Representatives who are opposed to the Roosevelt Administration's foreign—and domestic—policies. The main strength of this opposition lies in its claims that it represents the American people better than does the present Administration. The Congressional elections of last November, the opposition leaders assert, constituted a clear defeat for the policies of our President.

Such an interpretation of those elections, it seems to me, is questionable.

First of all, the Democrats retain a clear majority in both houses of the new Congress. (The country may not have been fully aware that the loyalty of some of these Democratic Representatives to their party chief was purely nominal.) Secondly, and this seems the crux of the situation, the return of numerous notorious isolationists may have been possible only because large numbers of voters—ordinarily supporters of President Roosevelt and his policies—were away from home, either in defense industries or in the army. Had these two groups voted in 1942 as they did in previous elections, there is a distinct possibility that Fish, Brooks, and others of their type might not have been re-elected. Certainly, Fish and Brooks won by the narrowest majorities of their careers.

If those of us who favor a system of collective security are to avoid the disillusionment of the last peace, it would seem desirable that the American people be given another chance in the near future to express their opinion. November, 1944, may be too late. I realize that the Constitution does not provide for a referendum. An unofficial nation-wide poll, however, might well serve as a substitute. An expression of opinion on the following two questions might prove of great value: (1) Should the United Nations sponsor some type of international organization the purpose of which would be the elimination of international anarchy in the post-war world? (2) Do you believe that the Atlantic Charter constitutes a desirable goal for which the United States should work in the post-war world?

It is of interest to note that a similar poll on foreign policy was conducted in the autumn of 1934 in Britain by the League of Nations Union. The results revealed clearly that a large proportion of the British people favored support of the League and even military sanctions, if necessary, against aggressor nations. The effect on the subsequent policies of the Baldwin government was clearly discernible.

Regardless of what the decision of the American people might be, it seems to me that such a poll would be worth while. If, as I believe, the foreign policies of the present Administration should be indorsed, then the isolationists and advocates of "power politics" would find the ground cut from under their feet. The waverers would probably become more enthusiastic in their support of the Executive. The opposition leaders would no longer be able to boast that they represent the American people better than does the President. If, on the other hand, the American people voted against collective security and the Four Freedoms, that too, though foreshadowing a dismal future for the world, would be of some value. The present Administration would recognize the danger of making commitments which might later be repudiated. And believers in collective security could redouble their educational efforts.

Such a poll would, of course, involve great expense and labor. The expense might be met partly by public subscription and partly, perhaps, by trade unions and other liberal organizations. College students, I believe, particularly members of the Foreign Policy Association or International Relations clubs, would be ready to contribute their labor. The schools and colleges throughout the country might contribute the necessary space for voting. The main problem, outside of raising the necessary funds, would be to obtain a mass turnout of the people. If such a poll proved successful, however, the desirability of using it for other purposes—on domestic issues, for example—would be evident. The results might well show the desirability of passing an amendment to the Constitution providing for national referendums on all crucial issues.

SYDNEY H. ZEBEL

New York, March 31

What's in a Name?

Dear Sirs: I don't want to take up too much space, but I must make a brief reply to Mr. Spencer's comment on my letter about Alden Brooks's "Will Shakespeare and the Dyer's Hand."

Mr. Spencer misunderstood my letter. When I suggested that a lawyer might be better than a professor in dealing with the case I did not mean an ambulance chaser.

I take issue particularly, however, with Mr. Spencer when he says, lightly, that "the important thing to do is not to worry about who wrote the plays, but to read them." I presume he takes the view that it does not matter who wrote them. I dissent most violently. I doubt that Mr. Spencer realizes the implications of his remark. As a professional writer I say it is of paramount importance who wrote what and which and when. I say that literature is vitally interested in authorship, that is, in who wrote the books that make up literature. I do not believe that any professional writer, that is, one who lives on his writings, could make such a remark. I am quite sure that Mr. Spencer is interested in seeing that nobody else gets the credit for the writing of his own fine work.

E. M. Forster once wrote an excellent essay on Anonymity. He maintained brilliantly that literature should be anonymous. I noted that his name was on the pamphlet. I disagree with him. I want to know who was responsible for what are known as Shakespeare's plays.

WILLIAM MCFEB

Brookfield, Conn., March 26

"Democratic" Segregation

Dear Sirs: The army has brought Jim Crow not only to this camp but also to the local community. The colored troops have to keep out of "white" places and we have also been given instructions not to associate with Negro soldiers or to frequent particular bars and cafes set aside for Negroes. This was military "democratic" segregation, for both groups had their places. Segregation was practically unheard of in the town before the army established this camp.

The Negro barracks are at an extreme end of the post. And strangely enough, the only democratic barracks are the guardhouse. Here the military does not differentiate—all poor soldiers. But why not all good soldiers? My two-day visit was my first opportunity to fraternize with a colored soldier. He was unable to understand "how I'm good enough to die for this democracy and freedom talk but not good enough to die alongside a white American."

My total fury in regard to racial hatred arose when I was advised during my basic training in the South to "tie my shoestring" when a colored officer appeared. If you did meet one face to face, you would just have to salute him. I wanted to fight alongside "Bigger"—

PRIVATE

March 15

U. S. Army Air Force

The Basic Problem

Dear Sirs: Permit me to congratulate your Washington editor, Mr. Stone, for his critical analysis of the Roosevelt post-war security program. Political liberals have consistently dabbled with economic palliatives, like unemployment insurance and public assistance. Such palliatives are dangerous nonsense. They direct people's energies into the wrong channels; they accomplish nothing when they are enacted into law; and they provide only disappointment and disillusionment for the masses. There is no reason why we cannot create an economic set-up which will provide a steadily expanding economy, a maximum utilization of our productive resources, and a job for every man. Such an economic program is the sine qua non of any effective post-war policy. If we assume, as most liberals do, that "jobs for all" and consistent full-time utilization of productive resources are impossible of attainment, then we must assume also the inevitability of more war, further advances for fascism, and continued decay of the type of civilization which liberals would like to preserve and strengthen. Given a failure to solve the basic economic problem, all the social security in the world can never stop these inevitable retrogressive trends.

Congratulations again to Mr. Stone for his ability not only to cover day-to-day events but to get down to fundamentals.

MARTIN M. SPENCER

Brooklyn, N. Y., March 3

"Little Drops of Water . . ."

Dear Sirs: Irwin Edman inquires, in The Nation for March 20, who besides John Kieran knows that Julia Carney wrote "Little drops of water, little grains of sand." He says that her heart is in the right place, even if her name is in oblivion.

It is not so bad as that. Anybody in Galesburg, Illinois, can tell you who wrote the lines. About a decade ago the Galesburg Civic Art League honored her memory. The address upon that occasion was made by none other than Julia Carney's son, an attorney residing in that city.

H. S. HOLSOPLLE

Los Angeles, Cal., March 25

To Pick the Crops

Dear Sirs: Each day numberless Puerto Ricans die from starvation. I know their plight at first-hand.

Senator Chavez, head of the committee investigating that situation, sensibly urges that a large number of the island's jobless be brought in to pick our vegetable and fruit crops. Why not an immediate order by President Roosevelt to bring in shiploads of them for work in labor-shortage areas? This would cut across all red tape.

As a labor organizer working in Puerto Rico before Pearl Harbor, I often had to revive women who fainted from hunger at meetings where I spoke. I found it expedient to carry a first-aid kit, hot liquids in thermos bottles, and emergency food. Everywhere I saw evidence of people starving, dying on their feet.

ROSE PESOTTA,

Vice-President International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union
New York, March 27

The Philharmonic

Dear Sirs: It was indeed a great surprise and shock, not only to me, a constant reader of your liberal organ, but to all my fellow-musicians, to read Mr. Haggin's article on the Philharmonic controversy.

He has not touched on the broad and basic economic and political causes, and has treated it purely as a musical problem. The committee of the orchestra has tried to point out that no true analysis of this struggle can be achieved by an isolation of the musical factors alone, since they are so completely dependent on the other and hidden factors which so many critics, in their musical ivory towers, are completely ignorant of.

Mr. Haggin shows his ignorance of these determining factors in his column in The Nation of March 20. He states in essence that the orchestra is rebellious, wishes to dominate conductors, and is essentially lethargic and lazy. This is understandable from Olin Downes, traditionally anti-union and anti-labor, but a critic on a liberal weekly should be able to look beneath the surface and see the bottom of the floating iceberg!

Is it likely that only their general psychological make-up makes the men in the Philharmonic different from those in the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras? We know that men, even musicians, under the same conditions are pretty much alike in their mass reaction. Is it sheer coincidence that the men in the Philharmonic are different? Or is it the result of the abuses of the past, which have given rise to the present situation?

Mr. Haggin complains of the men's lethargy and indifference. The men know it as plain and unadulterated physical fatigue from the torment of the heaviest schedule of any symphony orchestra in the world! No other orchestra has three different programs a week to rehearse and a new conductor every other week or so.

The policy of underpaying the men and overpaying the star conductors and soloists leads to the necessity, if one is to exist, of finding more work on the outside, which is even more conducive to the fatigue. The average wage in the Philharmonic Orchestra for a twenty-eight-week season, if spread out over the year, is only $43 a week. And this is the cream of the profession! On the other hand, the members of the Boston Orchestra are kept gainfully employed for forty-six weeks of the year and have no need to look for outside work. They have, at most, two different programs a week to rehearse with a conductor they are thoroughly familiar with. This means the elimination of hours of needless, mechanized physical labor.

Mr. Haggin should now realize that rebelliousness stems from a fundamental cause and is not just inherent in Philharmonic men.

Your critic intimates that we ride roughshod over our conductors and wish to keep Dr. Rodzinski from making legitimate changes. The members of the orchestra have never opposed changes for the good of the orchestra. What, however, is happening here? Dr. Rodzinski is not yet permanent conductor; he has had no time to know the abilities of the great majority of men he is firing. In fact, during his short stay as guest conductor it would have been impossible for him to do so. We have no objections to dismissals for the good of the orchestra, but when the men see some of the best players getting the ax, they know that these firings were never meant for the betterment of the orchestra.

Why is it not a matter of concern to our critics that the basic living conditions in our orchestra are so intolerable that our great soloists such as Harry Glantz, trumpet, and Benjamin Kohon, bassoon, considered by musicians the greatest in their fields, have left or are leaving the orchestra of their own will?

Who wishes a first-rate orchestra—the men who make a living from it or the management which, by its economic policy, is making a first-class orchestra impossible to maintain?

We can assure Mr. Haggin that, given the right conditions, disciplinary power and terrorism are not necessary to achieve artistic heights. Mr. Haggin seems to apply to music a Victorian labor policy of fear. We are proud of our work; we wish as much as any conductor to give good performances. If the Philharmonic management were to use a system of rewards for ability and merit instead of their present policy, the greatest orchestra in the world would emerge from the present chaos and confusion.

Mr. Haggin states that we wish to deprive the conductor of his disciplinary powers. At the same time he lavishly praises the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras. Evidently the conductors of these orchestras have not lost their disciplinary powers. Yet they have already in operation exactly what we wish here, a democratic dismissal machinery. We are only asking for what these orchestras already have.

If the critics feel that these orchestras are superior, then they should favor the establishment of the Boston plan for democracy in music here.

CALMEN FLEISIG, Chairman Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra Committee
New York, March 22

[Mr. Haggin's comment on Mr. Fleisig's letter will be found on page 534.]

CONTRIBUTORS

PETER SAAR was formerly editor of Westland, a liberal weekly published in Saarbrücken which opposed the return of the Saar to Germany. In 1939 he went to Paris and made anti-Nazi broadcasts in German for the French Ministry of Information. When the Germans occupied Paris, he was sent to a concentration camp, from which he later escaped.

JOHN LARISON in travels through the West has been able to observe the Japanese relocation camps ever since their establishment and to speak with the Japanese who live in them.

F. C. WEISKOPF, a German-Czech writer, worked from 1933 to 1938 on the largest anti-Henlein magazine published in the Sudetenland. Last year he published a novel, "Dawn Breaks."

LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD, in the days of the Weimar Republic, was editor of the Berlin Tagebuch, an influential liberal journal. After Hitler came to power he edited the Neues Tagebuch in Paris. Since coming to America he has published "World in Trance: From Versailles to Pearl Harbor."

W. L. HOLLAND, a New Zealander, is research director of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $9; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new one required for change of address.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 8

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 This is the man for posers!
- 6 The taxer, slightly disguised, demands more
- 9 He hates to get up in the morning (hyphen, 3 and 4)
- 10 A request to be more economical is seemingly futile
- 11 Hidden in: I've piloted a dozen twin-engined buses, but she was always my favorite
- 12 Lettie, if you know her well
- 13 Haggard heroine
- 15 Dunker
- 17 Satin's poor relation
- 18 Profitable result of a change of seats
- 19 Foreign cottage with robust interior
- 22 This day will never return
- 25 An animal doctor in reduced circumstances
- 27 "It's a man!" And it's what a man needs, too
- 28 An Arab, I
- 30 Defenseless? There's a weapon concealed in it!
- 31 Quickly grasped by the knowledgeable
- 32 Schoolboys are soon sated with them
- 33 Fabric assessed when torn

DOWN

- 1 Watch out when the doctor has his hand on this
- 2 Sounds a limited sort of dance (hyphen, 3 and 4)
- 3 A temporary withdrawal of sea power (two words, 3 and 4)

- 4 Slides, in a way
- 5 European currency in troubled waters
- 6 Mourning became her
- 7 A support for the board
- 8 He believes, no doubt, that abstinence makes the heart grow fonder
- 14 We have been advised to make it slowly
- 15 Get a long little doggie
- 16 The returning sailor declares himself a deserter
- 17 You can't write with this pen
- 20 Man and insect are unyielding
- 21 Most puzzlers found them inexplicable in Nero's day
- 23 An extortioner, not a superannuated Thespian
- 24 Three of a kind—or one of them, anyway
- 25 Covered wagon and backward youth proclaim what Genghis Khan was
- 26 Tin can containing acid
- 29 So Ned ferreted out the news

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 7

ACROSS:—1 DIETRICH; 5 ONAGER; 10 NEEDLES; 11 ADVERTS; 12 ENACTS; 14 BRICOLE; 16 INCENSE; 17 SHAVE; 18 IDE; 20 PARACHUTE; 22 TOSS; 24 MYOPE; 26 REVENUE; 29 PRESIDED; 30 STEINS; 32 AIMLESS; 31 THEATRE; 34 STRESS; 35 WAVE THAT.
DOWN:—1 DONKEY; 2 EYEWASH; 3 RELATIVE; 4 CASE; 6 NOVICE; 7 GARBLED; 8 RESISTED; 9 CAIRN; 13 SNAKE; 14 DEBATED; 15 ISTHMUS; 19 STOP-GAPS; 21 EYE TO EYE; 23 STEAMER; 25 POINTER; 26 RIDERS; 27 VESSE, 28 ASLEEP; 31 ETNA.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- New Horizons in Criminology: The American Crime Problem.* By Harry Elmer Barnes and Negley K. Teeters. Prentice-Hall. $6.
- Pioneer to the Past: The Story of James Henry Breasted, Archaeologist.* By Charles Breasted. Scribner's. $3.50.
- The English People: Impressions and Observations.* By D. W. Brogan. Knopf. $3.
- The Reference Function of the Library.* Edited by Pierce Butler. Chicago. $4.
- Manpower for Victory.* By John J. Corson. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.
- The Little Prince.* By Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.
- Honorary Degrees: A Survey of Their Use and Abuse.* By Stephen Edward Epler. American Council on Public Affairs. $2.75.
- Overcoming Anti-Semitism.* By Solomon Anshil Fineberg. Harper. $2.
- Nurses in Action.* By Colonel Julia O. Flikke, A. U. S. Lippincott. $2.50.
- Lee's Lieutenants: A Study in Command.* Vol. II. Cedar Mountain to Chancellorsville. By Douglas Southall Freeman. Scribner's. $5.
- Are Empires Doomed: Imperialism and the Peoples' War.* By Lionel Gelber. Bruce Humphries. 50 cents.
- Consumers in Wartime: A Guide to Family Economy in the Emergency.* By Leland J. Gordon. Harper. $1.75.
- Grand Seigneurs: The Life and Loves of Prince Hermann Puechler-Mushau, 1783-1871.* By Felix Gross. Creative Age Press. $3.
- Exploring the Dangerous Trader: The Autobiography of Alice Hamilton, M. D.* Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown. $5.
- Dynamite Cargo: Convoy to Russia.* By Fred Herman. Vanguard. $2.
- We Can Win This War.* By Colonel W. F. Kerman. Little, Brown. $1.50.
- One Man's West.* By David Lavender. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.
- Economic Union and Durable Peace.* By Otto Tod Mallory. Harper. $2.
- Wartime "Prosperity" and the Future.* By Wesley C. Mitchell. National Bureau of Economic Research. 35 cents.
- Passengers to Mexico: The Last Invasion of the Americas.* By Blair Niles. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.
- Forward with Science.* By Rogers D. Rusk. Knopf. $3.50.
- Mutiny in January.* By Carl Van Doren. Viking. $3.50.
- Forever Young: A Life of John Keats.* By Blanche Colton Williams. Putnam's. $3.50.
- The Old Dirt Dobber's Garden Book.* By Thomas A. Williams. McBride. $2.75.
- One World.* By Wendell Willkie. Simon and Schuster. $2.
- The World of Yesterday.* An Autobiography by Stefan Zweig. Viking. $3.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 17, 1943

NUMBER 16

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Public Opinion and Foreign Policy
- Post-War Money
- Home-Front Offensive

ARTICLES

- History Without Education by I. F. Stone
- Britain's Political Revival by Tom Wintringham
- Imperialism of the Sky by Keith Hutchison
- 50 Years Ago in The Nation
- Fascist Pie for Veterans by Victor Riesel
- Diffident Invitation to a Rationed Dinner
- A Poem by Irwin Edman*
- Letters from Nation Associates
- The Second Front Reconsidered
- by Donald W. Mitchell*
- In the Wind

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Political Unity First by Norman Angell
- Nogues—Case Study in Opportunism by Emile Buré
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus
- File and Remember

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall
- The Boy from Illinois by Louis Fischer
- Nationalism in Eden by Rustem Vamberg
- Gandhi's Genius by Ralph Bates
- Skilled Workers by Frank Jones
- Mr. Smith by George Joel
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling
- Drama: High, Wide, and Handsome
- by Joseph Wood Krutch*
- Art by Jean Connolly
- Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 9 by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

541

The Shape of Things

THE TWELFTH WAR-TIME MEETING BETWEEN

Hitler and Mussolini was held as the British and American forces in southern Tunisia joined hands to crowd Rommel into his last African foxhole. The final phase of the African operations is at hand, but it may prove a prolonged one owing to the great defensive possibilities of the Bizerte-Tunis triangle. How much time can Rommel give us? That must have been the question preoccupying the two dictators at their conference, for their immediate strategic plans must depend largely on whether the dénouement in Africa comes in weeks or months. So long as Rommel resists, the danger of Allied invasions in Europe is likely to be postponed and the Axis given one last chance to seize the initiative with a surprise offensive which would disrupt Allied plans. A Berlin radio report of the Hitler-Mussolini meeting spoke of "a survey of Continental reserves" drafted for the occasion. Those reserves are still formidable, but the problem of where they can be most effectively employed remains. According to some reports, Mussolini wants them used for the defense of Italy, and in his exposed position he is able to show some of the strength of weakness. Hitler cannot well afford the collapse of Italy; but can he yield to Italian demands for men and materials without weakening other fronts? We hope that the Anglo-American High Command can sharpen this dilemma of the over-extended conqueror.

✱

WHEN THE UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE

on problems of food and agriculture in the post-war world opens at Hot Springs, Virginia, on May 18, this country will be represented by a most able delegation. We particularly welcome the inclusion of Paul H. Appleby, Under Secretary for Agriculture, and Murray D. Lincoln, of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation and the Cooperative League. Mr. Appleby has distinguished himself as an administrator in the Department of Agriculture, and he demonstrated his democratic caliber by resigning from the State Department when his adverse report on the Peyrouton appointment was disregarded. Under Mr. Lincoln's leadership the Ohio Farm Bureau has developed a great program of consumers' cooperation, and at the same time has refused to back the selfish policies of the Farm Bureau Federation. The cooperative movement is spreading rapidly in America and fully deserves the recognition accorded to it by this appointment. Moreover, it has close links with cooperative organizations in Europe which are certain to play an important role in post-war reconstruction.

✕

BUT WHILE APPLAUDING THE PRESIDENT'S appointment of delegates, we feel bound to join in the mounting volume of protests against the press policies which he has laid down for the conference. Newspapersmen are to be excluded except from two plenary sessions at the beginning and end. They are not to be allowed in the hotel where it is to be held, and all information will be channeled through the office which Michael J. McDermot, chief of the Division of Current Information of the State Department, is to set up in the town nearby. We imagine that Mr. Roosevelt is hoping by this scheme to avoid the kind of propaganda in which delegates to any big international conference are apt to indulge through the medium of the press. But unless he proposes to hold the delegates incommunicado, we don't think his plan will work. Our foreign visitors may well resent having all information relayed through an American press officer, and they will find ways and means to get their story out. The American reporter, put on his mettle by this challenge, will also find ways and means of telling it. We cannot think this is a case where secrecy is justified or possible, and the only result of attempting to keep information from the people is likely to be the creation of unfortunate suspicions.

✕

THE NEW BRITISH COMMON WEALTH PARTY, after several near misses described by Tom Wintringham in an article on page 548, has scored a political hit in a by-election at Eddisbury, Cheshire. Its successful candidate is John Loverseed, a veteran flier for the Spanish Republic and the R. A. F., and his feat is all the more notable because, standing on a very radical platform, he won a majority in a rural and normally conservative district. As Mr. Wintringham suggests, the political tide in Britain is still flowing strongly to the left. We are not certain, however, that his forecast of a Labor Party revolt against the National Government and an early general election will be upheld by events. After this article was written in early March Mr. Churchill made a speech which, while making no specific promises, outlined a post-war policy of social and economic reform. The Prime Minister, it would appear, had noticed the signs of political restlessness and was seeking to prevent its crystallization by hints that he himself was ready to adopt a broadly progressive post-war program. Recent dispatches indicate that his speech may have checked a movement inside the Labor Party to demand the Beveridge plan now, or else. The Labor Party members in the government are strongly in favor of continuing the political truce, and while they will no doubt meet stiff opposition at the party conference in June, the chances are that they will prevail.

✕

HARRISON E. SPANGLER IS ABOVE THE PETTY hypocrisy of common or garden politicians. He is the man who celebrated his elevation to the chairmanship of the Republican National Committee by jibing at the milk-for-Hottentots dream of his fellow-Iowan, because, as he puts it, "My job is to build up an army of voters in the United States to defeat the New Deal, and I don't think there are any votes in China, or Mongolia, or Russia that I can get for the Republicans." That is the caliber of Mr. Spangler's statesmanship, and it is well to have it in mind when examining his new formula for conducting the 1944 Presidential campaign. Mr. Spangler's opposite number in the Democratic camp, Postmaster General Frank C. Walker, two weeks ago suggested the desirability of late party conventions and a short campaign conducted "on a very high plane." Mr. Spangler agrees, and all he asks as his price is that the Administration shoot itself here and now. For the sake of "the people who want victory ahead of all else," he proposes that the President publicly renounce at once all intention of seeking or accepting a fourth nomination. Without doubt such a declaration would be sweet music to Republican ears, but what would be the effect in London, Moscow, and Chungking? Planners of the peace would be reduced to playing Hamlet without the Dane. What, for that matter, would be the effect in Congress, where Democratic loyalties to the President now hang on the thin thread of patronage? Is a war-time President to reduce himself and the country to political impotence for nearly two world-shaking years in order to allay the professional fears of the Republican chairman? We imagine it will take more subtlety than Mr. Spangler can muster to force the President into an ill-timed commitment.

✕

THE PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT ON WHY HE could not sign the public-debt act with its rider repealing the $25,000 salary limitation deserves a place alongside his veto of the Bankhead bill and his hold-the-line order as part of his vigorous drive against inflation. Removal of the ceiling on high salaries could scarcely have come at a more unfortunate time. It forces the President to tell the farmers and coal miners that for patriotic reasons they must withhold their demands at the very moment that a few thousand men with incomes of more than $67,000 are being told that they need not sacrifice for the war. This conjunction of events cannot fail, as the President points out, to injure morale at a critical moment on the home front. Technically, the excess purchasing power placed in the hands of two or three thousand rich men by the repeal of the salary limit is probably less of a threat to the anti-inflation program than a $2-a-day increase to several hundred thousand coal miners. But the miners can scarcely be expected to view the situation in this light, and only the evidence that the President is sincerely trying to maintain the principle of equality of sacrifice in war time stands in the way of serious trouble.

✱

THE HOBBS BILL—PET OF THE ANTI-LABOR bloc in Congress—was passed last week by the House in a slightly amended form. It is now before the Senate and is being pressed toward an early vote by a reactionary clique headed by Senator George and other Southern Democrats. There is some difference of opinion as to how far the bill in its amended form can be used against legitimate labor activities. A section has been added declaring that nothing in the bill shall repeal, modify, or affect the protection given labor under the Anti-Injunction Act, the Anti-Trust Act, the Railway Act, or the National Labor Relations Act. Nevertheless, it is apparent that an enforcement agency that was unfriendly to organized labor could construe almost any union activity in the transport field as "interference with the transportation of troops, munitions, war supplies, or mail," and thus bring criminal charges against the union officials. The bill has been selected by the anti-union forces in Congress as a trial balloon. Their fondness for it lies in the linking of union leaders with racketeers, robbers, and extortioners. Once this link is clearly established they hope to be able to push other and more drastic anti-labor measures. Under the circumstances the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. cannot be blamed for regarding the bill as not only potentially dangerous but a gratuitous insult to America's ten million organized workers.

✱

THE FOLLOWING COMMENT ADDRESSED TO the Honorable W. P. Lambertson by a group of his fellow-Kansans seems too worthy of public notice to be buried in the Representative's files. Since it seems improbable that he plans to frank the message out, we take pleasure in sharing this editorial space with its authors—American Legion Post No. 163, of Marysville, Kansas:

Be it resolved . . . that we, as voters of the First Congressional District of Kansas, apologize to the four Roosevelt boys and to the nation for our part in placing a man of the character and mentality of W. P. Lambertson in office.

It has been with the mixed emotions of shame, disgust, and nausea that we have witnessed the attacks by Mr. Lambertson on these fine American soldiers. . . .

As former soldiers we know of a time-tested method for a soldier to defend his honor, and we suggest to the Roosevelt boys that the first one to return to Washington settle personally with Mr. Lambertson, if he can be caught away from the sanctuary of the House of Representatives.

And to you, Mr. Lambertson, we recommend that in view of your own war record you cease your scurrilous sniping from the rear. . . . Keep up the attacks upon the President if you feel it is the only way you can attract attention, but in the name of decent Americanism, lay off the boys. . . .

Be it further resolved that the state officials of the Kansas Department of the American Legion be requested to investigate Mr. Lambertson's right to membership in the American Legion. . . .

✱

TWO ORGANIZERS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL Woodworkers of America, C. I. O., were recently assigned to organize the 1,200 workers, of whom 90 per cent are Negroes, in the Anderson-Tully Lumber Company at Vicksburg, Mississippi. The National Labor Relations Board had ordered an election for April 8 to determine whether or not the I. W. A. represented a majority of the workers. On March 18 the two organizers—Claud Welch, a white man, and Frank Davis, a Negro—were brutally beaten and told to leave the county. In affidavits secured by the Southern Workers' Defense League Davis stated that after having been arrested on no charge and kept in jail twenty-four hours without food he was turned over by the police chief to three armed men who drove him into the country, handcuffed him to a tree, beat him with a rubber hose, and then drove him into the woods at the point of a gun. "God damnit," they told him, "we don't want unions down here. That's for people in the North." Welch said that he had been lured out of his home by a false message and driven into a waiting car manned by local officials and mill employees. He received the same treatment. On the basis of the affidavits the civil-liberties unit of the Department of Justice has ordered a federal investigation. As Maury Maverick used to say, it is high time the South—some parts of it at least—joined the Union.

✱

IN REPORTING THE FOOD SITUATION, LIFE for April 15 served up to its millions of readers a mess of pottage that gives us acute editorial indigestion. Spread across the first page of the issue is a startling array of women's faces, some pained, but most of them just bothered or bewildered. Life's caption is: "For the first time since the start of the war, the faces of the home-front Americans (see above) mirrored the sad dejection and tight-mouthed frustration usually associated with the hungry peoples of Europe." This is strong language. And consciously or otherwise, the editors of Life here give aid and comfort to unscrupulous elements in the country who are bent on frightening and confusing millions of Americans. Life must know that those worried but well-fed faces do not in the slightest resemble the thin, despairing faces of women in Belgium, Greece, and Yugoslavia. Life also knows that the American food problem is essentially one of distribution. We all know that we have and can raise enough meat and vegetables to keep us reasonably well fed for some time. Holland, France, and Poland, on the other hand, have practically no supplies even of the basic foods necessary for subsistence. If we are short of meat, we need not go hungry. We can eat fish instead of lamb. In the conquered countries the Nazis have taken even the fish. To suggest that Americans have yet experienced or are likely to experience in the near future, if ever, anything like the "dejection" and "frustration" of Europeans is nonsense. It only serves to undermine the vigorous, if sometimes confused, efforts of the federal government to feed us all fairly and adequately.

The regular article by Freda Kirchwey, who is convalescing from an illness, will be resumed in a few weeks.

Public Opinion and Foreign Policy

THE defensive and conciliatory tone of the letter sent by Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles to Professor Ralph Barton Perry of Harvard, like the trend of events in North Africa, is a reflection of the power which an aroused public opinion can exert on our foreign policy. The dissatisfaction with "expediency" voiced generally in American publications of both the left and the right and the widespread protest against the maintenance of Vichy legislation in North Africa have had a good effect.

Much remains to be done, however, and the State Department still requires watching. For it is doubtful whether "the objectives of those charged with our foreign policy" are indeed identical, as Welles says they are, "with those of the overshadowing majority of their critics." If the policies which Welles defends were merely the reflection of temporary necessity and strategy, the department would not over so long a period have maintained an unvarying animosity toward De Gaulle, a consistent preference for reactionary exile groups, and an unflinching friendliness toward the Franco government. There would have been no slur at the "so-called Free French," and there would have been some indication of irritation, at least, at the hostility Franco has repeatedly shown our country despite the supplies we have sent him. Too many, though not all, of those in charge of our foreign policy gravitate naturally, because of their own social ties and political views, toward the undemocratic, if not the anti-democratic, camp. And though Welles emphasizes the desirability of "full public criticism," Secretary Hull's arrogant attitude toward both the press and Congress is not calculated to invite comment.

The explanation offered by Welles of Hull's attitude toward the Spanish Loyalists interned in North Africa is disingenuous at worst, and at best it reflects sadly on the Secretary's presence of mind. The query to which Welles refers was not "a query concerning Spaniards in Spain." It was, as attested by those present, a query concerning Spaniards held in concentration camps in North Africa. Hull's capably worded reply indicated that he felt that in the disposition of these prisoners Franco ought to be consulted—as he may very well have been behind the scenes. The "clarification" which followed was issued when it became clear that Hull had made not a verbal but a political blunder, the same kind of revealing blunder he made in his statement about the "so-called Free French."

All these explanations and apologies show that even the State Department must pay some attention to public opinion. Other recent indications of this same fact were the speeches by Assistant Secretary of State Berle and former Ambassador Grew concerning our Russian relations. Berle has been a leader in the anti-Soviet bloc, while Grew has headed the "beat Japan first" school. Yet Berle demonstrated at length that Russia from the days of the American Revolution has played a friendly and helpful part in our history, and Grew was most generous in his praise of our Soviet ally.

It has been noted that these speeches followed the visit of Foreign Minister Eden to Washington and have themselves been followed by delay in De Gaulle's already long-delayed visit to North Africa. Eden, who negotiated the twenty-year pact between Britain and the Soviet Union, has been one of the foremost advocates in the West of better relations with Russia. The order of events has led to the belief in some quarters that there may have been an understanding behind the scenes in which the State Department diehards—among whom we do not count Welles—agreed to pay a little more than lip-service to the cause of improved relations with the Soviets in return for a transfer of British preferences from De Gaulle to Giraud. For many of these diehards hate De Gaulle with a hatred that cannot be explained by any need to "play along" temporarily, first with Vichy, and then with North African Vichyites. We hope there has been no such agreement and that the delay in the De Gaulle visit is in truth due only to General Eisenhower's estimate of military necessity. To drop De Gaulle might appease some people in the State Department, but it would hardly improve our standing with the peoples whose aid we need when we invade Europe.

Post-War Money

NEITHER the American nor the British post-war monetary plan claims infallibility. Both have been put forward as bases of discussion, and since their broad objectives are similar, it is doing an ill-service to the cause of international cooperation to discuss them in competitive terms. Naturally there are many differences in detail, but our main impression, after making a close comparison of the two documents, is that there is an encouragingly wide area of agreement on this subject between the world's two chief trading nations.

The significant contrasts are not in matters of principle but rather in questions of approach and emphasis. The United States is now the banker of the world, and, not unexpectedly, the Treasury plan adopts a banker's approach, stressing the foremost importance of a stable relationship between currencies. The British do not minimize the importance of preventing wildly fluctuating exchanges, but they put still greater emphasis on the necessity of maintaining the balance of international payments. And there is economic justification for this position, since the instability of currencies is a symptom rather than a cause of the failure of nations to maintain equilibrium between their external payments and their external receipts.

In the days when it was operating more or less effectively the international gold standard provided an automatic adjustment of unbalanced trade positions. If country "A" exported more goods and services than it received, it drew gold from country "B," whose imports were in excess of its normal means of external payments. The result was an inflationary tendency in "A" as the influx of gold boosted credit. Prices rose, encouraging imports and discouraging exports. In country "B," on the other hand, the loss of gold caused a contraction in the basis of credit and a rise in interest rates. There was deflation, prices fell, stimulating exports and inhibiting imports. The result, in both cases, was stability as between foreign currencies at the expense of internal instability expressed in terms of employment and profits. But the system worked, more or less, as long as tariffs were moderate and creditor countries like Britain were willing to accumulate external surpluses in the form of permanent foreign investments. After the First World War these conditions no longer obtained, while a new disturbing factor appeared on the international scene—the constant shifting of huge short-term balances from one country to another under the spur of political and economic fear.

Recognizing that the gold standard cannot be restored, both the American and British currency plans seek a substitute for it which will be as impersonal as possible. The American proposal is for an International Stabilization Fund to which member nations shall subscribe specified quotas in gold, local currency, and government securities. These quotas are to be determined by a formula giving weight to such factors as each country's holdings of gold and foreign exchange, fluctuations in its balance of international payments, and its national income.

The methods by which the fund will operate can perhaps be best understood by a concrete illustration. Suppose that France, after a poor harvest, has bought wheat heavily from Canada and the Argentine. In the normal course of trade it has been unable to accumulate sufficient Argentine pesos and Canadian dollars to meet its bills. The Stabilization Fund, however, will be willing to sell these currencies to it in exchange for francs provided that the fund's holdings of francs, at the time, do not exceed a stipulated ratio of the French quota. If this condition cannot be met, then the fund would still be prepared to accommodate France, so long as it acts to correct the disequilibrium in its balance of payments indicated by the excess holdings of francs in the fund.

Disequilibrium also arises when a country's external trading results in a continuously expanding credit. Thus the steady influx of gold into this country before the war was the result of a constant favorable balance of international payments. If after the inauguration of the Stabilization Fund the United States continued to export more goods and services than it imported, the effect would be to deplete the fund's holdings of dollars. It would then become the duty of the fund to report to the government of the United States analyzing the causes of this lack of balance and recommending steps—for instance, a reduction in tariffs—to remedy it.

The British plan for an "International Clearing Union" approaches the same problem in a rather different way. It does not require any subscription of capital by the member nations, but it assigns to each a quota, based on pre-war foreign trade, which is in effect an overdraft limit. Transactions inside the union would be carried on in terms of "bancor," an international money of account fixed in terms of gold, and a preliminary agreement between members would fix the value of each currency in terms of bancor. Settlements between members would be made by a transfer of bancor from one to the other in the books of the union. Thus in the case cited above France would draw on its credit for the accounts of Canada and the Argentine. If, as a result, the French debit balance with the union exceeded its quota, the Governing Board could call on France to take definite steps to rectify its international balance. Such steps could include a limited depreciation of the franc. In the event of persistent failure to reduce an excess debit balance, a member could be declared in default and forbidden to draw against its account except with the permission of the Governing Board.

The British plan resembles the American in failing to provide for positive sanctions against those who upset the international apple cart by ignoring the fact that trade must be an exchange of things and persistently sell more than they buy. When the credit balance of such an offender has exceeded half its quota on the average of at least a year, it can be called upon to discuss with the board appropriate counter-measures, including expansion of domestic credit, the appreciation of local currency, the reduction of tariffs, and the expansion of long-term international loans. But the ultimate decision will remain in its own hands—a clear concession to the United States, which seems likely to be the biggest sinner in this respect in the future as it has been in the recent past.

It is impossible in the space of a short article to deal with all the aspects of international monetary reform. We have therefore concentrated on this problem of balance because its solution is basic to the successful operation of either the American or the British plan or, indeed, of any conceivable machinery to regulate the flow of international payments. The old machinery had broken down hopelessly before the war because too many nations were operating on the theory that trade was a weapon and not an exchange of benefits. If the leading nations of the world cannot shake off this idea, then the best-laid plans will gang agley and we can look forward to another era in which half the world starves while the other half burns its crops.

Home-Front Offensive

WITH the dramatic skill for which he is famous, the President last week seized the offensive in the bitter home-front struggle against inflation. His Executive Order freezing all prices and wages, with minor exceptions, has checked, for the moment at least, the creeping inflation that had been under way for months. Coming on top of his vigorous veto of the Bankhead bill, the President's action has staved off the collapse of the anti-inflation program that seemed imminent a fortnight ago.

The significance of the order is greater than appears from an analysis of the provisions. It is what Mr. Roosevelt declares it to be—a hold-the-line order. It does, however, plug several holes that were threatening to develop into serious leaks. It extends the price ceilings to all goods not previously covered, which may include on-the-farm prices; it reaffirms the Administration's determination to stand by the Little Steel formula; it forbids employers to pay new workers higher wages than they were getting previously—thus checking the pirating of labor; and it instructs all public regulatory bodies to forbid rate increases on common carriers or for utilities.

This listing of the comparatively few changes brought about under the Executive Order is deceptive because it ignores the psychological impact of the order on business, labor, and the general public. The sharp reaction on the stock market and in commodity prices as soon as the order became known revealed a general conviction that the President meant what he said when he declared that "we cannot tolerate further increases in prices affecting the cost of living"—the only way to hold the line is to stop trying to find justifications for not holding it here or not holding it there."

Chances of holding the line have been greatly improved by the Senate's refusal to pass the Bankhead bill over the President's veto. While the measure still rests in the Committee on Agriculture, where it can be brought out at any time, the President's veto message clearly made a profound impression in the Senate. His latest action should greatly strengthen the hands of the relatively small group supporting the anti-inflation program.

The chief threat now to the President's hold-the-line order is obviously John L. Lewis's demand for a $2-a-day wage increase in the coal fields. While some increase in the coal miners' wages can undoubtedly be permitted by a portal-to-portal arrangement or under the substandard wage exception included in the President's order, Lewis's bitterness against the President and the National War Labor Board may lead him to reject the maximum offer that can be made under the law. In that case the President may be faced with a choice between a disastrous coal strike and a revision of the Little Steel formula. His Executive Order makes it clear that there will be no appeasement of Mr. Lewis.

An inflation cannot, however, be stopped by wage and price regulation alone. If the amount of spending power in the pockets of the American people continues to grow with the ever-increasing volume of government spending, there is grave danger, unless this spending power is reabsorbed, of a tremendous increase of black-market operations. While every effort must be made to curb the black market by law-enforcement activities, the only fully effective curb is the elimination of the excess spending power that brings it about. This can only be achieved by increased taxation and savings, voluntary or compulsory. Mr. Roosevelt showed himself to be fully aware of this basic economic fact when he urged Congress to get busy in response to his earlier request for higher taxes.

Although two weeks have passed since the defeat of the Ruml plan, the House Ways and Means Committee has not yet even considered legislation for increasing taxes or speeding up collection through a pay-as-you-go system. The President's hold-the-line order has made action even more urgent than before. At least part of the enhanced spending power was being absorbed through normal inflationary channels. But the President's action chokes off this outlet, leaving the American consumer more than $50,000,000,000 in excess spending power, with only two possible outlets—(1) war bonds and other savings, and (2) the black market. Every effort must be made to corral as much as possible of this surplus in the current war-bond drive, but unless Congress takes its responsibility seriously and gives us a tax program promptly, the black market will continue to make headway. A year ago the President gave us a comprehensive seven-point program for the war against inflation. The battle is now being waged vigorously and effectively on six of the seven fronts. But if the enemy breaks through on the tax front, all our other efforts will have been in vain.

History Without Education

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 11

HONESTY and common sense were not conspicuous last week in Congressional discussion of the supposedly lamentable state of history teaching in our schools. Your humble correspondent is willing to start the procession to the mourners' bench. Like 98 per cent of the freshmen quizzed for the ever-vigilant editors of the New York Times, he did not know the minimum price per acre of federal public lands sold at auction before the passage of the Homestead Act. He suspects there may even be a Congressman here and there who would break into a cold sweat if asked, as the freshmen were, "Which was the first United States census in which railway mileage could have been reported?"

Like many other good people, Senators Guffey and La Follette have been duped by the Times project. Guffey joined in the attack on those somewhat mythical educators who insist "that social trends rather than real historical events were sufficient for understanding our nation's history." This formulation hardly states the case fairly for that new-fangled school of history—no older than Thucydides—which looks into the past for meanings rather than for names and dates on which to train the memory. The Senator's position is a bit obscure. He wants children taught to see the "long chain of facts" which link farm legislation "to populism and free silver, to free land and slavery . . . to Shays's Rebellion and beyond." He would have them understand why Jackson fought the Bank of United States. "How many of us," he asked indignantly, "know how business stole the country blind in the 1870's?" That is all to the good, but isn't it the very kind of social history attacked by Hugh Russell Fraser and the New York Times?

"The great service" for which Senator La Follette is unexpectedly naive enough to praise the Times survey is actually a service with which neither Senator Guffey nor Senator La Follette is in sympathy. It is to distract attention from a far more important quiz conducted last week before the Senate Labor and Education Committee, in the long and heart-breaking fight Senator Thomas of Utah has been waging in the cause of American education.

Here are a few questions for Congressmen and editors busily plucking motes from the eyes of freshmen. In what benighted country did a commission of educators report several years ago, "The educational services now provided for a considerable percentage of the nation's children are below any level that should be tolerated in a civilized country"? In the legislature of what country fighting a war of survival did a committee report last July, "About 433,000 men of draft age have been found to be without sufficient education to serve in the army, and about 250,000 of these, 'enough for fifteen divisions in the army,' are physically fit"? In what country are there 3,000,000 totally illiterate persons "and about 15,000,000 other adults who cannot read a newspaper or write a simple letter"?

The statement in the first question is from the findings of the President's Advisory Committee on Education in 1938. The second is from the report of the Senate Labor and Education Committee recommending passage of the federal Aid-to-Education bill as a war-time necessity. The third is from an appeal made to the Senate by Thomas of Utah in 1941 for a favorable vote on this long-pending measure. The country which provides educational services for a considerable percentage of its children below any level that should be tolerated in a civilized country, the nation which has lost man-power for fifteen divisions because of illiteracy, the country with 18,000,000 adults too illiterate to read a newspaper or write a letter, is the U. S. A.

The Times history quiz was a good story, though the dumb college freshman is not too new a joke on the educational circuit. It might have been used as a peg for a campaign in favor of the Aid-to-Education bill. Obviously if college freshmen are so ignorant, how much more ignorant must be citizens who have never had an adequate elementary education? But this year, like other years, finds the New York Times and those for whom it speaks indifferent or hostile to federal aid for education. Fraser's letter of resignation as an information officer of the Office of Education shows that those who ran the Times survey are not interested in providing more education. "All the money in the world," Fraser said irrelevantly, "will not correct the belief expressed by many students that Thomas Jefferson was Jefferson Davis." These people are not interested in more schools or in decently paid teachers. They are merely looking for another weapon in the fight against progressive ideas in education, as elsewhere.

"Unless the federal government participates in the financing of schools and related services," the President's Advisory Committee warned in 1938, "several millions of children in the United States will continue to be largely denied the educational opportunities that should be regarded as their birthright." What then seemed a problem of peace has since taken on military significance. Modern warfare, with its advanced technology, requires soldiers who have sufficient education to be taught how to use complicated weapons and workmen educated enough to handle their manufacture. "This," General Brehon B. Somervell, commanding general of the Services of Supply, told the Institute on Education and the War last August, "is an army of specialists. Out of every 100 men inducted into the service, 63 are assigned to duties requiring specialized training." Yet the National Resources Planning Board in its recent report on Post-War Plan and Program tells us that "20 per cent of the men of military age are found to have had less than a fourth-grade education."

The attempt to provide federal aid for education in the poorer states was begun in 1937 by the late Senator Harrison of Mississippi and Senator, now Supreme Court Justice, Black. The Times survey was published just in time to divert attention from new hearings on the $300,000,000 Aid-to-Education bill, now sponsored by Senator Lister Hill of Alabama jointly with Senator Thomas of Utah. "Hundreds of rural schools can be found," Senator Thomas said, "which are the merest shacks, in which the children are huddled together in makeshift desks, using a small number of dirty and worn-out textbooks under the direction of teachers who themselves have hardly finished high school." Opposition to remedying these conditions comes from those who would have to pay the bill.

The great natural wealth of the Southern and Western states has been largely drained off by the capitalists of the North and East. Federal aid to education would return some of that money to the states from which it came, and arrange for its use to provide decent education. In years past the opposition was led by Merwin K. Hart, pro-Franco president of the New York State Economic Council. He called the bill "bureaucratic and burdensome." He said it would "weaken the cause of private enterprise and capitalism." He trotted out the red boggy, perhaps in the belief that the best way to stop radicalism was to curb literacy.

Britain's Political Revival

BY TOM WINTRINGHAM

London, March 10

THREE things have happened here in recent weeks that taken together make it very unlikely that the political truce will continue in Britain for many more months. The first was a revolt by 116 Tory backbenchers against the government's catering bill. The second was a series of six by-elections in all of which the Tory candidates were returned but with majorities so small as to prove a great swing to the left in the electorate. The third was the vote of 119 members, including all non-government members of the Labor Party, against the government's policy with respect to the Beveridge Report.

The catering bill was introduced by Mr. Bevin, Minister of Labor and leader of the largest trade union in Britain. Catering is a sweated industry in Britain; very many of those working in it receive only a few shillings in wages and live mainly on tips. War conditions have brought a great expansion in the industry; canteens in factories and communal restaurants in cities and even in small towns are part of the organization of this country for maximum production. Our efficiency in war demanded that this trade be cleared up, but a sufficient number of Tories voted against it to make it probable that the bill is dead.

This brings into the open a development that has been going on for a long time. Property in Britain has been, and is, wrecking national unity. The war makes it necessary for some industrial property to be taken over by the community. Mr. Attlee promised in 1940 that property would be conscripted or drafted in the same way as labor. The promise has never been carried out; the Tories saw to that. Nationalization and rationing of coal became necessary a year ago; the Tories blocked it. In a dozen other cases Tory pressure behind the scenes has prevented measures being taken that are needed for the efficient conduct of the war, and are known to be needed by responsible administrators. But this pressure did not come into the open until February.

As soon as it did come out into the open, property began to feel a great deal bolder. Within a few days the great insurance companies swung their forces into action to see that the government accepted only those portions of the Beveridge Report which left their interests untouched. The report is not a socialist document. It outlines a system of social security adapted to a society in which industry is run for profit by capitalists, a considerable proportion of the working class is or may be unemployed, and all the rights of property are respected. But its enactment would rob the insurance companies of some of their past fields of profitable investment, including some in which their costs of collection were 40 cents in the dollar. It would also impose a burden on the nation's finances, though this would be extraordinarily small compared with the benefits derived not merely by the population as consumers but by industry. The government's position, until the debate in February, was thought to be one of simple neutrality: it would find out what the House of Commons thought about it all. To the surprise of everyone the government's position proved to be the acceptance of only those parts of the report which left the insurance companies happy, and a qualified acceptance at that. The principles of the report went down the drain, and the practical measures accepted were to be made dependent on unstated financial priorities of the future.

It soon became clear that this was a new form of Tory revolt: property had called the government to heel in this matter and was keeping it there with great ease. Among those who came to heel were all the Labor members with government jobs. But the Labor Party in Parliament reflected, though somewhat tamely, the utter astonishment of almost everyone at the government's rejection of Beveridge's principles. It voted against the government, not as a group of individual members of Parliament, but as a party following the line laid down in a resolution. In this way the ministers who voted with the government were, from the party point of view, the "rebels." And the truce patched up a few days later between these two sections of the Labor movement in Parliament consisted of a simple agreement to differ and a pious hope expressed on both sides that it would not happen again.

While these things were happening, six by-elections were taking place. All were in seats so firmly Tory that Labor had scarcely ever had much hope of winning them. Those who undertook to fight the entrenched Tories in them were thought of as harmless freaks without a chance. The constituency I tackled was mainly composed of the western suburbs of Edinburgh; its stubborn Toryism has yielded only twice in sixty years, once to Mr. Gladstone and once to Labor for a single year. Scottish opinion is hard-headed, very slow to change; the electoral register was so out of date that nobody under twenty-five could vote. The men and women in the forces and those who had moved to go into war industries were not allowed to vote. Yet I reduced the Tory majority from nearly 10,000 to less than 900—the best result in twenty years. And in the six by-elections together the Socialist vote increased by a third—this in spite of the fact that the Tory, Liberal, Labor, and Communist parties all worked for the government candidates, and the great name of Churchill was used so much that the query heard in a pub was quite justified: "Why has old man Churchill got to stand here? I thought he was already in Parliament."

"CAN I INTEREST YOU IN LIFE INSURANCE?"

Of the candidates standing at these by-elections four were members of Common Wealth and two were Independents. In all cases their program was more radical than that of the Labor Party before the war. And it was not a post-war program. I stood for a people's war such as the Russians are fighting and for nationalization or common ownership now of those industries in which it would better war production. And naturally I had some things to say about General Franco, and North Africa, and appeasement in general. Some of the things I said were so hot that the most responsible Tory newspaper was goaded into replying that "Joe Stalin had been the worst appeaser in the world in 1939." One of my opponent's supporters, Captain McEwan, M. P., declared, "I was an appeaser, I am still an appeaser at heart, and I am proud of it." In its editorial on the result, the newspaper I mentioned grieved over the "real danger that the principles for which the Unionist and Conservative parties stand will be swept aside by the growing tide of socialism."

Various new elements are swelling this tide. Actually in no case did we poll the full Labor vote. We could not have Labor officials or delegates on our platforms because that would have led to their expulsion. In the one by-election where this was tried, that fought in Bristol by Jennie Lee as an Independent, the party machines expelled a majority of Labor's local representatives, and the vote was a disappointment because this open split in the Labor movement led to confusion and apathy. In other by-elections we were supported privately and in relative secrecy by the great majority of Laborites and by a noticeable minority of the Communists, who could not understand the party line of supporting Peyrouton in practice while attacking him in phrases. But the official Labor and Communist lines must have swayed a few dozen people to vote Tory, and certainly many thousands not to vote at all.

That we increased the Socialist vote in spite of all these factors against us means that there is in Britain today a parliamentary majority available for some new form of popular front with a positive program of social change. This program, let me repeat, is not concerned simply with post-war problems; it is a program for winning the war more quickly, the war against fascism and all fascism's supporters.

The problem of British politics today is only superficially when and how the electoral truce will break down. Inevitably, under the pressure of two great developments, it will break down fairly soon. These two developments are the revolt of the Tories in one direction and the enormous leftward swing of popular opinion in the other. Whether this leftward swing will find effective expression constitutes the real problem. It is largely a problem of the Labor movement, and it will come to a focus at the Labor Party conference to be held in the second week in June. This conference is extremely unlikely to reaffirm the resolution in favor of voting for Tory candidates that was passed by a tiny majority at the last conference. How much farther it will go in the direction of breaking the truce depends not so much on currents of opinion within the Labor Party as on the Tory pressure on the one side and the leftward swing on the other. My own guess is that the conference will lay down a program of three or four points and threaten to break the truce if the government does not carry out this program. In that case the Tory answer is likely to be a general election before Labor is ready for it, and before Labor has made a working arrangement with its new allies.

These new allies are found first in Common Wealth, many of whose members are men in the services, unable to vote but with some influence on opinion. On a tentative list of Common Wealth candidates that came to me last week more than 50 per cent were officers and men now serving. The principal speaker besides myself at my own by-election was an R. A. F. pilot who had not only fought the Battle of Britain but had flown and fought for Republican Spain; he is now standing as Common Wealth candidate at the next by-election.* Secondly, they are found among the youngsters, who will not come into the Labor movement as such because they think its representatives differ from the Tories only in being older and wordier. A third group from which reinforcements can be drawn consists of an active middle class—technicians and managers, scientists and journalists and doctors—which is now ready to go farther and faster toward social change than the Labor movement is; they have been swept from their old political alignments by admiration for Russia and contempt for the men and forces who wrecked the last peace and showed their incompetence at Singapore. Finally, some support—the extent of which is very difficult to judge—will come from the new Christianity that causes bishops to write about the class war and revolution.

* The candidate referred to is Warrant Officer John Loverseed, who was elected on April 8, winning the first parliamentary seat for the Common Wealth Party.

If the Labor movement treats these potential new allies as rivals and dangers, the political truce will still break down and the election will take place—probably this year—but in that case the men who want the old world back again will get a new lease of power.

Imperialism of the Sky

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

NO SPOT on earth is more than sixty hours from your local airport." That was the headline over a recent advertisement of the Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corporation, and it is a fact that we need to grasp in all its implications if we are to adjust our thinking successfully to the new air age. The geographical shrinkage of the world to a smaller compass in terms of space-time than that of the United States a quarter-century ago makes all nations neighbors. Now we can all see the smoke of one another's fires, and the disputes of two households at the other end of the air lane become everybody's business. In the present war the United Nations are the rough equivalent of a vigilante group in a mining camp—an ad hoc organization to suppress trouble-makers. But that is a temporary solution: permanent security can be brought to Roaring Gulch, and to the community of nations, only when a common law can be both established and enforced.

The logic of the air age, therefore, would seem to require adaptation of political institutions to conform with the progress of aerodynamics. In democratic terms that must mean some pooling of national sovereignties in a world government that can adjudicate disputes between nations and enforce the peaceful acceptance of its decisions.

It is possible, of course, to draw other logical conclusions from the same air facts. Hitler saw in them an argument for world domination, and while he may be doomed, his ideas threaten to linger. Similarly an isolationist inoculated with air-mindedness will more likely than not come out in an imperialist rash. He will admit that America can no longer find security within its own boundaries, but the alternative, as he sees it, is not the subordination of American sovereignty—in common with other sovereignties—in the interest of world order but the indefinite expansion of American sovereignty. If America can be threatened from bases thousands of miles across the sea, then, the new imperialist declares, America should control such bases. If the civil aviation of other powers is competitively dangerous to American interests, all and any methods should be taken to crush it. Thus in the past few months the Chicago isolationists and the American centurions have joined hands in promoting a new air imperialism which, if allowed its head, could easily form the inspiration for a third world war.

A dangerous factor in this situation is the chauvinistic trend of a large part of the American aviation industry. An advertisement issued on March 3 by American Airlines under the signature of its president, A. N. Kemp, said: "Our air effort must not relax with victory. Immediate development and expansion of America's aviation is necessary also in order to protect our nation at the peace conference. Then either we will be dominant in the air—or we will be dominated in the post-war world."

This friendly message to our allies summed up in a few words what Clare Luce said in many in her freshman speech in Congress. "We want to fly everywhere. Period," she asserted, but we must not support a policy of freedom of the skies, for that would open our own air space to foreigners whose cheap labor standards would enable them to compete successfully with our air lines and aircraft manufacturers. Some days later Mrs. Luce declared that her speech had not meant what it appeared to mean—that she did not want America to control the air of other nations, and that she favored reciprocal air-commerce agreements. But by that time the damage had been done.

Actually Mrs. Luce is one of the milder advocates of American air imperialism, and she earned a rebuke from American Aviation, a bi-monthly magazine strongly supported by the aeronautical industry, for having said, "We do not expect and do not want one inch of territory outside our own possessions." On the contrary, this journal declared in its March 1 issue:

The United States should become imperialistic in the Pacific—openly and aggressively. Not only should we take over every Japanese-mandated island, but we should assume complete control over every other island now nominally "owned" by another nation as far south as New Zealand and the East Indies. There should be no exceptions, for he who insists on compromise in the Pacific has no understanding of air power or the ramifications of world air commerce. . . . Let us welcome the air lines of the world to traverse the Pacific, but let the Pacific territories be ruled by the United States. Let us decide who shall and who shall not fly over the Pacific. Let us develop the tropical empire as the new post-war frontier.

But even this proposal for aggrandizement at the expense of our allies, which has since received the enthusiastic indorsement of Representative Melvin Maas of Minnesota, appears modest in comparison with the views of some unnamed Congressmen as reported by the Wall Street Journal of February 27, 1943:

America would be the only nation in the world permitted to manufacture civil and military aircraft. That's one idea. America would be granted control, through its oil companies, of the big petroleum fields of the world . . . and in this way have its thumb on aviation fuel for all. That's a complementary idea. These vast concessions should be demanded at the peace table or sooner in payment of United States monetary and production expenditure for the war, some members of the air bloc believe.

Perhaps such crackpot ideas as this can be laughed off, for obviously they could hardly be given effect unless America were prepared to fight the whole world, and probably their authors have no intention of pushing them to extremes. The approach of their authors is not that of the militarist or the diplomat but of the Yankee horse trader. They see lease-lend as a marvelous bargaining weapon which can be used to obtain material benefits from our allies. Thus, they argue, we should make our deals now before victory is won, for once the recipients of lease-lend are safe from defeat, we shall not be in so good a position to turn on the heat. This is neither a pretty nor a practical attitude, for we can hardly say to Australia, for instance, "Give us permanent control of certain air bases or we will stop supplying your troops with guns to shoot the Japanese."

When the House Foreign Affairs Committee was considering the lease-lend bill in February, it listened to several proposals for making lease-lend assistance to various nations conditional on the granting of permanent advantages to American civil and military aviation. But these suggestions failed to influence the committee's report, and the bill passed almost unanimously without any strings tied to it. We must therefore beware of attaching undue weight to the vociferations of the air imperialists. Yet when all the froth has been blown off their eloquence, there remains a bitter brew to poison relations between the United States and its allies.

In her now famous speech Mrs. Luce sought to contrast the Administration's lack of interest in post-war civil aviation with the busy and purposeful preparations of other countries. "Our farsighted British cousins," she said, "have already clearly seen the vision of the air world of tomorrow. They have seen that the masters of the air will be masters of the planet, for as aviation dominates all military effort today, so will it dominate and influence all peace-time effort tomorrow." And to prove her point she reproduced in the Congressional Record as an "extension of remarks" a lengthy report of a House of Commons debate on December 17, 1942. A study of this document reveals, however, that British air enthusiasts are just as disgusted with their government as Mrs. Luce is with hers. One private member after another complained that nothing was being done to prepare for post-war air-transport developments, that the British Overseas Air Corporation, which has a monopoly of empire traffic, was being shockingly neglected, that no long-range policies were being worked out, and that American aircraft manufacturers and air lines were being permitted to get such a start that Britain would never be able to catch up. This may be an over-drawn picture and the British government may have secret plans which justify Mrs. Luce's alarm, but it must be admitted that the known facts support the view that Britain's civil aviation has been flying backward.

During the war no civil aircraft have been built or even designed in Britain, and the empire air routes have been barely maintained by bolstering a heterogeneous mixture of obsolete planes with a few modern American machines. By agreement with this country Britain has concentrated on the production of war planes and has left the building of transports to us. The American program for planes designed to carry troops and supplies runs into many thousands, and the army's Air Transport Command has organized a vast network of routes connecting all fighting fronts. Its general policy seems to be to pioneer these routes and then contract with the various air lines to train and supply civilian personnel to operate its planes. Consequently American air transport companies are being given an invaluable opportunity to acquire the "know-how" of overseas flight and to build up a body of pilots who know their way about the air over distant lands and oceans. This situation will undoubtedly mean competitive advantage to the United States after the war. However, the British government has recently taken a few steps to redress the balance, perhaps because the shouting on this side of the Atlantic has given British aviation interests a new means of pressure. An Air Transport Command has lately been organized in the R. A. F.; one type of bomber has been redesigned as a transport; and one designer for one construction company has been given permission to work on the problem of an airliner for post-war production.

There is nothing in these modest measures to alarm the technically progressive American air industry. But what does excite the suspicion and jealousy of our seekers of manifest destiny in the skies is Britain's strategic advantage. As an interesting series of maps in the current issue of Fortune shows, the far-flung British Empire is, in many ways, as well designed for purposes of air power as it has been for sea power. So long as the principle of national sovereignty of the air applies, it controls many of the important international air routes as well as innumerable bases. Without trespassing in the skies of other countries, Britain is in a position to forge aerial links to almost all the dominions and colonies. On the other hand, "the United States air," to quote Fortune, "under strict sovereignty, is obviously not big enough to give us anything like a preeminent position on the world's air routes."

Premier Churchill a few months back disclosed stiffly that he did not intend to "preside at the liquidation of the British Empire," and more recently Colonel Oliver Stanley, Secretary for the Colonies, announced that his "first and fundamental principle is that the administration of the British colonies must continue to be the sole responsibility of Great Britain." This is a plain warning of Britain's resolve to insist on its absolute title to all the real estate it has collected, by one means or another, in the course of the past three hundred years. And there is no reason to suppose that the British government is not keenly aware of the added value which the air age has given to some of this property.

It is not my purpose in this article to suggest possible lines of compromise between British and American air interests. Certainly they are far from irreconcilable, but a satisfactory understanding can only be reached as part of a far wider agreement between all nations. If ways and means can be found for international cooperation in the expansion of commerce and the universal improvement of standards of living, then there will be room in the air for all, and the plane will become one of the basic instruments of world prosperity.

Again, if we can achieve a genuine measure of collective security, the control of military air bases ceases to be a burning question. And, in this connection, it must never be forgotten that the development of the long-range bomber has made every nation's security zone overlap that of other nations. Our frontiers lie as far east as Dakar and the North Cape, as far west as New Guinea and Siberia. Can we persuade or bully other nations whose territories come within our security range to submit them to our control? Of course not. Equally, neither Britain nor any other colonial power can be permitted to monopolize air bases vital to the strategy of common defense. Any nation which insists on providing unaided for its own safety must first conquer the earth. World conquest or world association: the logic of the air age leaves no third choice.

[In the course of the next few months Keith Hutchison will contribute to The Nation a number of articles discussing other aspects of post-war aviation. The subjects will include the case for and against "freedom of the air," the economics of air transport, and Pan-American Airways and its rivals.]

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

CROSBY'S VITALIZED PHOSPHITES. From the nerve-feeding principle of the ox brain and wheat germ. . . . For relief of brain fatigue, nervous debility, dyspepsia, sleeplessness, and night sweats. . . . For thirty years used by thousands of brain-workers with such success as a curative that now many take it before great mental effort as a preventive of mental and physical exhaustion. (Advt.)—April 6, 1893.

WHAT HAS BECOME of that tremendous enthusiasm for the annexation of Hawaii which two months ago was inundating the country? Commissioner Blount's arrival at the Islands is telegraphed, with the consequent depression of the annexationists and joy of the royalists. . . . Mr. Blount . . . plans to visit all the islands and employ several weeks in finding out the real sentiments of the people.—April 13, 1893.

"DIVISION AND REUNION, 1829-1889," by Woodrow Wilson, Ph.D., LL.D. . . . As might be expected from the learning and literary skill of the writer, he holds his subject well in hand, and, after a liberal allowance made for his point of view, he divides what seems to him the word of truth with a candor and discrimination that are worthy of praise.—April 13, 1893.

CHARLES L. WEBSTER & CO. publish today . . . "The £1,000,000 Bank-Note and Other New Sketches," by Mark Twain. (Advt.)—April 13, 1893.

IN NOVEMBER last, trade and commerce and comfortable living in New Orleans were brought to a dead standstill by the concerted action of the labor unions. . . . Judge William Wirt Howe, the counsel for the Board of Trade, suggested that this action was an unlawful restraint directed against trade and commerce by an unlawful combination. . . . The service of process was immediately followed by cessation of the strike.—April 13, 1893.

THE COLORADO DESERT in Southern California is about to be watered. . . . Men of the East do not know and cannot believe what wealth irrigation creates . . . where all outdoors is a hotbed. . . . We have a pamphlet to send you; free. Our immediate object is to sell shares. . . . The Colorado River Irrigation Co. (Advt.)—April 13, 1893.

THE MUSICAL Mutual Protective Union played its usual farce on Friday in trying to prevent the imperial German infantry and cavalry bands from entering this country as artists, on the ground that they are not artists but contract laborers. . . . Dr. Senner, of course, decided that Emperor William's musicians are artists, and admitted them.—April 27, 1893.

IN LOCAL musical annals the season of 1892-93 will go down as the Paderewski year. The Polish pianist will take his farewell of New York next Saturday, not to be heard again for several years, as he intends to devote his time to composition. . . . It is to be hoped that he will combine the functions of composer and pianist, giving concerts when his brain needs time for the maturing of new ideas.—April 27, 1893.

Fascist Pie for Veterans

BY VICTOR RIESEL

JOSEPH McWILLIAMS, whose profile has done almost as much for American fascism as John Barrymore's did for the stage, has abandoned his Christian Mobilizers and street rioting on Yorkville corners for more respectable business. He is now engaged in selling a post-war bonus plan to the millions in the armed services and their families who are looking ahead to the time when our forces will be demobilized and jobs will be scarce.

Despite the camouflage of pseudo-economic verbiage with which McWilliams and his ghost writers have veiled his proposals, his "Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan" is merely a ham-and-eggs scheme which would give every man honorably discharged from the armed forces $7,800 in 3½ per cent interest-bearing United States government bonds. What at first appears to be another episode in the long medicine show which has been McWilliams's career on closer inspection shows itself to be the cleverest appeal for a know-nothing following that has come from the brain of an American fascist since Coughlin and his sixteen points. McWilliams, himself curiously exempt from the draft, has devised a bait to capture the imaginations of the men now fighting on twenty-one fronts and the seven seas. Without the slightest hesitation the debonair ex-street-fighter promises that "the Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan, when adopted, will resolve all doubts any individual may have about his future."

Just where McWilliams had his plan written for him and who is backing it are still mysteries to the newspapermen who have made a point of exposing his man-on-horseback activities. Shortly before Pearl Harbor he became involved with the New York police over the provocation of anti-Semitic riots in the German section of mid-Manhattan. His Eastern backers turned to less obvious Anglophobes after December 7, and McWilliams went into hiding. Curious reporters joined the FBI in tracing him down. Despite reports that he had returned to his native Texas he suddenly bobbed up in Chicago as a lecturer for the Midwest Monetary Federation. When classes failed to materialize, though the price was only one dollar a lecture, McWilliams and his backers looked about for new angels. Some months ago literature of his Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan began to circulate through the Middle West, and McWilliams himself, a little thinner but as handsome as ever, appeared as a lecturer before Kiwanis clubs, business men's groups, and the Navy Mothers. One of the Mothers virtually adopted him. When the writer and Walter Winchell revealed the connection, Colonel McCormick's Chicago Tribune charged that the Navy Mothers were watching McWilliams for the FBI and the army and navy intelligence. The Tribune had little to say about the self-appointed Sir William Beveridge of American fascism and his plan for a secure future for all service men. Well-informed political circles in Chicago believe that the Congressional boom now beginning for McWilliams will have little difficulty in obtaining press and radio support in the home city of the Patterson-McCormick press dynasty.

McWilliams has found strong support in America's first circles. His publisher, Mrs. Alexis de Tarnowsky, the wife of an army officer, is a very wealthy woman. As Alice Rand she turned the Barrington Rand Press offices in Barrington and Chicago over to the promotion of the new panacea for post-war depression. In a short time the country will be deluged with her Post-War Bulletin, which is frankly issued as a personal McWilliams organ, and the handsome red-white-and-blue $1.50 book explaining the "Plan."

The new project is developing along lines radically different from those followed previously by either McWilliams or other endemic fascists. McWilliams has been streamlined by his new managers. He no longer rants or pounds the table. He talks of preserving democracy. He gives no sign of the crude anti-Semitism of his Yorkville days. His meetings are attended by prominent citizens of the little suburban towns around Chicago. He makes a quiet, gentle appeal for the future of "our boys."

At the beginning of his book, immediately after a glamorous photograph of himself in a dark business suit, he writes: "With infinite compassion for those who have suffered and died, and for those who are to suffer and die, with solicitude for the future of those who are to battle and live, to them—our heroic fighting men, I dedicate the pages of this slender paper." Later he is presented in the official biography as a crusader, a pioneer opening new frontiers. Just as his parents sought the new lands of the West, he is seeking new fields of social and political advance. He has made, the author asserts, a long and detailed study of the various schools of social, financial, political, and religious thought. In fact, the last few years of his life have been devoted almost exclusively to such activity. (His methods of study were illustrated in 1940, when he boasted that his conviction on a charge of inciting race hatred at a street meeting was good publicity. "I was in that court putting on a show," he said.)

The image in which McWilliams is being re-created has become a familiar European phenomenon, and the portrait of the new McWilliams reveals the shape of things to come in American fascism. "While not an extremist, passivist, isolationist, or interventionist, he has continuously advocated a national program of adequate planned preparedness," his biographer writes. "More than two years before the leadership of either political party realized the self-defense necessity of being prepared for possible war, he advocated military conscription and tremendously expanded national and hemispheric defenses as essential cornerstones for maintaining and improving our American Way of Life." (In an interview published early in 1942 McWilliams told reporters he was "against the Jews and the Allies" and expressed the belief that Hitler would win. "It's got to be that way," he said, "because the British Empire doesn't make sense.")

Joseph McWilliams

"The practical advantages of the Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan, socially, financially, economically, industrially, vocationally, and politically," the author of the descriptive booklet asserts, "are readily apparent." Its religious appeal [he continued] will also be as apparent except perhaps to those Christians who unfortunately are confused by the small group of anti-force theorists who in the last twenty years have so vociferously advocated an impractical theological softening down of the sterner realities of eternal truth. The author's [McWilliams] actionist creed is in line with both American patriotism and with Christian theology, as sincerely believed in and conscientiously lived by more than nine-tenths of those who belong to, or are affiliated with, Christian churches, including the majority of the leaders of all denominations. [On February 28, 1940, a meeting of twenty-three religious groups disavowed McWilliams's Christian Mobilizers.]

Catch-all is the word for McWilliams's plan. It will maintain morale, prevent collapse after the war, give our youth a chance to become productive, reconstitute the American middle class, create unity now, and, of all things, avert another bonus march. One of the cleverest of the arguments advanced for it is that the $7,800 worth of bonds to be given to "every soldier, sailor, marine, aviator, and coastguardsman" could be used for marriages delayed for many years by the war. "If our young marriageable people are kept from establishing families and homes by years of war and then are prevented from marrying because of economic reasons for additional years after the coming peace, the future of our nation, race, and culture will be irreparably damaged," the book states. With millions of our young people marrying on the plan's $7,800, McWilliams argues, the nation would be saved from economic as well as sexual collapse.

To his bonds-for-babies idea McWilliams tacks on a proposal for the end of slums and a vast post-war housing boom.

The sum of $7,800 in Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan bonds, paid to each of our returning servicemen, and used as provided, will result in the building of millions of new dwellings. This is certain to create a huge movement away from the slums and the outmoded dwellings erected in past decades. This will do more to take millions out of the unhealthy, congested areas than all the housing programs heretofore launched.

In an attempt to capitalize on the unrest caused by rationing and the resultant closing of thousands of small non-essential businesses, he warns that "the nature of this war is such that it will result in the economic destruction of hundreds of thousands of American middle-class business men and women." The appeal to the suddenly declassed white-collar worker, who finds himself the least important unit of the war-time population, parallels early Hitlerian propaganda:

Salesmen and those engaged in sales promotion, advertising, and merchandising have been driven from their activities. Automobile, radio and tire dealers have been forced out of business. In war production large concerns have acquired the lion's share of the orders. Because of priorities and other emergency measures countless thousands of small shops and factories have closed or faced closing. Great groups of middle-class people whose incomes are derived from fixed income-producing securities or investments are threatened with disaster because of the rising cost of living.

We are witnessing the most rapid extinguishment of a middle group in history. . . . Democracies are the political expressions of middle-class imperatives. The destruction of our middle class would mean the end of our democracy. The Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan will perpetuate our American system. By paying $7,800 to those who have risked most for their country we will create a vigorous new middle class of 5,000,000 to 10,000,000.

In his attack on communism McWilliams becomes most reminiscent of his old rabble-rousing self:

Unless we have a plan of action for the post-war period the Communists will take America by default. The just payment of $7,800 to our several million militarily trained young men and their establishment as business-owning, home-owning citizens will utterly destroy the long-prepared program of the Marxists. These trained young men will be prepared, able, and disposed to smash ■ Communist coup d'état at a moment's notice.

The Serviceman's Reconstruction Plan, and it alone, can save our people from social revolution and bloodshed. . . . This plan in operation will smash the hopes of not only the Communists but all varieties of totalitarians who scheme to force dictatorship upon our people. It assures us an opportunity to get through the dangerous post-war months without civil strife and a chance to go on to the fulfilment of the great and fulfilling promise of America.

McWilliams's scheme would cost $78,000,000,000 if put into operation on the basis of 10,000,000 survivors of the present United States armed forces. This does not include the 3½ per cent interest. McWilliams proposes to pay this sum out of the running expenses of the government: "It will be paid with the wealth produced by billions of man-hours of work that would not be done unless they [the bonds] are issued and used to create business activity and total employment in the post-war era."

Unlike some of his contemporaries who have promised pie in the sky, McWilliams has worked out his plan in detail. It appeals through its simplicity. For every ex-serviceman McWilliams would place in trust for a period of seven years—with local boards of trustees similar in make-up to the present local draft boards—$7,800 in 3½ per cent government bonds. Part or all of these bonds could be sold by the ex-soldier to build a home, engage in business, buy a farm, or complete his education. The purpose, however, must be a worthy one. The interest rate is expected to guarantee a quick market for the bonds at par or above, and the cash would come from existing bank deposits. Thus McWilliams hopes to mobilize the funds of the nation "for immediate economic action—resulting in economically creative work by the servicemen beneficiaries." The bonds would be amortized over ■ thirty-year period.

The local boards, to be known as Servicemen's Reconstruction Trustees, would have possession of the bonds issued in the names of the local boys. The trustees would be chosen for their business experience, acquaintance with local affairs, and "fiduciary knowledge," and would have the final word on how much of the nest egg might be withdrawn and for what purposes.

This, in essence, is what the political speculators behind McWilliams are attempting to sell to the Middle West. Apparently some progress is being made, for the Barrington Rand Press has just opened a store on North Michigan Avenue in Chicago to display McWilliams's literature.

Now that McWilliams is no longer selling merely riots and anti-Semitism, his activities are being closely watched by Congressional America First leaders. From his experience a handful of isolationist Senators hope to develop a strategy which will gather the new crop of war veterans into their anti-New Deal fold. Every trick that will win the support of the men in uniform as they are demobilized is of vital interest to this group. McWilliams is only one of many out to get the veterans' vote. Typical of such activity is the campaign of the newly organized American Mothers of Detroit, led by a former America First organizer, for free furlough transportation and permission for husbands and sons "to visit their loved ones at least once every six months." The Mothers distribute their literature at meetings of Gerald L. K. Smith's America First Party. Similar organizations are at work presenting plans that ostensibly respond to the various needs and fears prevalent among the boys in khaki.

These groups are led by second-string isolationist leaders. Should their appeals be successful in the Middle West, similar campaigns will be launched with much fanfare in New York and in other cities, particularly those in which Coughlin and Lindbergh once had large followings.

Diffident Invitation to a Rationed Dinner

Will you come to dinner Wednesday?
There'll be very little meat,
There'll be precious little coffee,
And you will not get it sweet,
There'll be bread already buttered,
Buttered, wisely, very thin,
There'll be artichokes, or cabbage,
And it won't be from a tin.

Will you come to dine on Wednesday,
Though the lights will all be dim,
And there'll be at most one cocktail,
And the hors d'oeuvres few and grim?
We will greet you very warmly,
Though the parlor won't be hot,
And the laundry-man says dressing
Would be simpler if we'd not.

But there'll be some old companions
In old suits and last year's shoes,
There'll be very old French brandy
(Which we'll thank you to refuse).
Come and take pot-luck on Wednesday
While our ration books permit,
Come and share in our privation,
Come and help us eat our bit.

IRWIN EDMAN

Letters from Nation Associates

THE NATION'S appeal to its readers for funds with which to guarantee the magazine's continued existence has brought amazing returns in the number of contributions. What is quite as gratifying to the editors of an "opposition journal," almost all of the thousands of contributions have been accompanied by expressions of support and solidarity. In a later issue we will publish a report of the financial returns, which are not yet complete; we present here a small selection of the letters we have received from every part of the country.

A Dive-Bomber Pilot—and Others

Yesterday I learned for the first time that The Nation is sadly in need of financial support, without which the magazine might be compelled to cease publishing. Although I have never been a regular subscriber, I thank God that I have had the good sense to read it more than occasionally since the time I became old enough to realize that all's not right with this world.

This month I am leaving the country in the capacity of a naval dive-bomber pilot, and I deem it my privilege to be one of the contributors toward the sum which I trust will help to insure that your enlightened and forward-looking journal will remain "at the plate," slugging and swinging furiously against the forces of smugness, isolationism, and reaction.

Those of us who are fighting in this war as much for social gains as for the elimination of the threat of fascism will have less reason to become uneasy about developments on the home front as long as there are vigilant journals of expression like The Nation on our newsstands. I shudder with horror at even the thought that your magazine would cease to be published merely for lack of funds.

Keep us posted for heaven's sake if your financial obligations are not quickly liquidated. If necessary you can depend upon your readers to give more.

When I received your letter informing me of The Nation's plight, I asked myself, "Which can I do without: The Nation or two week-ends away from camp?" The inclosed check for $10 supplies my answer.

Best of luck and, of course, here's hoping!

Camp —, Pennsylvania

ENSIGN A. W. B.

PVT. I. D. L.

Here's $25 for the campaign, and as partial payment for the years of satisfaction I've got from The Nation. I don't want a subscription—not now at least, when I'm lucky to find time to read the press section of Time, where I just saw notice of the present drive. But I want to be sure The Nation will still be there when I do have time to read something besides field manuals and the Infantry Journal.

Camp —, California

LT. E. B. H.

Melting Pot

I have your letter of March 3 and am touched. Indeed, a Scotsman must be deeply touched when he pungles up $25 for a paper with which he is only partly in sympathy.

Sometimes you rile me terribly, particularly by your attitude on the labor question, but I have to concede your earnestness and sincerity, and I agree with you that probably the world would be worse off if The Nation were to succumb. So here is my favorite twenty-five bucks.

Colusa, California

C. D.

Glad to do my bit but haven't very much. Miss Kirchwey's article this week on the slaughter of Jews in Europe is worth all I can give. My forbears were Quakers and came over in the early days, and I feel that any religious refugee should be welcomed—not kept away.

Berkeley, California

M. V. F.

I have indeed a great affection for The Nation. This comes partly from the fact that my father contributed letters to this paper in 1871, when he was a volunteer surgeon (for the German army) in the Franco-Prussian War; and that The Nation has been, all my life, on the family's and my own reading table.

Chicago, Illinois

E. L. D.

Wanted: A Million Subscribers

I am inclosing a Post Office money order for $10. I have been a subscriber for a long time; a reader for much longer. I came to this country in 1916. In 1917 I bought my first copy of The Nation in San Francisco and have been reading it ever since.

I have a small barber shop, and The Nation is on the table. It amazes me how few people ever look at it. The average American workingman is satisfied with the sporting page and Life and Look magazines. He buys the Saturday Evening Post and thinks the unions should keep out of politics. I sometimes wonder if we shall see a better world before The Nation has a million subscribers.

Oakland, California

P. H.

Scraping the Bottom of the Barrel

I am a retired railroad employee, seventy years of age, having worked for the same railroad forty-seven years at a small wage. I receive a small pension now, which is practically my sole income, and with conditions as they are at present, life for me is a perpetual struggle for survival. However, since my wife died a few years back and my only son is now self-supporting, that militant spirit I had for the battle for a new and better world and the uplifting of the working class of the world has just about deserted me. No doubt this horrible war is partly responsible for this depression of mine.

Truth to tell, I am beginning to feel more and more as if I had been a citizen of some other world and was only a visitor here on this earth. The Catholic church, with the mantle of Christ over it—what a mockery. Green fighting Murray, Lewis fighting both, the State Department acting like a Chamberlain, the working class being killed, butchered, robbed, starved, raped, and exploited by the millions.

Yes, I admit this world needs real fighters, humanitarians and libertarians, and as you come under that classification I am scraping the bottom of the barrel and sending you a check for $10 which closes my account with the bank,
Washington, D. C. T. T.

I hope the inclosed check for $10 will help. I have had publishing experience myself and can appreciate the problem. I regret to say at the present time I am a prison inmate, earning but 15 cents a day. This about cleans up the balance to my credit on the institution books, but you are welcome to it. Perhaps it will bring me luck, just as your splendid liberal publication brings me immeasurable inspiration even behind these gray walls.
Connecticut T. B. J.

I Sometimes Disagree, but . . .

I am glad to inscribe myself in Nation Associates as a Foundation Member at $100 and am inclosing herewith my check.

I have been a subscriber of The Nation since about 1917, and I have missed hardly an issue. Your record of the last quarter of a century and before is a noble one, and I would not like to see your usefulness terminated. This does not mean that I have always agreed with the ideas and sentiments expressed in your publication. I think that our country in the past has become great and wealthy and powerful by having as little bureaucracy and government as possible, whereas in The Nation the idea of more and more central control seems to prevail. To me the welfare of the individual citizen and of our country will not be advanced over the long run by a paternalistic system of state socialism in time of peace. But of course The Nation never expects all of its readers to think exactly alike. However, in its advocacy of great moral issues and principles The Nation has been magnificent. Its fearless defense of human rights, even for minorities and unpopular groups, has endeared it to those who love freedom and justice and truth. May it continue to lead in such causes!
Long Island, New York H. S.

And Sixteen Cents

Inclosed find a check for $5.16.

Five dollars is in honor of The Nation in the hope that it will survive all difficulties. Five cents is in honor of our Ambassador Hayes, who enthruses me to the limit by his delight in the fact that busses are now running in Madrid while our war workers in this country do not get enough gasoline; that plenty of oil is being shipped to Spain—most likely for the use of the Blue Legion; and that a great supply of food products arrived in Spain while out West in our country a woman killed two of her children because she had not enough proper food and clothing for them. Five cents is given to you in honor of our State Department, which still doesn't seem to know where and when the sun rises and sets.

Five cents is given to you in honor of Mr. Dies, who will soon discover that all readers of The Nation are Communists. One cent is given to you in honor of Mr. Coughlin, the Ku Klux Klan, and the Christian Front, all of whom made the wonderful discovery that the Jews are running this war for the purpose of dominating the world.

Also, information please! There are a number of people who are afraid that Stalin will stop at the German border; and there are also a number of people who are afraid that Stalin will not stop at the German border. Do you know the answer? Are they both right in being afraid?
Yonkers, New York P. T. B.

For Services Rendered

In answer to your call for financial aid I submit my contribution not as a gratuity but as a tax, for to me The Nation serves purposes as necessary as those performed by police and fire departments.
New York J. S. M.

If The Nation were to crumple up, we should feel that the nation itself was crumpling. May you be able to avert the disaster.

Lawrence, Kansas

R. R. M.

Fifty Democrats from Spain

I take great pleasure in inclosing a check for the amount of $100 for the collection which is now being carried on for The Nation. The total amount represents exactly fifty individual contributions of $2 each, which fifty different refugees of the Spanish Republic now residing in this city have gladly donated. It is, as you can see, a very modest token of our great appreciation of the magazine which you so wisely direct, of the principles it stands for and so courageously defends.

Our support of The Nation is inspired not only by our feeling as Spaniards but also by our stand as democrats who have fought for three consecutive years against the same evil forces that the United States and the United Nations are now fighting, to achieve the same goal—a worldwide democracy. We feel, naturally, very much obliged to you and the members of your staff for the great pains you have taken to make known to the public the truth about the Spanish situation under Franco. Yet the fight that took place in Spain was never a fight for the mere purpose of defending our country. It was a fight for democracy. It was a fight for a people's victory, a fight for a people's peace.

That is why we support The Nation—because its aims are the same as ours, it struggles for the same principles we do, whether the political battlefield be France or North Africa, England, Latin America, or the United States.

We are happy to be able to help in the collection, and for the above reasons you know that we feel that The Nation is one of us.

O. A. SUCCAR,
Secretary of the ACERE (Association of Exiles and Former Combatants of the Spanish Republic)

New York

The Second Front Reconsidered

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

WHEN the American High Command shortly after Pearl Harbor determined to deal first with Germany, it made the opening of a major land front in Europe the most important immediate problem of the war. All through 1942 the questions where, when, and how were on every tongue, and second-front demonstrations indicated a keen popular awareness that aerial and naval blows were not enough and that Germany must be struck a heavy blow on land if the United Nations were to win the final decision.

Today, nearly a year and a half later, this needed European offensive has still failed to materialize, and even the demand for it has lost the now-or-never urgency of a year ago, for German reverses in Africa and Russia have made the Allied cause appear much brighter. But if Hitler has already failed in his attempt to win the war he has not necessarily lost it. He has scant hope of destroying any of his three principal foes, but with the advantages of superior land power and a central position he might reasonably expect to drag on an expensive and indecisive war to a negotiated peace that would leave him with most of the spoils. Despite the talk of "unconditional surrender" at Casablanca, there is little doubt that this is the present German purpose.

The principal object of Nazi strategy in the west is to prevent a heavy land attack from becoming a reality. If the Germans are to get even a draw, they must destroy enough shipping to keep down the striking power of the Western Allies and hold off invasion. As long as transport difficulties keep the size of an invading force within the German capacity to combat it, the Reich is reasonably safe.

On the other hand, the true strategy for Great Britain and the United States calls for invasion as soon as there is a fair assurance of success. Air bombing, by its attrition of German strength, is bringing that day closer, as is the winning of the African struggle. But while these two campaigns are important, they are only preliminary—and strictly secondary—to the more decisive struggle to come. It is already clear from the extremely careful, deliberate strategy of the British and Americans that Europe will not be invaded until there is a definite chance of success. The refusal to invade Europe in 1942 in aid of Russia offers proof that diversionary campaigns or operations to prevent suffering or the extermination of nations will not be undertaken.

Much depends upon bringing the African war to an end. Success in driving out Rommel will release for service elsewhere an enormous amount of man-power and shipping. After consolidating their hold on the African coast, the Allies will need to leave there only skeleton garrisons, which, with superior naval and air strength, should give ample insurance against surprise.

We missed a golden opportunity early this year by failing to invade Europe at a time when the southern German armies in Russia were threatened with disaster and few reserves were available. We may not have as good a chance again, but we certainly have a definite obligation to keep alive a great enough threat to prevent German concentration on the eastern front.

An adequate supply of troops may present a very genuine problem since the number of men going directly into the combat branches of our army is comparatively small. However, some numerical inferiority may be overcome by excellent equipment, thorough training, and overwhelming air superiority. Again, the possible weakening of enemy morale and the disruption of enemy industry by bombing, now becoming increasingly a reality, may permit some shaving of numbers. But there is obviously a limit beyond which this cannot be carried. Final defeat of Germany is partly a mass-army problem, and it is by no means certain, even after three years of arming, that we have the necessary force available.

If we attempt an early mass attack, we may have to get along with less shipping than we have formerly considered essential. No other phase of the war has been so disappointing as the effort to master the submarine. Even though for the past several months our new construction has surpassed sinkings we have not added the tonnage earlier regarded as necessary.

Rather too much credence has been given to the German scare stories telling of enormously strong fortifications along the coast of Europe. No such thing as an invulnerable defense line has yet been constructed, and no chain of fortifications is stronger than its weakest link. Defenses extending three to four thousand miles cannot everywhere be strong. Nor can the coastal defenses of Europe be as strong as they were a year ago when second-front possibilities were mainly confined to France and Norway, and German garrisons were not required in southern Europe save for police purposes. The establishment of beachheads in hostile territory is never easy, and Secretary Stimson has rightly warned of heavy casualties ahead, but with the weapons now available this problem can be met. From hints dropped by Churchill, Roosevelt, and Stimson in recent speeches, as well as from the known facts, an attack on continental Europe seems likely some time between the summer and late fall of 1943, the date depending upon such factors as the clearing of North Africa and the amount of shipping available.

The African campaign has opened up many new possibilities of attack. If our cautious policy is continued, we shall strike in areas far distant from the centers of German power where transport difficulties will reduce the Axis defensive strength. This requirement is still met in Norway, and in addition a successful campaign there would deprive Germany of valuable iron resources and safeguard the supply line to Russia. Whether recent reports of the smuggling in of weapons and saboteurs are true or merely a part of the British war of nerves it is impossible to say; internal aid would be invaluable since Norway is comparatively remote from Allied air power.

The southern coast of Europe offers two especially inviting routes of attack and others less feasible. The best prospect in the Mediterranean is found in the occupation of Sicily and Sardinia, followed by an attack on the exposed coast of Italy. Both air and sea protection could be supplied over the short distances involved; most of the base facilities and experienced troops needed are already present; the whole south coast of Europe is less easy for Germany to defend than areas farther north owing to geographical barriers and a paucity of north-south railways. However, the enemy has now been given ample time to prepare against this very move.

Another promising line of attack might start with an amphibious invasion of Crete and the Aegean Islands, followed by a similar move into Greece. By way of Salonika and the Vardar Valley, thrusts could then be made into war-weary Bulgaria and Rumania and also into Yugoslavia, where we could count on active support. This route of attack, when used by the Allies in the First World War, brought good results. The long initial hop of some three hundred miles between Egyptian bases and Crete is the greatest drawback.

Finally, the Channel coast of France and the Low Countries continues to be by far the most logical jumping-off place for an invasion of Europe. This area is of vital importance to Germany, is extremely close to Allied bases of supply, can be dominated by Allied air power, and for years has been the object of almost daily reconnaissance sweeps. Success here would eliminate the most dangerous submarine bases and almost overnight oblige the U-boat to conduct its campaign under the geographical handicaps it faced in 1918.

But there are obstacles here also. The Germans are not blind to the importance of the Channel coast and have concentrated their best defenses and garrison divisions in the area. Reaction to the Dieppe raid last year was prompt and vigorous, and even air superiority did not prevent an expensive Allied defeat. If the second front is opened in France it will be because we are willing and able to face a showdown with the German army at its strongest.

Our programs of shipbuilding and troop training are not aimed at victory in 1943, and we shall be considerably stronger a year from now. Invasion of the Channel coast, with the decisive test of power it would certainly bring, is therefore not immediately likely, but we shall probably launch a preliminary campaign in the near future.

In the Wind

A HOUSING DEVELOPMENT for war workers is being built by the National Housing Administration at Farrell, Pennsylvania. It was originally planned to put the development on an attractive site in a good neighborhood, but when it was learned that Negroes as well as whites would live in it the plans were changed. The new dwellings will be surrounded by slums.

THE SPECIAL SOVIET EDITION of Life included pictures of unnamed individuals typical of the different peoples who make up the Soviet Union. The typical Jew was Professor Joseph J. Lieberberg, former president of Biro-Bidjan, who was dismissed in October, 1936, on charges of Trotskyism.

EDUCATION ITEM: Willford I. King, professor of economics at New York University, reveals the facts of economic life in a bulletin distributed by the Committee for Constitutional Government, Inc., in opposition to any plan to limit large incomes: "From early youth, most of us have been taught to dread taxes and to plan how to avoid them."

RELIABLE PARTIES will be interested in this advertisement in the Billboard, trade paper of the circus and sideshow business: "On account of disappointment due to the draft, have a complete Hawaiian Girl Show. Will give same to reliable party."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Tuberkuloseblatt, a German medical journal, says that 80 to 90 per cent of those suffering from tuberculosis in an inactive form are being forced to work, often under "unsuitable conditions." . . . Tuberculosis in Holland has increased 74.5 per cent under Nazi rule. . . . DNB, official German news agency, says a similar figure among Belgian children is due not to a real increase of the disease but to faking in order to get special rations. . . . From the French underground comes the following menu of a Pétain dinner: hors d'oeuvre, white beans, stuffed cabbage, salad with sardines and leeks, cauliflower, anchovies, tongue, cold cuts, sausage, broiled salmon, ham, pâté de foie gras, filet mignon, potatoes, peas, omelette, stewed fruits, coffee, and liqueurs.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $3 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Political Unity First

BY NORMAN ANGELL

TODAY we and the thirty nations allied with us are fighting for our freedom. We shall win. But when we have won, how shall we keep our freedom so that we shall not have to fight for it all over again in a decade or two after the next peace, as we are now fighting little more than two decades after the last?

Many of us feel perhaps that when the enemy has been defeated, the job will be done. But we must remind ourselves that we defeated him completely, utterly, twenty-five years ago and ask why we now have to do it again in a second even bloodier and more devastating world war. If we do not answer that question in our minds we may make exactly the same mistakes this time. We may once more throw away our victory.

Why did our peace fail? Why is the freedom of 90 per cent of the people of the earth now in jeopardy?

Let us recall for a moment what happened after the peace was made. Within a year or two the grand alliance which had fought the war against Germany had gone to pieces. Long before the Peace Conference was over, bitter differences had arisen among practically all members of the alliance. Britain and America were at odds with each other and with France. France, you remember, surrendered its policy of a separate Rhineland republic and a permanently fortified Rhine frontier in return for a promise of aid from Britain and America in the event of another German attack. Those Anglo-American guarantees of French security were not ratified; and as soon as it was clear that they never would be, the peace of Europe began to disintegrate. France adopted a policy of inflicting damage on Germany with the idea of keeping it weak. The Ruhr invasion a little later was a characteristic feature of that policy. We in Britain and America were shocked but failed to do the one thing that would have kept France from this course—failed, that is, to say to it, "We will guarantee your security with everything we have if you will so behave toward Germany that this Weimar Republic will have a chance of life." We did not take this step, which would have helped a decent Germany to survive. We did, however, adopt a quite futile pro-Germanism. We began to say, particularly in America, that Germany had been badly treated, that the Treaty of Versailles was a wicked document, and much more to the same effect. The result was the growth in France of an Anglophobia which was to explode later at a tragic moment and make it easier for Hitler to secure the surrender of France.

The association which had won the victory in 1918 continued to disintegrate. France, Britain, and America became separated from Russia, and mutual distrust grew. Japan, one of the Allies, attacked another ally, China; later Japan and Italy, which had fought Germany, became Germany's allies.

If a similar disintegration is to follow a new victory, what is the good of talking about the permanent repression, not of one people, this time, but of two—Germany and Japan. If absolute repression of those two nations for generations is to be our policy, a degree of unity, cohesion, and cooperation will be demanded of the United Nations which not even two nations, to say nothing of thirty, were able to achieve in the past.

I suggest that, whatever policy we ultimately adopt, our freedom can never be secure unless we recognize, far more clearly than we have recognized in the past, that the real price of freedom is the fulfilment of certain obligations, that the right to freedom carries certain duties—obligations we have repudiated and duties we have neglected.

Note what failure to cooperate involves. We have seen the rights and freedom of nearly the whole of Christian Europe destroyed by a relatively small group of ruthless and evil men; twenty states have passed under the power of one. We have seen states whose democratic freedom dates back a thousand years—as told in Icelandic sagas—overthrown during a week-end. How has this amazing thing, the defeat and subjugation of millions by a few evil men, been brought about? Surely that is the first question which should concern those who want to build a free and humane civilization.

The answer which comes nearest to being the complete one is extremely simple and yet is very seldom given; it is an answer which we all in some measure evade. Those twenty states have perished as free nations because each said in effect: "We refuse to defend the security or the rights of others; we will defend only our own." Because all said this in one form or another they were all at Hitler's mercy, however much they armed.

If I dwell upon truths that were known by the thinkers of Athens and the seers of Palestine, it is because we are still, in the midst of the Second World War, denying them. The right of the 90 per cent not to be killed, destroyed, enslaved by the 10 per cent is the first right we must insure, for without it no other right whatever, whether of religious or intellectual freedom or eco-conomic welfare, has the slightest value. Yet we are not making this our first purpose. Indeed, we are apt to insist that this right of itself will not suffice to move men; that people will not work and fight merely to be free of violence and terror and enslavement; that they must be offered a new economic order of one kind or another. A new economic order, however, cannot possibly survive—as Russia is finding out—unless the other condition is fulfilled, unless there is common resistance to violence, unless there is political unity rising above economic doctrine.

There is no purpose in creating a new social order, as Russia has discovered, if it cannot be defended. And it can only be defended, again as Russia has discovered, collectively, with the aid of other nations which may have very different social forms. Russia has learned that though communism may be the ideal form of society, it cannot have communism unless it is prepared to cooperate with nations that are not Communist; as capitalist nations have discovered that they cannot have free enterprise unless they are prepared to cooperate with nations that are not capitalist.

If we are not to miss the truth that political unity comes first, as we missed it before when we needed it most, we must go on stating it. Every right, including freedom, has its duties. I believe that the people will accept the fact that rights mean duties, that freedom means surrender of some freedoms, that a better future demands unity, and that unity is based on toleration and discipline.

Noguès—Case Study in Opportunism

BY EMILE BURE

THE French generals provide the key to the North African situation, which seems to brighten for a moment and then once more darkens into obscurity. In analyzing the problems of political warfare which have arisen in the first territory to be occupied by American troops, it is therefore of the greatest importance that we keep in mind the psychology and traditional mentality of these men.

In 1918 General Foch said to Clemenceau, "You know, I am not subject to your orders." Clemenceau replied succinctly, "I don't know where you got that idea, but I advise you to forget it." He knew that the military leaders, for the most part sons of noble families, educated in religious schools, consented only reluctantly to work with the Republican ministers, secretly regretting that they could not eliminate them altogether. Marshal Pétain was adept at concealing his counter-revolutionary game. I had so often seen him scraping and bowing before Clemenceau that I firmly believed him to be a Republican until the day he was named ambassador to Madrid to do the bidding of Franco. Up to that time I had despised him only because he had been a defeatist during the last war and his defeatism had almost made possible a German victory. Nor did Marshal Foch possess civic virtues to match his military talents. Publicly he approved the pacifist policy of Briand; in private he denounced it. Anatole France, in his delightful "Souvenirs de jeunesse," wrote: "Having once been a hero on the battlefield, my Uncle Hyacinthe thereafter believed himself absolved from all moral obligation." How many Hyacinthes I have met since the last world war in the ranks of the war veterans!

The case of General Noguès, Resident General of Morocco, provides a striking illustration of the "Vichyism" to be found among many French military and civil functionaries. Are these men supporters of the "New Order," admirers of Hitler and Mussolini? Most of them are not. They are opportunists of the smallest caliber, trying to hang on to their jobs at all costs for the sake of the comfortable pensions they carry. As long as Pétain held the purse strings, even though it was by the grace of Hitler, whose victory at the end of 1940 appeared certain, Pétain was France for these office-holders.

General Noguès was filled with dreams of personal ambition when the German armies invaded France. At that time he believed, it may be said to his credit, that the French government would move to Africa and would delegate to him supreme military power. In order to influence the government in that direction and demonstrate that he had the forces with which to support French resistance overseas, he sent two officers of his command to Bordeaux. They arrived at Marignane on the very day that Pétain succeeded Reynaud as President of the Council of Ministers, and were arrested as soon as they had stated the object of their mission. General Noguès did nothing to obtain their liberation; on the contrary he promptly disavowed their mission by his acts. While he was in Algiers, his police arrested Georges Mandel at Casablanca. Lord Gort and Mr. Duff Cooper, who had flown from England to confer with Mandel, were denied an interview by the police. Mandel was then ordered to leave Morocco for France, where he was thrown into prison.

Having decided to hitch his wagon to the Pétain star,

General Noguès organized the defense of the Moroccan Protectorate not for the purpose of repulsing a German or Italian attack but rather to oppose any English or American landing. His conduct last November when American boats appeared on the horizon was dishonored him for all time. Landing operation or commando raid? he asked himself before deciding on a course of action. If he had believed it to be a landing operation, no doubt he would have cried, "Long live Roosevelt! Long live Churchill!" But thinking, apparently, that this was only a hit-and-run commando raid, he continued to shout, "Vive Pétain!"

Recently, in the New York Times, General Bethouard, General Giraud's envoy to Washington, expressed some timid, though plain, doubts about General Noguès, but apparently harbored no resentment against the Moroccan governor for having arrested and imprisoned him. I am less indulgent than Bethouard. I cannot understand why Noguès is allowed to remain in power in Morocco surrounded by a band of dissolute and unscrupulous hangers-on such as gather in the wake of every revolution and counter-revolution. How can anyone understand it who knows that Noguès was willing to sacrifice the lives of thousands of Americans and Frenchmen for his own material interests? Even Darlan was unable to obtain from him a pledge to cease armed resistance. At Port Lyautey a regiment of tirailleurs drove the American troops back into the sea, and at Oran one American regiment lost a third of its effectives. General Noguès refused to give the order to "cease fire" until he had been informed by the German general who headed the Disarmament Commission in Morocco that the supply of ammunition was exhausted. Following Noguès's instructions, Admiral Michelier sent to the bottom of the harbor not only the French warships under his command but a number of merchant ships as well.

This man, skilled in the devious by-paths of politics, had been able to capture the confidence of Léon Blum, who appointed him a high civil commissioner in spite of the vigorous campaign carried on by the newspaper Populaire to limit the employment of generals to specifically military duties.

To the standard of General Noguès at Rabat flocked all the derelicts of the French fifth column. Noguès chose as his Minister of Interior the notorious Colonel Guillaume, whom one met everywhere, at the homes of Lyautey, Deschanel, Loucheur, Caillaux, Jean Hennessey, even at the house of the British millionaire Guinness—wherever he could collect favors and profits. In almost every newspaper—the Petit Journal, the Quotidien, the Vendémiaire—Guillaume was attacked as thief and sycophant. During the years 1927 to 1930 he headed the boards of several suspect companies founded by a Syrian rascal named Sacazan, and it was only through his quick-wittedness that he avoided serving a prison term with Sacazan. Just before war broke out he was publisher of Cboe, the Cagoulard paper which was waging a bitter fight against Colonel de la Rocque, leader of the Croix de Feu, because De la Rocque was willing to receive secret subsidies from André Tardieu and Pierre Laval but not from Hitler or Mussolini, and, too, because he had failed to translate into bloody deeds his veiled threats of revolt. Naturally Guillaume had no place in his Moroccan police for honest men. Chevreux, for example, the former Prefect of the Marne and director of the Sûreté Nationale, found no employment with Guillaume, though he had served Marshal Lyautey in Morocco well and faithfully.

It is unfortunate that America and Britain, in the interest of their own cause and that of France, have not seen fit to stop the night flights of these Vichy-inspired chauves-souris—chauves-souris who can change their habits to fit the circumstances—"I'm a bird, see my wings! Now I'm a mouse, long live all rats!"

The First Execution

THOSE who look askance at promises and pledges made by leaders of the Fight for Freedom must learn to restrain their pessimism. In one instance at least the ponderous machinery has begun to move: the first session in the trial of the war guilty has officially opened.

The record of the man now before the august tribunal of the United Nations could not be more burdened with infamy. In the summer of 1940, while noble old Marshal Pétain, with the support of the entire Catholic bloc, tried to save France from spiritual disintegration, this man rebelled against his Führer and his country. When he was taken into the Allied coalition for reasons of expediency, he embarrassed his mentors by calling for action—at a moment when a comfortable quiet reigned on most fronts. With further lack of democratic discipline, he insisted upon introducing into the purely military issue of winning the war all kinds of disturbing political claims. Not satisfied with talk of "compulsory democracy," he actually accepted Communists into his ranks in a disgraceful attempt to revive the French people's front of the middle nineteenth thirties.

Drawing by Hoffmeister

But it was after the landing of American troops in North Africa that he proved himself one of those "premature anti-fascists" who by their impatience and lack of comprehension courted real disaster. He wanted the re-establishment of the laws of the Republic; he wanted a democratic government in North Africa; and he wanted all this at the very time when the more realistic General Giraud was proclaiming "not politics but war" as the edict of the hour.

This first war criminal appeared before the court of the United Nations last week. The Washington correspondent of the New York Times presented the opinion of "informed circles" that the culprit was an "ambitious and disturbing element" in the conduct of Allied affairs. The name of the convicted man, shown on the preceding page, is General Charles de Gaulle.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IT WOULD not have been surprising if the brighter situation on what is for Germans the chief front, the Russian, had brought an improvement in the people's morale. But everything indicates the contrary. One gets the impression that there is only a one-track connection between military events and morale: every bit of bad news increases the depression, but good news brings only slight relief. It is just in these last weeks, moreover, that the full convulsive meaning of the total mobilization has been brought home to the people. These facts explain the government's continued admonitions and reassurances, which are such a sure indication of what is going on in the heads of the people.

In the last days of March a noteworthy new theme made its appearance. The leading article of the Essener Nationalzeitung of March 28 was entitled Is War Economy Bolshevism? The Frankfurter Zeitung of the same date was more definite, heading its leading article German Government's Demands on the People Are Not Bolshevism. Similar articles were carried by all the other newspapers and are still appearing. The Nazi regime is defending itself against the accusation that it is "exactly as communistic as the Communists."

The German upper classes have long called the Nazis Bolsheviks, and they will hardly have changed their opinion under the impact of the new measures each day brings forth. On March 24 the Berlin Börsenzeitung announced Neutrality or War?

Many Americans may have overlooked the sharp tone of Ambassador Litvinov's reply to the question whether or not he believed Spain's neutrality to be assured, as some official circles in Washington and London would pretend. His reply, made in a press conference following his presentation of credentials as Soviet ambassador to Cuba, was quick and clear: "Who speaks about Spanish neutrality? Spain is at war with us. She is sending troops to fight us. You call that neutrality? I call it war." It might have been imagined that a statement of such importance, made by a high Soviet official, would receive the full attention of the New York press. But in the main papers it was covered in two short lines on the inside pages; in others, not at all. And why? Because it was more than a statement; it was an accusation.

that hereafter in towns with fewer than 50,000 inhabitants only one banking establishment would be allowed to do business; all others, including the branches of the great banks, must close. On the next day the same paper announced that the insurance companies were forbidden to seek new business through either advertisements and other printed matter or the visits of agents, or even through telephone calls. Next came the mysterious law that all persons who had bought stocks during the war, and all who bought them in the future, must make a declaration and send in the list as soon as the total amounted to 50,000 marks (about $20,000). Since such a registration has regularly been the forerunner of some kind of confiscation, the perceptible uneasiness is understandable. Every day some new decree of this kind is promulgated, and those who are hit—as we learn from Goebbels's current polemics against them—are reacting with the phrase "The Nazis learned that from the Bolsheviks."

The newest propaganda campaign, however, is concentrating on the middle class, especially the lower middle class, whose members have been convinced by the closing of thousands of "superfluous" stores, businesses, and handicraft shops that the Nazis are imitating the Bolsheviks. It is a fact that the majority of these shops will never open again; and in closing them the government has often destroyed the work of a lifetime or even of several generations. But the official campaign is trying to convince the people that the closings are only temporary and therefore not bolshevistic. The Allgemeinezeitung on March 20 went so far as to admit the measure "could perhaps be misunderstood." But nothing could be farther from the Hitler regime's intentions, it continued, than a bolshevistic "campaign of liquidation" designed "to destroy the middle class under the pretext of total mobilization." On the contrary, when the war is over it will be seen that National Socialism "always protects the middle class."

According to the Germans' own statements, the quota of foreign workers in many factories has risen to 75 per cent and more. Certainly the presence of foreign workers has become a phenomenon of major proportions in the Reich. In the official accompaniment two different motifs can be heard. Dr. Ley and Herr Sauckel, the man-power czar, affirm that everything is splendid. The imported serfs are happy; they are superb workers; they have become sincere friends and admirers of Germany. But other voices warn incessantly that the foreign workers are all potential enemies. "Foreigners," said a South German newspaper, "must be carefully watched when they are working at machines lest they cause serious damage through negligence or malevolence."

There is continuous propaganda against forming friendships with these foreigners. And not only on account of Rassenschande. The Gauleiter of Alsace, for example, declares that "national security and dignity and the maintenance of working discipline demand that a certain distance be kept." The Gauleiter of Saxony announces that he "sharply disapproves of the sentimentality of many Germans toward foreigners, especially those belonging to nations that have been our enemies." A North German newspaper pictures the modern Slavs as dangerous carriers of psychological bacilli: "We are exposed to a thousand alien influences. Many millions of foreigners now living in Germany are differently oriented from us and in consequence spread harmful opinions and rumors." To judge from this warning, many of the Slavs must be carrying on some kind of subversive propaganda—and what is more important, there must be members of the master-race who listen to the Slavs and at times agree with them.

File and Remember

Franco in Spanish Morocco

WE ARE meeting troops everywhere. The Caudillo has placed his best divisions in the Moroccan Protectorate. The troops are camping under complete war-time conditions, in tents and in field positions. The few cities likewise are heavily billeted, while barracks are being built everywhere.

The United States invasion of North Africa caused the Spanish government to take steps to safeguard the protectorate. Of course it is a military secret how many divisions have been deployed in Spanish Morocco for its protection. I have been obligated not to reveal anything about it. However, one thing is noticeable everywhere—a surprising number of troops from the Spanish mother country are stationed in Spanish Morocco at present.

One also may say that the divisions which have been deployed for the protection of Spanish Morocco are at least as many as General Eisenhower's formations in French Morocco. All these divisions are under the command of Spanish officers, who have at their disposal the vast experience gained during the days of the Spanish civil war.

Lieutenant General Yeldi Luis Orgaz is chief of the Spanish troops in Morocco. He also is High Commissioner in Tetuan, and directly responsible to the Caudillo, whose full confidence he enjoys. This man, to whom has been intrusted the task of protecting the safety of the bridgehead beyond the Strait of Gibraltar, is assisted by General Juan Yagué, commander of the Tenth Army Corps in Melilla, who earned fame during the Spanish civil war by his initiative and his spirit of attack.

Spain's officers and men in Morocco impress one as excellent and seasoned troops.—Berlin Transocean Broadcast, March 16.

Come and Get Us

Midsummer madness has made its appearance before the appropriate season. If all this talk about a second front is meant to function as effect to win the war of nerves, then I can only say that this war of nerves is being waged not on the German but on the British people. It is the British who are pinning their faith to the theory that their armies will be fighting decisive battles on the Continent this year. So far as the Germans are concerned, the topic arouses no excitement at all but just the calm, steady hope that the Anglo-American forces will indeed place themselves within the reach of the Wehrmacht's striking power on European soil, where the Axis commands the inner lines of communication and every preparation is being made to deal with any contingency that may arise. In Germany everybody is perfectly content to abide the stern test of iron tanks.—LORD HAW HAW over the Berlin short-wave radio.

The Unpolitical General

General Giraud's supporters stress that he is not a politician but a soldier. So do Marshal Pétain's supporters. The old Marshal's politics are well known. We also know General Giraud's. On March 1 he addressed the Economic Council of Algiers. His speech was broadcast, but the daily press reported it only very incompletely. Among unreported passages: "I believe professional organization to be better than political agitation. I believe in class collaboration, and not in sterile class conflicts. I believe in work, in graduation of values, and in the necessity of having an élite. I believe in the rise of the lowest to higher positions according to their merit. I believe in youth, in cheerfulness, in good spirits, in willing effort. I refuse to believe in envy and hatred. And finally I believe in the army, in its enduring virtues."

If this is not the complete and undiluted glorification of the Fascist Corporate State, then words have lost their meaning. Everything is there. The élite, professional organizations instead of political agitation, class collaboration, "graduation of values," and, of course, the "enduring virtues" of the army as such. Mussolini must feel very proud to have such bright disciples in the enemy camp.—Tribune (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

PROFESSOR C. E. M. JOAD'S recent proposal that British marriage laws be altered to permit a man to take a number of mates has practically driven all other post-war plans out of my head. The adjustment of woman to man, and vice versa, is surely as important as fixing the Balkan boundaries—and a lot more fascinating; we shall never have a peaceful world until the aggressors of both sexes are forced to cease their depredations and be content with their own Lebensraum; et cetera, et cetera.

The great question is how to divvy up the living-room. Dr. Joad feels that "monogamy is unsatisfactory." "I, for example," he said, "like the company of different women for different purposes—one to go out to dinner with, another to go to church with, another to cook for me, another to mother me, another to play games with, and another to make love to."

Dr. Joad slyly attempted to give philanthropic and social color to his proposal by suggesting that polygamy might absorb Britain's preponderance of women: but he failed to mention economics. He did not indicate who was to pay for the dinner, take care of church dues, buy the groceries and the backgammon set. I hope this does not mean that he is merely trying to preserve the status quo.

With less cunning, the Professor quoted Shaw's remark that any woman worth her salt would prefer a fifth share of a first-rate man to a whole share of a fifth-rate man. But what about the woman who found herself assigned one-fifth of a fifth-rate man? And who would do the rating, the women or the men?

It is impossible, of course, to pass judgment on Dr. Joad's plan until we have seen the full text. At this writing, I discern only a pretext. But the whole thing smacks of male imperialism. I can't help feeling that it would let us in for another period of secret diplomacy, hidden rearmament, cordons sanitaires, buffer states, quarrels over warm-water resorts, and balance-of-power politics, which could only lead to new wars and profit no one but the manufacturers of cosmetics and the two-way stretch.

To put it baldly, I'm afraid that Dr. Joad is indulging in a dream of fair women. I, for example, can't think of six women of whom the other five would be content merely to go out to dinner, attend church, cook, mother, or play games, even if the situation had been fully explained to them and even if by accepting their assigned roles they achieved the privilege of being called Mrs.

SPEAKING OF BUFFER STATES: Walter Duranty recently said that Stalin will want an independent Soviet Republic of Manchuria, affiliated with the U. S. S. R., a "similar republic" of Korea, and even perhaps the Northwestern Chinese Soviet Republic of Sinkiang, Ningxia, and Shensi. He will also want the Baltic states, Petsamo, and access to Istanbul and the Persian Gulf. He will also want . . .

I don't suppose the other great powers will want any fewer buffers; and why won't one buffer automatically create the need for another buffer to protect the first buffer? And what will happen when some poor little duffer of a state is wanted by two, or even three, great powers as a buffer or as buffer to a buffer?

It all reminds me of the mad scene from Olsen and Johnson in which the policeman finds himself helping the burglar steal the hotel plumbing. It reminds me too of the remarks of Jack Downing almost a hundred years ago during the Mexican War. "What we've annexed in Mexico so far," he wrote, "isn't a circumstance to what we've got to do. . . . It's dangerous standin' still in this annexin' business. It's like the old woman's soap—if it don't go ahead it goes back." Downing also made that other cogent statement: "Uncle Joshua always says, in nine cases out of ten it costs more to rob an orchard than it would to buy the apples."

Buenos Aires, Argentina, April 6 (A.P.).—The Argentine courts seized all copies of the British documentary film "Big Blockade" today pending investigation of a German film company's charge that several battle scenes had been pirated from the Nazi propaganda picture "Blitzkrieg" in violation of the copyright laws.

It is reported that the Nazis are also planning to sue General Montgomery, the R. A. F., the Flying Fortresses, and the Red Army for similar infringement of copyright.

SENTENCE OF THE WEEK (from a dispatch in the New York Times): "This question is looked on with importance here."

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Boy from Illinois

BETWEEN THE THUNDER AND THE SUN. By Vincent Sheean. Random House. $3.

JAMES VINCENT SHEEAN'S "Personal History" was a fine book. It became the cultural Baedeker of a generation of Americans. This is its pale sequel.

"Between the Thunder and the Sun" is extremely well written, very interesting in parts, but quite unimportant. It describes Mr. Sheean's travels and experiences between 1935 and Pearl Harbor. The history has been written many times before, and the personal is not very significant.

Sheean met the exalted everywhere—Churchill, H. G. Wells, G. B. Shaw, the Duke of Windsor, Juan Negrín, Maisky, Mme Sun Yat-sen, Mme Chiang Kai-shek, and many others. Instead of the brilliant thumb-nail sketches his gifted pen might have given us Sheean limits himself to reporting a little conversation and a few externals. The best portrait, and a most fascinating one, is that of Mrs. Sheean's father, Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, the renowned British actor. But it has no relation to world events and little even to Sheean. In "Personal History" the personal was history; the individual encountered the problems which might face millions like him. Here the personal is personal and private.

The boy from Illinois has reached the heights. All the salons of what he calls "international society" and the manors and dinner parties of dukes and lords are open to him. The boy from Illinois has fallen among the mighty. He still has talents. He has a good head, and his heart is in the right place. He has been consistently and actively anti-fascist. The poor, as ever, are the salt of the earth to him. His sympathies are with the downtrodden. But the Midwestern young man who climbed the mountain, saw the world, and grappled with it is only dimly discernible in these pages. The planetary conflict between the angels heralding the future and the satans guarding the past is forgotten. Perhaps the struggle on the battlefield has temporarily eclipsed the larger struggle behind the front. The blitz blinded him. Sheean's joy at having titled lords as his allies against Hitler blots out their noble blemishes. Having come close, he cannot look too closely.

Sheean feels somewhat self-conscious about this hobnobbing with British aristocracy and seeks to apologize. He good-humoredly tells how his friends, notably Bill Stoneman of the Chicago Daily News, with whom he lived for a time in London, used to rib him. When Jimmy came home he would find messages from Bill reading: "The Duchess of Westminster wants you to come to cocktails tomorrow. Will you please ring up the King tonight. And don't forget Lady Astor." But, cries Sheean, the Tories have ruled England for centuries and rule it completely today, and by drinking and eating with them I get to know the people who make the wheels go round. No, Jimmy, old friend. You saw the Tories much more clearly from the trenches of Madrid and from the banks of the Ebro flowing red with the Spanish people's blood. You saw them much better on that London bus ride you described in the first chapter of "Not Peace but a Sword." And Jack Belden, bright new star among the foreign correspondents, saw them equally well from Burma ("Retreat with Stilwell"). Perspective is better than proximity for sight and insight. By their works shall you know them, not by their charming words, their week-ends, and their panic legislation.

Sheean sat in the gallery of the House of Commons on the eve of Dunkirk and watched Parliament adopt legislation which gave the British government the right to take over the entire economy of the country. Since then that act has been applied against about five factories; but it holds the laboring population in its place. At the height of another crisis, when Hongkong, Malay, Singapore, and Rangoon had just fallen, the Tory-controlled government drafted the Cripps offer. Subsequently it was sabotaged; more recently Churchill, and now Eden, have told us that India is to remain a British colony. Mr. Churchill's latest broadcast painted a pink picture of the future Britain, but the only concrete thing it did was to pigeonhole the Beveridge Report, which might open the road to that future. These are your Tories, Jimmy.

Although contact made him tolerant, Sheean also quarreled with the aristocratic English about their past appeasement policies, and, son of the prairie that he is, he is ever wedded to democracy. "The people would never choose war if they could have peace," he declares, and this, in his opinion, goes for Germany too. He felicitously calls democracy "government by electricity" and dilates on the role of the radio and the press in modern representative regimes. Always an interventionist, Sheean nevertheless recognized that the United States would fight "only when it was directly, physically, attacked." But Soviet Russia behaved likewise, and Sheean regards the Soviet-Nazi pact as a grave blunder. In other words, dictatorships make mistakes too.

This book will probably reach many Americans and do them some good. But Sheean is capable of better work.

LOUIS FISCHER

Nationalism in Eden

THE NEAR EAST: PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS. By

Count Carlo Sforza, H. A. R. Gibb, Salo W. Baron, Charles K. Webster, Quincy Wright, Philip W. Ireland, Editor. The University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

THE region in which Oriental legend placed the Garden of Eden and history has located early civilization has become the wrestling ground between the British Empire and German would-be imperialism. Since the attention of all the belligerents is focused on this Near Eastern area, we are indebted to the Harris Foundation and to P. W. Ireland, himself the greatest authority on Iraq, for making available in book form the lectures on this important subject delivered last June at the University of Chicago.

The main problems here discussed are the conflict between religious and nationalistic principles in the East, Arab unity, and British policy as contrasted with an internationally controlled world order forecast by the Atlantic Charter. Professor Wright cannot be blamed for his vagueness in outlining the future, but his prediction is comforting that with the increase of communication "the type of political forces dominant in the world will more and more dominate in the Near East." Count Sforza, in his brilliant and scholarly lecture, expresses his hope for an entente between Arabs and Jews, but is pessimistic in so far as two world wars have shattered the moral basis of European ascendancy over Asia. I cannot share his assumption that because of lack of imagination the Turks take the "gigantic fraud" of Nazism as a permanent force and that "the soul of Turkey is with Germany." The soul of Turkey was never on the side of Germany, and not even its body would have been there had not German economic expansion acquired predominating influence.

With regard to pan-Arabism, Count Sforza reassures us that this catchword is but a phantom, as pan-Islamism was prior to World War I. In the first of his two masterful lectures we are told by Professor Gibb that Arab nationalism has avoided raising social issues. In the second he explains that complete political unification of the Arabs in the near future is unattainable chiefly because of the narrow-minded wishful thinking of pan-Arab nationalists. However, Professor Baron thinks an Arab federation with British cooperation is probable in the future, and he believes there will be a permanent settlement of the Arab-Jewish controversy in Palestine when this war is over. This antagonism is but one of many which the rising tide of nationalism has created in the East. Professor Webster candidly attributes the crisis of the conflict in the current war to the failure of British policy "to translate democracy into economic and social welfare." Nationalism, unlike religion, promises earthly prosperity, and not even the Garden of Eden can be transformed into a national paradise as long as the population of rich oil areas lives in extreme poverty.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Gandhi's Genius

A WEEK WITH GANDHI. By Louis Fischer. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.

IT SOMETIMES happens that a book of real importance is given so little attention by the professional reviewers that at the close of the season very few remember that it was even published. I think Louis Fischer's book on Gandhi is a case in point. Those who have talked to Mr. Fischer since his return from India cannot doubt that he feels himself to have been in the presence of a great man. Whatever one may think of Gandhi's ineffectual fast, or of his tactics, any impartial account of the man must record that he has laid firm foundations for Indian liberty. And to lay firm foundations in this tumble-down century is a sign of greatness.

Mr. Fischer is not a novelist and rarely makes use of a novelist's technique. We do catch glimpses of the little bowed man with the white mustache and the small gleaming eyes. We do see him emerge from the ashram, his arms over the shoulders of young boys, while the wealthy merchants stand by hoping for a smile. But there is little of the inner man on display. We do see what kind of argument causes Mr. Gandhi to change his mind; we can hear him grow heated in his conversation and from it we can tell what kind of enthusiasm he has. Many of those contrasts that one might have expected are not to be observed in this encounter. This was no meeting of East and West, for Mr. Gandhi revealed himself to be almost more Western than his questioner. Rarely, indeed, does the Oriental, as we have been taught to understand it, show itself in Gandhi. Once Mr. Fischer asked Gandhi whether he believed in the transmigration of souls. "Of course," Gandhi answered, but instead of replying in terms of Hindu philosophy, he employed arguments conventional among Anglo-Saxons. It was then that the Occidental showed up in Mr. Fischer. "Does it not all arise from the weak mortal's fear of death?" he asked, and this illogicality, for such it is to an Oriental, drew a characteristic Indian reply. "I have no fear of death. I would regard it with relief and satisfaction."

Again and again the Western reader will recognize the Hindu leader's arguments. The struggle against the British imperialists must necessarily become one against the Indian landlords, and when he is asked how the peasant will be given the land, the reply is that he will simply occupy it—the apotheosis of squatting, that is to say. It is an idea one has met before many times. Countless syndicalist conventions in France, Italy, and Spain have grown excited about this simultaneous breaking of fences.

There are few paradoxes in the thinking of this wholly simple man. There is no conflict between principle and tactic, such as one finds in almost every Anglo-Saxon socialist these days. Gandhi, who would not be regarded as a compromiser by most whites, nevertheless thinks of himself as one, and declares that this is because he is never sure that he is right. What he means, of course, is that he is not certain that his choice of moment is correct for the task of total liberation. So many have tried to find in Gandhi's doctrine and practice of non-resistance to evil something peculiarly Oriental. It is not so. The choice has been made upon wholly rational grounds, I believe, and is regarded as applicable only to an epoch. Gandhi is not only a fundamentalist; he is a master tactician. No other doctrine but his could have enabled the Indian Congress to grow. Had the Marxists or other advocates of open struggle obtained control of it in its early history, the British long ago would have crushed it out of existence before it had grown to appreciable size. Non-resistance, by imposing tasks which make no test of military strength, but which try a man's fortitude, and perhaps make use of his desire for martyrdom, has kept the idea of opposition to British rule alive during periods of greatest aggression. The chosen tactic has kept it alive, also, in times of ease, and that, perhaps, is more difficult. It is because Gandhi is a master tactician, I believe, that Louis Fischer was able to get him to change his mind about the presence of British military authorities in India. Fischer made Gandhi see that a new tactical and strategical perspective had opened, nothing more.

Again, India is regarded as the home of mysticism; yet there is little of the mystical in the Congress leader. Gandhi worships much as any Western pantheist might worship. He imposes upon himself a weekly day of silence. But he appears to draw his strength neither from worship nor from meditation. One will search in vain for the smallest fissure in this man's integral character; the ordinary tools of psychological analysis can get little purchase upon him. He is not great because of profound resentment; in his life evidently he is not compensating for some deficiency. He is not like Napoleon, the servant of an overwhelming intuition about the fighting of single battles, nor is there any vision of the perfect India in his mind. He will not commit himself to this or that description of Indian society. Democratic in every instinct, he does not think highly of our parliamentary democracy. He thinks of India as a country of 700,000 self-governing villages. Nevertheless, he will not be pinned down to agrarian anarchism, any more than to economic centralism.

It is when one reads these sections of the book that one sees that the man's whole thinking contains only one totally clear, simple, and stupendous image—India without the white man. It is in order to preserve within himself the full force of this simple idea that he refuses to commit himself to political doctrines. Within his own soul he is a great tactician as he is with the masses of India. The outer and the inner of this man are one. Nothing within him shall erode his simple passion for liberty, though given a chance he would doubtless be adequate to the tasks of office. Nothing in the long-drawn-out battle with British imperialism shall split Congress into warring sects. Oddly enough, if one looks around to find another man like him, that man turns out to be Churchill. The Briton, too, is a man whose simplest passion overcame his sectarian prejudices. Yet what a difference there is between them; for to the Englishman, British liberty is in no way diminished by India's servitude. One will search this book in vain for any sign of so tremendous a sophistry in the Hindu.

RALPH BATES

Skilled Workers

NATALIE MAISIE, AND PAVILASTUKAY: TWO TALES IN VERSE. By John Masefield. Macmillan. $2.50.

SONG AND IDEA. By Richard Eberhart. Oxford. $1.50.

IF THERE IS TIME. By Hildegard Flanner. New Directions. $1.

POEMS. By John Berryman. New Directions. $1.

WHEN the reader dug and the poet span, who was then the gentleman? Neither; but the poet had a better time. Poets have great experiences, even when writing bad poems. But the reader wants them too; and poets have no shame, and illustrate Nietzsche's concept of Eternal Recurrence. Of a recent group, Masefield recurs annually, sometimes oftener; Eberhart and Flanner every two or three years. Why? Sometimes I think no poet should be allowed to publish a book until he is dead, and severely intelligent friends and enemies have done much sifting. That would at least spare us the strenuous burrowing for nuggets, and the absurd feeling as the parade goes by: "Ah, a new X!"—when nine times out of ten it's just the same old X.

There are accidental mitigations, to be sure. Sometimes even the same old X is a relief from the same new Y's and Z's, all spinning Yeats-Auden thread like mad. Masefield's latest product has been much battered by the critics, especially those whom the war has stung to a belated zeal for social significance, but I find it rather nice. He tells two stories, a romantic love tale of Peter the Great's Russia—which, he tells us in the last stanza, has also been done as a ballet, and a very charming one it could make—and a Shangri-La fantasy about a man of today who finds in an Indian jungle a ruined temple showing that some human beings once lived like human beings. Both stories are very well told in straightforward, simply musical verse. I see nothing wicked in a poet's being unpretentious, and something very good about a Laureate in war time dreaming dreams of a Happy Land without lawyers, priests, politicians, or "the martial thing, all uniform and snort."

Richard Eberhart's less reliable skill is far more interesting. He has piercing directness of vision, a sometimes child-like and always virile accuracy of statement, and a blessed simplicity that makes it impossible not to mention Blake. Not in condescension, either: when so many try for Donne's intensity without his speed, it is a delight to hear a different and more successful echo. But these qualities of Eberhart often break down into an awkward stammer, a semi-inarticulateness that is the worse for seeming deliberate. Perhaps this is entailed in being a Naive Poet—in Schiller's phrase—in this century: "I gave the moral answer and I died/And into a realm of complexity came/Where nothing is possible but necessity/And the truth wailing there like a red babe." Eberhart's skill is particularly gladdening for its versatility. With poets like Flanner, Berryman, and far too many others almost every poem reiterates one state of mind, the same scene with different properties: for example, Flanner the Sensitive, Thinking Young Woman, Berryman the S. T. Y. M. Eberhart is whatever the creative moment impels him to be: Modern Man, yes, but as boy, son, lover, sophomore, listener to cicadas, etc., etc. This protean quality makes for enlivening

AMUSEMENTS

John Steinbeck's

THE MOON IS DOWN

Now!

A 20th Century-Fox
Picture

Rivoli
8944 AT
49th ST.

PUBLICATIONS

YOU'LL WANT TO READ

freedom

A quarterly commentary on all aspects of liberty

PRYNS HOPKINS, editor

Consistently fine articles by top-notch writers on all phases of freedom—genetic, aesthetic, psychological, industrial, political and intellectual.

SUBSCRIBE NOW

Single Copies 25 Cents

By Subscription

Twelve Issues: $2.00

1375 S. Oak Knoll Avenue

Dept. TN,

Pasadena California

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue

New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11

☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

experiences, and the less lively ones may be ascribed to ■■ embarrassment of riches, not the struggles of poverty.

Hildegard Flanner is a very slick writer. One is constantly impressed, and almost never excited, by the neatness of her poignancy. She herself, seemingly aware of this, sometimes throws in a Hopkins-like twist of syntax or a flurry of exclamation-marks, for ■■ jolt, but without strong effect. Her poetic Gestalt is model-T Millay: Woman, fascinated and repelled by Life, unable to see anything objectively, terribly preoccupied with the pain of it, gritting her teeth though, trying hard to transcend her own warping intensity. The consequent monotony is scarcely relieved by such ventures into thought as a "reply" to Tennyson, stating that of old Freedom stood, not sat, on the heights, so that "It takes ■■ thinking man to reach her lap." Surely this sort of thing should be left to Edna, who can do it much worse. And Miss Flanner should try to break away more from the pentameter, that delight of elegiac adolescents; her technique ought to be at least as mature as her meaning.

John Berryman's work is very young, very taut, very solemn. He likes the bony, stony feel of late and middle Yeats, and aims at it with some success. But he is best when he lets the grip of the Crisis relax a little. A neat satirical poem, Communist, and a charming evocation of the pleasures of friendship. A Poem for Bhain, suggest that he may yet give the questing reader something that won't remind him of 100,000 newspaper headlines or will lift him past them if it does.

FRANK JONES

Mr. Smith

LIFE IN A PUTTY KNIFE FACTORY. By H. Allen Smith. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

UNTIL the publication last year of "Low Man on ■■ Totem Pole," Allen Smith was known only to the readers of the New York World-Telegram, but his book gave the rest of the reading public a chance to enjoy him, and enjoy him they did, because "Low Man" leaped high on the national best-seller list and stayed there. Now he has written ■■ new book, and it can be reported that this volume is every bit as amusing as his first.

A native of Indiana, Allen Smith is ■■ American as baseball. Although he tries to write with ■■ nasal twang, his style—he claims he hasn't any—is unadorned but clean and lean ■■ first-rate journalism always is.

Smith protests vigorously that he is not socially conscious, that he is not interested in the "masses," but unerringly he seems to jab his "putty knife" into the spots that need prodding; Pegler, stuffed shirts, writers who take themselves too seriously, bartenders who don't, worshippers of "family," pretentiousness in any form, all call Mr. Smith to arms. He rarely misses his target.

Unlike most humorists, Smith does not use ■■ stylized formula to get his effects. For the most part he relies on the bizarre quality of his material and his ability to get the most out of it. He writes of ■■ lady bartender who thinks all her customers are aviators, of a fortune-teller who will only take her fee in desserts, of ■■ jockey who is an expert on the technique of the ballet, of a copy-writer who cannot stand the word "ergo," of another who saw wolves, of a practical joker who should have been hung; in fact he has uncovered an entire gallery of nearly mad hatters. Through it all Smith himself wanders amiably, interrupting to tell about his father and his own newspaper and radio experiences. He also injects a few kind words for Walter Winchell, Fred Allen, Hollywood, Broadway, and a great many of his friends. The last-named group will find themselves listed in the front of the book among the cast of characters, but they will have to read the entire book to find out what he has said about them—a task I am sure they will find both pleasant and entertaining, as will most readers.

GEORGE JOEL

Fiction in Review

TAKEING its text and title from "Paradise Lost," Hiram Haydn's "By Nature Free" (Bobbs, Merrill, $2.75) is the story of a moody young man named Philip Blair who works in ■■ dull office by day and at night labors on ■■ monumental intellectual history of the nineteenth century, of Philip's relation with his wife, a fine and beautiful woman unscathed by two years at Bryn Mawr, with his father, a retired street-car employee (known only as Dad) who takes his baseball and his democracy with equal seriousness, and with his brother Harvey (love 'em and leave 'em Harvey), who had suspicious intercourse with the Nazis in South America before he returned to the suburbs of Cleveland to threaten the Blair way of life. An autobiographical novel in no obvious sense but simply because its hero is the usual sensitive young man whose sufferings may be supposed to be those of his author, "By Nature Free" is chiefly interesting as still another example of the significant change that has come over autobiographical fiction in the last few years.

For in reviewing Michael Blankfort's "A Time to Live" last week, what I objected to most strongly was its urgent self-castigation: the trouble with Mr. Blankfort's Ernie Cripston was that, while Rome burned, he had fiddled away at playwriting and remained a doubting fellow-traveler instead of becoming ■■ member of the Communist Party. But the self-reproach that tortured the pages of "A Time to Live" is no isolated phenomenon peculiar to Mr. Blankfort; it is merely an extreme instance of something of which anyone who follows current fiction must be increasingly aware—the bad conscience of this generation of novelists; and of course it is in the autobiographical novel or the novel of development that this tendency to self-blame becomes most apparent. For while, in the twenties and even in the early thirties, it was the whole point of the autobiographical novel that society is responsible for the unhappy condition of the author-hero, nowadays it is the author-hero who is responsible for the unhappy condition of society. Here, then, is the result of ten years of literary social consciousness, topped off by a new world war. Persuade ■■ writer that anything in the world is expected of him except literature—politics, sociology, economics, religion, anything at all except the job of art—and you can hardly expect him to practice literature without guilt.

"Every man's law must first come from inside himself, from his learning to rule himself with freedom," says one of the characters of "By Nature Free," and Philip Blair's struggle to make this law for himself, to lower his denominator and find some measure of domestic peace, is the major substance of the book. But although in another day this effort at self-understanding would have been a quite sufficient burden to lay on a hero, it is not enough for the current novelist; the hero of "By Nature Free," it turns out, must learn to rule himself with freedom not simply because it will make him more comfortable in the world, but because it is his duty to society. "[All men] are equal in that they have a native capacity to learn how to govern themselves; they are free alike in their privilege to choose this course, which in turn alone leads to true liberty," Mr. Haydn's spokesman continues. "And only when these facts . . . are realized, will democracy cease to be a dream or a slogan or a joke, and only then will you walk on your hind legs like men." Having misunderstood the nature of human freedom, in other words, Philip can blame himself not only for the miseries of his private life but for the miseries of the world; the fate of democracy rests on the proper integration of liberty and law in the individual, and consequently every time Philip is sullen with his wife he is undermining the democratic order! Well, whatever the nobility and basic soundness of this view of the relation between man and the state, surely, in both fiction and life, to live with so exacerbated a sense of cosmic responsibility is scarcely to live at all. Or at the least it represents a neuroticism as dangerous as the neuroticism of irresponsible individualism.

And I think it is Mr. Haydn's mistaken notion of the function of the novel, his conception of fiction as preachment or warning and his guilty feeling that his pen should be at the immediate service of society, that makes the sum of "By Nature Free" so manifestly inferior to any of its parts and reduces the end of his book to absurdity. For instance, subordinating his truly novelistic talents to a non-novelistic purpose, Mr. Haydn, before he is through, has washed away all his main characters in political symbolism, a sin against taste that is especially to be regretted in the case of Dad, whose portrait is more than half a really distinguished job. Using Mr. Haydn's own criteria, I shudder for the society that would be willing to sacrifice the genuine dignity of Dad falling asleep on the porch to the spurious dignity of his Lionel-Barrymoresque mouthings of political folk-wisdom.

As for two other novels I read this week, Jo Pagano's "Golden Wedding" (Random House, $2.50) suffers, I'm afraid, from being published so soon after Jerre Mangione's "Monte Allegro." It is the same kind of Italian-American family reminiscence, but less charming than Mr. Mangione's very charming book. And "White Ensigns" by Taffrail (G. P. Putnam's, $2.50) unfortunately also has a predecessor, "East of Farewell" by Howard Hunt, in comparison with which it loses in novelty. Still, it is an informative and dramatic account of life on both a destroyer and an armed merchantman, and it should be meat to a landlocked sailor. And for anyone the several chapters that deal with the evacuation of Dunkirk are fascinating hints of the whole story that is yet to be told.

DIANA TRILLING

"A news item to the effect that the Victory Book Drive will continue indefinitely reminds us of the camp experiences of a librarian in World War I. The first night he took charge three soldiers asked for Plato's Republic and two for Paradise Lost. An Army cook (regular Army—not a draftee) requested Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy. The camp library didn't have it, but the librarian said he'd try to borrow a copy if the man was sure he really wanted it. The cook replied that he did want it—felt he had not fully understood it the first time he read it—and he cited numerous other works of philosophy he had enjoyed. After hearing these reminiscences, we decided to take another look at our bookshelves with the Victory Drive in mind."

The Pleasures of Publishing,
Columbia University Press.

Our men in the Armed Forces are the same kind of people they were in civilian life. If they were book-lovers, back home, they are doubly dependent on books now for intellectual stimulation, companionship, relaxation. Good books, in good condition, are wanted by the 1943 VICTORY BOOK CAMPAIGN for men in all branches of the service. Leave yours at the nearest collection center or public library.

DRAMA

High, Wide, and Handsome

OKLAHOMA!" (St. James Theater) is like the state it celebrates—high, wide, and handsome. I can't say I would ever have guessed that Lynn Riggs's play "Green Grow the Lilacs" would make an especially good book for a comic opera, but it does. Or at least it has been made so to serve, and the whole thing comes out as certainly one of the most lively, entertaining, and colorful musical comedies it has ever been my privilege to see. Richard Rodgers's music is original as well as tuneful; Oscar Hammerstein's lyrics are witty; Agnes de Mille's choreography is both beautiful and comic; Rouben Mamoulian's direction sets a vigorous tempo. What more could anyone ask? First-class performers perhaps? Some interesting scenic backgrounds? They also are provided in the course of an evening planned with a lavish hand as well as a talented one. The Theater Guild deserves congratulations but is pretty certainly due more substantial rewards. "Oklahoma!" is going to have a long run.

It is a notorious fact that Broadway's musical shows are generally good just in the degree that they are rowdy, slapdash, and orgiastic. We do the Bert Lahr-Ethel Merman sort of thing better than it was ever done before and in a way that makes such legendary institutions as the Folies Bergères look anemic. But I have seldom seen an American operetta that strove for some sort of good taste that did not strike me as tedious almost beyond endurance, and that is one of the things which make "Oklahoma!" seem astonishing. It is an operetta, not a revue; it does have a romantic story, it does seek its local color not from a night club on the one hand or a mythical kingdom on the other but from the wild and woolly West at the turn of the century. And yet it is vastly entertaining at the same time that it is fresh. I do not mean, of course, that "Oklahoma!" is solemn or even serious, that it goes in for realism or would call itself a folk play. What I do mean is that it has discovered a fresh source of themes to be treated with comic extravagance, and that the result is most exhilarating.

Perhaps the most important single element is the music of Richard Rodgers, which has a style all its own, a style even farther away from that of the tepid operetta tradition than it is from the pure jazz and swing of the usual revue. It is rhythmical enough and lively enough to suit Broadway taste, but it is also full of joyous melody which can sustain itself without that continuous rattle of drums and howl of brasses which may be fine for the jitterbug but is always a bit hard on the sedentary spectator. Two of his songs—the romantic "Oh, What a Beautiful Mornin'" and the lively "Farmer and the Cowman"—are sure to be heard frequently and for a long time. So too, I suspect, is the more conventional sounding "I Cain't Say No," which Celeste Holm sings with such good effect that it ought to make a star of her. All the other principals know how to make the most of their good material. Alfred Drake has a fine voice, Betty Garde makes a fine buxom aunt, Howard da Silva a fine villain, and Joseph Buloff a fine peddler whose demonstration of the "Persian goodbye" on the person of Miss Holm is neatly topped by her cowboy lover's counter-demonstration of "the Oklahoma hello." Joan Roberts, who is almost a newcomer to Broadway, does very nicely also as a romantic heroine.

Only two American operettas of the last two decades have been really remembered vividly enough to be frequently mentioned—"Showboat" and "Porgy and Bess." "Oklahoma!" is not so ambitious as the last, and it is not quite so phenomenally slick as the first. But personally I like it quite as well as either.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The paintings are more earth-bound, richer and bolder in color, yet do not lose the sense of space which gives to all these pictures an exhilaration.

DAVID SMITH. At the Willard Gallery, 32 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 1.

David Smith is one of the most interesting artists in America. His drawings are a disappointment. They are too bitterly political to be looked at solely as drawings, and the emotion they arouse is rather one of pleasurable curiosity at the tortures of the victims than one of horror. But his sculpture is superb; there is never a false note, no hesitation. Of the eighteen sculptures here each is perfect and sufficient. If one could make any criticism, one might say that Mr. Smith is happier with steel and bronze than with stone. But whatever material he uses, he is always a delight.

JEAN CONNOLLY

MUSIC

AN EVENT of first importance was Stravinsky's guest appearance with the Ballet Theater to conduct a performance of "Petrouchka." He had only the scratch orchestra which the Ballet Theater is having to use for its present New York season (and which at that is probably better than what audiences outside New York have been hearing); and there were plenty of sour sounds from the brass; but these were negligible blemishes in a performance that gave the music clarity of texture and outline, rhythmic steadiness and coherence, and the power which rhythmic control alone can produce. It would have been pleasure enough just to hear the superb work played in that way; but in imposing rhythm and order on the music Stravinsky inevitably imposed them on the stage performance that was based on the music.

As the music was strengthened by Stravinsky's participation, so was the stage performance by Bolm's. He was the Blackamoor, which he had been in the 1916 Diaghilev performances here; and in this role, despite the lack of agility that showed itself here and there, he was the most effective and impressive of the principals—the others being Massine as Petrushka (while the best Petrushka of recent years, Lazovsky, contributed only a brilliant First Groom) and Lucia Chase as the Dancer. And as the company's ballet master he presum-

Rhyming Made Easy

WOOD'S
Unabridged
RHYMING DICTIONARY

Here's quick inspiration for fresh, original verses and song lyrics. Based on phonetics rather than "eye-rhymes"; contains more rhyming words and sounds than any similar volume. Includes instruction course and poetry form book. 1290 pages.

$2.95

At your Bookstore

The World Publishing Company
Cleveland, Ohio

ART

RECENT PAINTINGS AND DRAWINGS. By Kurt Seligman. At the Durlacher Gallery, 11 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 1.

Precise but almost too delicately colored drawings—as though Mr. Seligman were trying to catch the shape and texture of currents of air in the atmosphere, ably was responsible for the over-all improvement in the performance. In sum, even with the sour sounds from the brass and Lucia Chase's Dancer and the supers turned loose to mill about on the stage as "merchants, officers, soldiers, ladies, gentlemen, etc.," this was a performance in which it was possible to recognize one of the artistic masterpieces of our century.

Of the two new ballets that were not ready last fall Tudor's "Romeo and Juliet" was still not completed the night of its first performance, and was exhibited in an incomplete form which took the action only as far as the preparations for Juliet's marriage. At the effect, the impact of the tragic scenes that may or may not be added in later performances I cannot guess; of the incomplete work I can report that the music of Delius was excellently chosen, the magnificent setting and costumes of Berman excellently contrived for Tudor's narrative invention, in which the familiar and limited Tudor vocabulary was used at times as it had been in "Lilac Garden" and "Pillar of Fire" and at other times with beautifully imagined fitness for the characters of Romeo and Juliet and the situations in which they were placed. Markova's dancing as Juliet was exquisite in its communication of youthful grace and feeling, but I found her make-up and wig disturbing; Laing was as superb a Romeo as one might have expected him to be; and the work of the entire company was excellent.

On the other hand "Helen of Troy," when performed at last, had music of Offenbach, scenery and costumes by Vertes, and choreography by Lichine which added up to something so flat, so bad that it should be buried as quickly as possible.

Danced for the first time by the Ballet Theater was Massine's "Capriccio Espagnol," with much of the early portion lacking precision, but with the last part made exciting as always by Massine's great presence and style, his invention for the rest of the company, and on this occasion by the brilliance and verve of Lazovsky. And among the older Ballet Theater productions there have been "Les Sylphides," "Pas de Quatre," and "Giselle" with Markova's great performances, Massine's "Aleko" with Markova and Laing, and Agnes de Mille's delightful "Three Virgins and a Devil."

Victor's March list offered Stokowski's latest recording of Stravinsky's Suite from "L'Oiseau de feu," made this time with the N.B.C. Symphony (Set 933, $3.68). I have seen comments on the set which held that this work lent itself to a performance like Stokowski's which made it a display of high-powered orchestral virtuosity and tonal brilliance. But after hearing "Petrushka" conducted by Stravinsky I doubt that he would agree that even the Infernal Dance of King Kastchei was properly played in the way those comments find suitable: I am sure that what he would want, and what he would produce himself with the relentless rhythmic control that he exhibited in "Petrushka," would be not nervous excitement but hard, brutal, terrifying power. And everything he has said makes me certain that he would loathe Stokowski's perfumed phrasing, his impassioned, feverish swelling of lush sound in the quiet Dance of the Princesses and Berceuse. The performance is reproduced with marvelous fidelity, richness, and spaciousness.

Also on Victor's March list was a volume of oratorio excerpts sung by Richard Crooks to orchestral accompaniments by the Victor Symphony under Charles O'Connell (Set 934, $3.68).

They comprise "Comfort Ye My People" from "The Messiah," "Total Eclipse" from "Samson," and "Sound an Alarm" from "Judas Maccabaeus"—all by Handel; and "Be Thou Faithful Unto Death" from "St. Paul," and "If With All Your Hearts," and "Then Shall the Righteous Shine Forth" from "Elijah"—by Mendelssohn. I like none of the Mendelssohn excerpts, and only the first two of Handel's—though I realize the third might be impressive in its context. Mr. Crooks's voice is a fine lyric tenor, which in much of this music he drives too hard in a declamatory or heroic style; and where he sings quietly, in some of Mendelssohn's music, he indulges in stylistic sentimentalities and tricky vocal colorings. The orchestral accompaniments are flabby. Voice and orchestra are superbly reproduced.

Victor's best March release was the single disc (10-1040, $.78) with Marian Anderson's beautiful singing of the spirituals "Let Us Break Bread Together" and "Oh! What a Beautiful City" to superb accompaniments by Franz Rupp. B. H. HAGGIN

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY INSTITUTE ON POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION

First Series of Conferences on Full Employment and Minimum Living Standards . . . 11 Successive
Wednesday evenings at 8 P.M.

Subject of April 21st Conference

RELIGION and MATERIAL SECURITY

Single admission, 75¢

Auditorium, Education Building

Greene and West Fourth Streets, near Washington Square East

The Speakers . . .

DR. LOUIS J. FINKELSTEIN

President of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America

REV. FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL

Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church; former President of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America

MONSIEUR JOHN A. RYAN

former Professor of Moral Philosophy and Industrial Ethics, Catholic University of America

For full particulars about this conference and the entire series of conferences, address The Director, Institute on Postwar Reconstruction, New York University, Washington Square, New York . . . or telephone SPring 7-2000, Ext. 270.

Letters to the Editors

From Down Under

Dear Sirs: I thought that you would be interested to know that you have several enthusiastic readers of your paper in this corner of the world. I regularly receive copies of the latest publications per media of a relative in the United States, and look forward to every number of what I consider to be the leading humanitarian journal in the English language. The passionate search for the truth, with an approach unfettered by any bigoted standpoint, is particularly appealing when the end result is a practical, positive one.

Your paper is an unending source of information on the workings of American politics and other matters that are not given much space in the limited pages of our press. But foreign references are also much appreciated, and it is a little disappointing to find that there are very seldom specific references to our country. Naturally, many of our problems are similar to your own, from isolationism to the Third International, but those that know our country will find much that is of importance to the future of the liberal world.

This is the home of much of the aggressive liberalism that is left among the Allied nations. I wonder if there are others so completely united on the question of the second front, on the political importance of labor, on the necessity of winning the war. True we have our Australia Firsters and our Social Credit supporters, but by and large there is no political movement of any strength based on a negative policy such as inspires the American "isms" arising from long-standing prejudices against people, class, and creed. And when impulsive critics charge us with being "squealers" and self-centered politically, can they remember how we answered the call in Egypt, Greece, and Crete?

And if we consider that people and the press on the other side of the world are too neglectful of the Japanese danger, do you blame us? We haven't neglected our duties arising from the demands of collective security—despite popular misunderstandings of the conscription question in Australia—and now we feel entitled to receive our share of support.

A paper such as yours could do much to arouse interest among your readers in the Australian political and socioeconomic scene. It could do much, too, to establish the urgency of the Southwest Pacific zone in the general picture of the United Nations strategy. Investigation of this question may reveal many important points of a non-strategic nature.

May The Nation long continue to flourish.

RON TAFT

Melbourne, Australia, March 1

Clubs and Color

Dear Sirs: Your editorial in the March 27 issue of The Nation assumes, and quite naturally, that it is the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs which has excluded Negro women from its membership. As a member and a founder of this organization I have been deeply disturbed by a situation which has invited unfavorable comment before the membership as a whole has had an opportunity to consider and to decide the issue involved. The federation has no provision in its constitution or by-laws which excludes Negro women from membership. In fact, it has had them as members. Clubs have long enjoyed complete autonomy within the framework of the organization.

That in certain sections of the country there would be prejudice against accepting Negroes as members cannot be denied. The National Federation has been in existence for nearly a quarter of a century, has some 1,800 branches and approximately 70,000 members. Organizations when they become large and as they grow older are apt to lose their flexibility, sometimes even suffer a kind of hardening of the arteries. In addition, many of us as individuals still carry the bias of our backgrounds. Prejudice is not, however, confined to this group alone. It is always easier to preach than to practice democracy.

But whatever our group unwieldiness or individual prejudices, there are within the National Federation many, and I am one of them, who realize that this country is now called upon to justify its profession of democratic principles. Every day we send our young men to die upon the battlefields in the faith that by their sacrifice freedom, justice, and opportunity will not perish from the earth. America must justify this, at home as well as abroad. Its integrity in this respect is, it seems to me, about the world's last great hope.

I do not speak here for the International Federation of Business and Professional Women, of which I am president. The question of race or creed or color has never arisen among the many complex questions we have faced. In my opinion it never could. But the interpretation of democracy which American women give, the squaring of the deed with the word, will have great impact upon the women of other countries. These are powerful weapons which our women wield and for which they must account. Those who profess democracy will not destroy the enemy or his false philosophy by turning their weapons upon the banner under which those who cherish freedom march.

Members of the National Federation will not, in my judgment overlook the import of these things when faced squarely with the issue raised as to their own membership. I can appreciate the particular prejudice involved and measure its deep roots. But I have faith in the integrity and courage of our members. Representing as it does the hopes and aspirations of another minority group, this group has always shown tolerance and a remarkable sense of fair play. I can think of no time when it failed to meet an issue honestly and with courage once it saw that issue clearly.

This issue has not yet been placed before the members of the National Federation. Therefore they must not be judged until they themselves have spoken. Wherever the fault or mistaken judgment may lie, their answer is yet to come.

LENA MADSEN PHILLIPS

Westport, Conn., April 2

One Detail

Dear Sirs: Your January issue, which has just arrived—and how glad we are to know that there is an America which realizes the European situation!—has a Hoffmeister cartoon showing Spanish Republicans in a North African concentration camp, watching the victorious American invaders go by. One detail is wrong. The men in the concentration camps are shown wearing suits: it is most unusual for a Spanish Republican who has probably been "in" for several years to be wearing anything but rags. I wonder if your readers know that the Vichy authorities so far disregarded Allied opinion as to condemn to death, after the American landing, a French officer who had escaped from prison in Germany in order to join the Free French and had hoped to get there by way of North Africa? But perhaps before this letter arrives, America will have recognized De Gaulle. It is time.

April 17, 1943

NAOMI MITCHISON

Carradale, Campbeltown, Argyll

March 18

How Do You Feel?

Dear Sirs: In your issue of April 3 John W. Follette states that I should have written, in a recent review, "Liben feels bad about white-collar slavery"—not, as I did, "feels badly." He is quite right. In future I shall feel bad, not badly, about poets who feel bad badly.

But does one not often hear, in conversation, "He feels badly about it," or "Don't feel so badly about it"? If this is not a figment of my ungrammatical imagination, it has a legitimate motive. "To feel bad" can also mean "to feel unwell," and different meanings call for different expression. The question is, should they get it, if it violates grammar? "To feel good," as distinct from "to feel well," does not. And did the adjective "well" (for which Webster gives no derivation) originate as the adverb of "good"? But this is guesswork, not to say casuistry. I am just trying not to feel bad. FRANK JONES
New Haven, Conn., April 3

Cry Hold! Enough!

Dear Sirs: Mr. McFee's letter in your last issue raises a question which involves such large issues that I fear the correspondence columns of The Nation would not have room for anything else were we to discuss them. Furthermore, the problem has been so thoroughly debated by C. S. Lewis and E. M. W. Tillyard in their book "The Personal Heresy" (1939) that it is hardly necessary to go into it again.

I would, however, like to point out to your readers just one more fact about Shakespeare before this correspondence ends. In the Authorized Version of the Bible "which was in course of printing when Shakespeare was forty-six years of age), and in no other version previously, in the 46th Psalm, the 46th word from the beginning combined with the 46th word from the end (not counting the direction Selah, which is no part of the text) makes the name Shakespeare" (Richmond Noble: "Shakespeare's Biblical Knowledge," 1935).

This fact, it seems to me, opens vistas which Mr. Brooks and Mr. McFee might do well to explore.

THEODORE SPENCER

Cambridge, Mass., April 3

Fan in the Army

Dear Sirs: I feel constrained to write and tell you what pleasure The Nation gives me each week. This is the mail I most look forward to receiving; it makes army life more tolerable with its objective view and high political standards.

C. L.

Aberdeen Proving Ground, Md.,

March 8

CONTRIBUTORS

TOM WINTRINGHAM commanded the British battalion of the International Brigade in Spain. Later he achieved some reputation as a writer of letters to London papers, predicting disaster unless the military changed their methods. After his predictions concerning Dunkirk and Narvik came true, he was placed in charge of England's Home Guard. He is the author of "New Ways of War."

VICTOR RIESEL is labor editor of the New York Post. He has written for The Nation, the American Mercury, and the McClure Syndicate, and broadcast on labor problems. He is correspondent for British, Canadian, and New Zealand labor papers.

NORMAN ANGELL, a member of The Nation's Board of Contributing Editors, is the author of "Why Freedom Matters," "The Great Illusion," and "The Unseen Assassins." He won the Nobel peace prize in 1933.

EMILE BURE, a well-known French journalist, was editor of the Paris newspaper L'Ordre until the fall of France. In the United States he edited La Voix de France until its recent merger with Pour La Victoire.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THIS NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

"A remarkable volume from any point of view."

—Saturday Review of Literature

BARRACK 3 ROOM 12

By Marcel Haedrich

NEWSWEEK

"... the war's most poignant story of Frenchmen vanquished. Entirely without hate, almost without recrimination but never without hope, a French officer has put into words what hundreds of propagandists have ignored or brushed aside: the dominant human equation in military defeat."

DALLAS NEWS

"BARRACK 3, ROOM 12 is the enormous room of World War II, if you subtract the realism of the letter of E. E. Cummings and add the realism of the spirit of Marcel Haedrich."

ST. LOUIS

GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

"A beautifully written story, simple, terse, tender, thoughtful...."

NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW

"... if Marcel Haedrich is not one of Old France's facile pens, his pen may well become a priceless tool in his hands in the new France."

BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB NEWS

"... Here is a great part of the spirit and strength of France. Here, too, is some of its weakness." $2.50

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK

386 Fourth Avenue, New York

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 9

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 and 5 It sinks till sunk
 10 Sounds like nothing, and may be the result of careless shaving
 11 "But if it be a sin to covet honor, I am the most ----- soul alive" (King Henry V)
 12 Surely a Roman's out of place in the galley?
 13 A mistake printers sometimes make
 14 Fancy getting a black eye in a shrine!
 15 You can be shot for this crime; to behead it won't save you
 16 Anti-aircraft artillery?
 21 Falls an easy victim to the man with the punch
 24 Some rise before they do so
 26 Tip Pete (anag.)
 27 A military contract possibly, but more usually an instruction to the troops (two words, 4 and 5)
 28 Sometimes replace feet
 29 Beat it for what Sambo called the encampment
 30 I do later

DOWN

- 1 A big gun in Congressional circles
 1 "Art"ful American general
 2 The organization he founded has developed thousands of good shots
 4 With a slight change of make-up this vocalist might preside at an inquest.

- 6 English racecourse at which the hopes of more than one American sportsman have come a cropper
 7 Go with the tide
 8 Tea is added to the dietary in this part of the army
 9 Every cause produces one
 16 Simple Susie was surprised when the butcher told her she must go to the confectioner's for this 17 Suitable companion for a footman?
 19 This is what you salute, not the man inside
 20 The sort of company most soldiers prefer?
 21 Red tape (anag.)
 22 Washington seems to be a first-class place
 23 If this were less it would be more
 25 Funny; seeing the Commander-in-Chief about a British order!

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 8

ACROSS:—1 PROFESSOR; 2 EXTRA; 9 LIE-ABED; 10 USELESS; 11 ENTWINE; 12 LUTETIA; 13 SHE; 14 DIPPER; 15 SATURN; 16 ASSET; 17 CHALICE; 22 YESTER; 23 VET; 27 STAMINA; 28 ARABIAN; 30 UNARMED; 31 NETTLES; 32 DATES; 33 LACERATED.

DOWN:—1 PULSE; 2 ONE-STEP; 3 EBB TIDE; 4 SIDLES; 5 DOUBTLE; 6 ELECTRA; 7 TREESTLE; 8 ABSTAINER; 14 HASTE; 15 DACHSHUND; 16 RAT; 17 STY; 20 ADAMANT; 21 ENIGMAS; 23 EXACTOR; 24 TRIPLET; 25 VANDAL; 26 TANNIC; 27 ROSED.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Adventuring Together.* By Louis Adler. Juvenile Service League. 50 cents.
East and West of Suez: The Story of the Modern Near East. By John S. Badeau. Foreign Policy Association. 25 cents.
Careers in Public Relations: The New Profession. By Averell Broughton. Dutton. $2.
All We Are and All We Have: Speeches and Messages Since Pearl Harbor. By Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. John Day. $1.25.
We Chinese Women: Speeches and Writings During the First United Nations Year. By Mayling Soong Chiang. John Day. $1.25.
Masters of Mobile Warfare. By Elbridge Colby. Princeton. $2.
The Enigma of Admiral Darlan. By Alec de Montmorency. Dutton. $2.50.
According to Doyle: A Cartoon History of World War II. By Jerry Doyle. Putnam's. $2.
A History of the United States. By Dwight Lowell Dumond. Holt. $5.
The Free Negro in North Carolina, 1790-1860. By John Hope Franklin. North Carolina. $4.
Brazil Builds: Architecture New and Old, 1652-1942. By Philip L. Goodwin. Museum of Modern Art. $5.
The Balance of Power. By Edward Vose Gullick. Pacific Research Bureau. 25 cents.
Palestine Plays. By Laurence Housman. Scribner's. $2.
Prologue to New England. By Henry F. Howe. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.
The Autobiography of a Curmudgeon. By Harold L. Ickes. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.
Jefferson: The Road to Glory, 1743-1776. By Marie Kimball. Coward-McCann. $4.
World Minerals and World Peace. By C. K. Leith, J. W. Furness, and Cleona Lewis. Brookings. $2.50.
Religion, Science, and Society in the Modern World. By Alexander D. Lindsay. Yale. $1.50.
From the Journal of Zador Long, 1800-1873. Edited by Peirce Long. Caxton. $4.
A Time to Act: Selected Addresses. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
France. By Pierre Maillaud. Oxford. $1.25.
Marriage, Morals, and War. By Richard Malkin. Arden Book Company. $2.50.
Do You Know Labor? By James Myers. John Day. $2.
The People of the Book. By Samuel Rosenblatt. Behrman's Jewish Book House. $2.50.
The Oxford Companion to Music. By Percy A. Scholes. Oxford. $7.50.
A Guide to Great Orchestral Music. By Sigmond Spaeth. Modern Library. $1.45.
The Canadian Born in the United States. By Leon E. Truesdell. Yale. $3.
Thomas Jefferson Then and Now, 1743-1943: A National Symposium. Edited by James Waterman Wise. Bill of Rights Sesquicentennial Committee. $1.50.
Wood's Unabridged Rhyming Dictionary. By Clement Wood. World Publishing Company. $2.95.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · APRIL 24, 1943

NUMBER 17

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 577

EDITORIALS

Planes for the Pacific 579
The Annual Wage 580
Save the FSA! 581

ARTICLES

Peace—the Culbertson System by Louis Fischer 582
25 Years Ago in The Nation 586
Relaxing Too Soon by I. F. Stone 587
India's Fighting Men by Colin S. Maclaren 588
In the Wind 590

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

More than Expediency by A. del V. 591
Dr. Goebbels Loses Sweden by Kurt Bernheim 592
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 593

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Limitations of Dickens by Henry James 595
"Henry James Place" by Morton Dauwen Zabel 596
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 599
The Lower Depths by Lionel Trilling 602
Mr. Willkie's Two Odysseys by Reinhold Niebuhr 604
The Growth of Cities by Albert Guérard 606
Welcome, Stranger! by H. P. Lazarus 608
"Manners, Morals, and Mistakes" by Louis Filler 608
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 609
Music by B. H. Haggin 611

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 10 by Jack Barrett 612

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KRITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS · LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR · J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

ACCUSTOMED AS OUR STATE DEPARTMENT is to rebuffs from dictators whose favor it seeks, its humiliation this week must be acute. The mightiest nation on earth has taken many an insult from the battered hero of Vichy, and it is regularly kicked by the propped-up knight of Spain, but to be soundly rebuked by the petty tyrant of a colonial isle—this is surely the dregs of the cup. What makes especially bitter the scolding administered to our diplomats by Admiral Robert, High Commissioner of Martinique, is the essential truth of his argument. Addressing his remarks to a reporter for the Associated Press rather than to the American government, Robert explained why he was loath to join the United Nations: "The manner in which the French who believed that the moment had come to join the United Nations have been treated by the Allies only confirms me each day in my prudence." Touché! From any decent viewpoint toward the war and toward fascism itself, Admiral Robert's conduct has been notorious, and the motives behind his present proposal are no more above suspicion than were Darlan's when he turned on Hitler. But as one De Gaullist spokesman pointed out, he has put "the whole French situation in a nutshell." The price of Robert's support of the United Nations, involving French gold reserves estimated in the hundreds of millions of dollars and a number of immobilized French warships, is threefold: it must not "mean the necessity of rebellion against the French government"; the Allies must permit the "French who are fighting—instead of constituting two factions, one dominated by Britain and the other by the American government—to form a unity under one single authority vested with sovereign rights"; and, third, the integrity of the French Antilles must be guaranteed.

★

ON CLOSE EXAMINATION, THESE DEMANDS square remarkably with those of General de Gaulle. Clarifying somewhat his ambiguous point about "rebellion," the Admiral remarked that he owed his post to the pre-armistice government of France. In other words, he suggests a belated allegiance to the Republic rather than to any supreme military authority that might be assumed by an individual general. This is the crux of the difference between De Gaulle and Giraud. The Fighting French want a provisional administrative authority in which the underground parties of metropolitan France have a part, an authority which can represent the sovereignty of France among the United Nations both in the conduct of the war and at the peace table. Giraud, on the other hand, wants only a central council of limited powers and composed only of colonial officials. He would have supreme authority vested in the commander-in-chief—himself presumably—until the liberation of France permits an election. Robert knows that the American government strongly favors the Giraud scheme, and his very antipathy toward the United States—he has never disguised it—appears to be driving him toward the De Gaulle camp. The Fighting French may understandably chuckle over his attempt to by-pass Giraud entirely in his flight from Vichy, but as one of their London spokesmen put it, "Robert is thoroughly impregnated with the Vichy spirit, and therefore it is not possible for the Fighting French to believe in his good faith." Robert, in short, has waited too long. Trusted by no one, he would seem to be hoist with his own Pétain.

★

THE SAN SEBASTIAN RADIO PROVIDES A perfect commentary on signs of renewed Anglo-American attempts to appease Franco. While Prime Minister Churchill is entertained at the Spanish embassy in London and our General Clark is the guest of the High Commissioner in Spanish Morocco, the San Sebastian radio announces that another contingent of the Spanish Blue Division has arrived on the Leningrad front "to relieve their comrades." We can imagine the reaction of American public opinion if a contingent of Russian troops appeared in the Southwest Pacific to help the Japanese. Spain is fighting our Soviet ally—and we are going out of our way to send supplies to it and to curry favor with its fascist government. The Western powers are guilty of a great want of sense, or at the least of a great want of tact. For past experience has shown that Spain acts in friendly fashion to the Western powers only when threatened with loss of supplies and that it takes appeasement as a sign of weakness and an invitation to ask for more favors from the United States and Britain. Can one wonder that the Kremlin is suspicious when Churchill goes to the Spanish embassy for lunch, taking with him the Chief of the Imperial Staff and the permanent head of the Foreign Office?

★

REPORTS OF HEAVY CIVILIAN CASUALTIES IN German-occupied countries, as the result of raids by the American Army Air Force, have led to criticisms in the British press of the policy of high-level daylight bombing. Claiming that the dispersal of bombs from a great height makes accuracy impossible, the weekly Tribune asks: "Are raids against towns inhabited by friendly people really contributing to softening up the Continent for invasion or merely hardening the people against what must seem the ruthless unconcern of an ally for the suffering people who are not the real enemy?" The New Statesman and Nation points out that the R. A. F. has hitherto taken particular care to hit only definite military objectives in occupied countries—mostly by using low-flying tactics—but that now the Axis propagandists are able to publish "uncontradicted stories of useless destruction and ghastly casualties" as the result of American daylight raids on such cities as Rouen and Antwerp.

★

THE FACT THAT THESE STORIES, DISPENSED by Axis forces, have not been contradicted does not mean, however, that they are true. Now that they are experiencing the horrors of aerial bombardment, the Nazis have suddenly become concerned about its inhumanity and are conducting a campaign in neutral countries for an agreement outlawing the bombing of cities. Naturally, they stress casualties among the inhabitants of the conquered countries, as these evoke the most sympathy. But although there is no way of checking the figures they give out, we are not prepared to accept them as accurate or to believe German assertions that the industrial damage in these raids is negligible. That strategic bombing, whether by day or night, whether of occupied countries or of Germany itself (with its millions of imported slaves), does bring death to many innocents is undeniable. But its abandonment would certainly prolong the war and thus make the total sum of suffering still more appalling.

★

DONALD M. NELSON, CHAIRMAN OF WPB, has sought to head off passage of the Maloney bill by appointing Arthur D. Whiteside of Dun and Bradstreet as vice-chairman in charge of civilian requirements. The Maloney bill would set up civilian supply as an independent agency able to press equally with army, navy, and lend-lease for the materials needed for essential civilian use. Joseph L. Weiner, who has been head of the division of civilian supply since Leon Henderson's retirement, believes only an independent agency can deal adequately and efficiently with civilian problems. Weiner's record in civilian supply under Henderson and since commands respect; he has been one of the ablest and most courageous New Dealers in the war-production set-up. He was one of the first to press for conversion of civilian industry to war and one of the first to make the public aware of the importance of adequate civilian supply in the war program. The danger, as indicated in our Washington letter this week, is that the need for adequate civilian supplies will be made the excuse for resuming business as usual and that profits rather than need will determine civilian production. There seems to us much more danger of that under Nelson and Whiteside than under an independent agency headed by a public official instead of a dollar-a-year man.

✱

JESSE JONES, CUSTODIAN OF THE BIGGEST money bag in history, seems possessed of an arrogance that matches his vast financial power. The Byrd committee has discovered that the Federal Loan Administrator, who directs a mushroom growth of government corporations growing out of the RFC, has refused to submit their records to an audit by the General Accounting Office. As extraordinary as Jones's attitude is the meek silence of the otherwise all-powerful accounting office. Lindsay Warren, Comptroller General of the United States, testified that the request for an audit was made of Jones in 1938 and refused. There was a time when the GAO by public statements could overawe the entire New Deal, but Warren has kept silent until now about Jones's affront to the power of his office. Since 1938 the financial resources of the RFC and the other corporations under Jones have grown enormously, and with them has grown the possibility of their abuse or mishandling. We hope the Byrd committee will insist on an audit of these billions—a much more important task than the petty penny-pinching in which it has engaged in the past. Jones has it in his power by financial favors to make the fortunes of his friends and ruin his enemies. He ought not to be allowed to exercise this power free from check. Does he fear an audit?

✱

WUXTREE! WUXTREE! READ ALL ABOUT IT. Big Nazi Plot Uncovered by Dies Committee. In a special report to Congress, delayed for five months to make sure of all the facts, Martin "Scoops" Dies has revealed that even before 1938 Adolf Hitler's sympathizers in this country were bent on spreading Nazism. This bombshell should satisfy carping critics who think the Dies committee has been spending all its time putting the finger on New Dealers, technocrats, and nudists. The report fearlessly indicts members of the German embassy and consular staffs "who were not performing their legitimate functions but instead were engaging in espionage and propaganda activities." And it names names. Did you know that the German Library of Information was pro-Nazi even in 1938? And the German-American Bund? And even George Sylvester Viereck? The diplomatic agents have long since flown the coop and the various bunds have been dissolved, but it's good to know that Martin Dies is wise to their tricks—even if it did take him five years and a quarter of a million dollars in appropriations. Maybe his current effort to have thirty-nine government employees boiled in oil without so much as a hearing is just a blind behind which he gathers evidence that will incontrovertibly link Count von Bernstorff's activities with the late Kaiser.

IF WE WERE DETERMINED TO INCREASE THE fame and sales of a given book we should begin by attacking it, long before it was scheduled to appear, as a book that ought to be suppressed—preferably in the names of you know which of our "great allies." We should keep up the attack to the very day of publication by means of memoranda to the publishers and any book club that planned to distribute it. To each memorandum we should append the mimeographed copy of a letter of resignation-in-protest sent to the book club by one of its tens of thousands of members. Above all we should take care not to read the volume; so that if the book-club management, in an attempt to trap us, sent us a telegram asking whether the removal of a certain (non-existent) chapter would satisfy us, we could prove our innocence by answering that other passages were equally objectionable. By these tactics we might make fools of ourselves—but that is a sacrifice often undergone by publicity experts; and we could be pretty sure that just before the day of publication the New York Times and several other papers with large circulations would print a lengthy account of the attempt to suppress a novel entitled "The Fifth Seal" by Mark Aldanov, an author hitherto practically unheard of.

Planes for the Pacific

ARE the Japanese about to launch an overwhelming offensive in the Southwest Pacific? Is Australia really in deadly peril of invasion? Recent dispatches from "down under" suggest fears in both military and civilian circles that these questions may shortly be answered in the affirmative. There are reports that the Japanese have concentrated 200,000 men and a proportionate number of planes on fortified islands within easy reach of northern Australia, and the presence of large enemy naval forces at Truk, within three days' steaming of New Guinea, has been stressed. Great emphasis has been given to a recent increase in Japanese air activity, manifested by attacks on Allied bases. In all cases these raids have been beaten off decisively, with the enemy losing at least five planes to our one. Yet it is suggested that our loss of superiority in the air may be imminent unless large reinforcements are sent to the Southwest Pacific theater.

Naturally, alarming reports of this nature have been eagerly seized upon by opponents of the Administration. Neglect of the Pacific has long been a favorite theme with the Hearst-McCormick press, and the dispatches from Australia are now being manufactured into ammunition for an almost daily editorial barrage directed at the Commander-in-Chief. The promoters of this campaign are, admittedly, in the very advantageous position of being able to play a two-way bet with a high degree of safety. If more planes are not sent to the Pacific and their dire predictions are justified by events, they can say, "We told you so." If, on the other hand, the Japanese offensive is a flop, they will be able to hail another MacArthur miracle achieved with inadequate means and no thanks to the Administration.

In actual fact, it appears unlikely that the resources being made available to our forces in the western Pacific are inadequate to the tasks which have been assigned to them. Last month high-ranking officers representing both General MacArthur and Admiral Halsey were called to Washington for conferences with the joint general staffs. It is reasonable to assume that the grand strategy settled upon at the Casablanca conference was explained to them and that they were told they must hold the line against the Japanese until victory in Europe released forces for a grand offensive against Tokyo.

Lieutenant General George Kenney, MacArthur's air commander, when he was in Washington did not disguise the fact that he hoped to get a lot more planes, and apparently he returned disappointed. He said recently, "We are forced to shoot down four or five to one to keep the score straight," and added that he would like a five-to-one superiority in planes over the enemy. What commander would not? Unhappily, we are not yet able to supply this degree of air supremacy in any theater of the war.

No doubt MacArthur is dissatisfied with a mere holding role and impatiently awaits the day when he can undertake a full-scale offensive. But that does not excuse an attempt to obtain a revision of Washington decisions by means of pressure tactics. An intolerable situation would arise if subordinate commanders, however distinguished, were encouraged to back their claims by promoting public clamor, and the only surprising thing about the Secretary of War's rebuke, in this instance, was its extreme mildness. Noting the demand for more planes from Australia, Mr. Stimson said: "We have had similar pleas from all parts of the world. It is common for all vigorous and alert commanders to seek more equipment. The combined chiefs of staff are responsible for the control of over-all requirements. They must study the whole global military situation." At the same time he promised that the Australian theater would be sent sufficient planes to replace losses and to counter the increasing strength of the enemy—a promise which, we imagine, is neither more nor less than that given before the present agitation arose.

Behind this extremely unfortunate controversy lies not only the old argument between the Pacific and European schools of strategy but the still older problem of army-navy rivalry. It is an unhappy fact that the division of responsibilities in the western Pacific between Admiral Halsey and General MacArthur represents a difference in strategic conceptions as well as an inconvenient geographical line. And "unity of command" is no sovereign remedy for this situation, since it seems unlikely that MacArthur would consent to serve under the navy or that the navy would be willing to subordinate itself to MacArthur. The tension between the two was illustrated by the general's sharp reaction to Secretary Knox's statement that an attack on Australia would require a "tremendous sea force and there is no indication of a concentration pointing to that." Permitting direct quotation, MacArthur retorted that there were, in fact, powerful Japanese forces within striking distance of Australia which could be held off only by Allied retention of command of the skies. "The Allied naval forces," he went on, "can be counted upon to play their own magnificent part, but the battle of the western Pacific will be won or lost by the proper application of the ground-air team."

General MacArthur has properly not forgotten his promise to liberate the Philippines, and his statement suggests a belief that "island-hopping" is the way to achieve the task. The navy, on the other hand, has discarded the island-hopping theory, and it sees its primary task as the destruction of Japanese sea power, for once this is accomplished, Japan's innumerable scattered island outposts must fall for lack of sustenance. Instead of building up an air-ground team, the navy would allot the major role in victory to an air-sea team. So we have competition for air power between the two services in the Pacific as well as between the Pacific and Atlantic theaters. The final responsibility for deciding between these conflicting claims is that of the Commander-in-Chief. It is a heavy burden, and he may justly ask that its weight be not increased by irresponsible propaganda either in Congress or the press.

The Annual Wage

AS A possible compromise in the increasingly threatening controversy over coal wages, Dr. John R. Steelman, director of the United States Conciliation Service, has proposed that the miners be guaranteed six days' work a week throughout the coming year. This guaranty would give the miners a somewhat higher annual income than they can expect from the requested $2-a-day increase, but since there would be no change in basic wages rates, it would not violate the President's hold-the-line anti-inflation order. Moreover, it would not greatly increase the operators' costs of production, and therefore should not result in a higher price for coal. What would actually happen is that a smaller number of miners—smaller because of the effects of the draft—would be enabled to produce an increased quantity of coal to meet the country's expanded needs; and these miners would be guaranteed a living wage in exchange for work done.

This highly practical solution of the wage dispute was rejected, on its initial presentation by Mr. Steelman, by both the Northern and Southern operators. The rejection, if we are to judge by a highly partisan editorial in the New York Times, was primarily motivated by an unwillingness to give Mr. Lewis anything that he asks for; but there was also fear that if the annual wage were granted as a war-time measure it might create a precedent that would be carried over after the war. The pre-war average number of working days in the soft-coal mines, the Times reminds us, was only 182 days, while the government is proposing a 312-day year. It then asks: "Where would the market be" for the additional coal produced in the 130 days of extra work? That is not, of course, an issue today, and we shall assume that the six-day week will not be retained after the war. But the question is valuable in calling attention to the problem of intermittent employment, which has always been one of the curses of the coal-mining industry. In the past the operators have made little effort to put the industry on a sound basis because the miners have had to bear almost the entire burden of the seasonal irregularities in demand. If the principle of the guaranteed annual wage were accepted as a permanent policy, there is reason to believe that management would find a way to distribute output more evenly throughout the year.

The Times is also disturbed lest organized labor—unhappy over the WLB's refusal to adjust existing "inequalities" in wage rates—launch a general campaign for guaranteed annual wages in other industries as well as coal. It complains that that would constitute an invasion of the President's hold-the-line order. This is sheer economic nonsense. The increased pay that workers get through more regular employment is not and cannot be inflationary because it is balanced by additional production. Since increased production must be our national goal both today and in the post-war period, no development could be more healthy than the growing acceptance of the principle of a guaranteed annual income for wage-workers.

Save the FSA!

THE long-standing fight of the big farmers to put the Farm Security Administration out of existence came within an ace of succeeding last week. On the recommendation of a subcommittee, the House Appropriations Committee cut off all funds for the FSA in the agricultural appropriation bill for 1943-44 and sought to kill the agency by transferring its functions to the Farm Credit Administration. An effort was then made to railroad the bill through the House without debate, but the Rules Committee temporarily blocked this move by refusing to grant a closed rule on the measure. A bitter debate developed on the House floor, in which the farm bloc, long antagonistic to the Farm Security Administration, met with a rebuff in its attempt to kill the agency outright but succeeded in crippling it by cutting off its funds.

Readers of The Nation do not need to be told that the FSA has made an enviable record in its endeavor to rehabilitate the most promising among America's landless farmers, who number more than five million. Although the number of individuals who have been able to acquire land through the FSA program has been necessarily small because of the lack of adequate appropriations, there is much evidence to demonstrate the agency's success in general agricultural rehabilitation.

The farmers who are buying land through the FSA have become more stable citizens; they have taken more interest in community affairs than they formerly did; and their children have been attending school more regularly. But of particular significance at the moment is the fact that they have been producing much more food than previously. In Montana we find that FSA borrowers accounted for 95 per cent of the state's increase in milk production during 1942, and for 20 per cent of its increase in egg production. Beef production for the state as a whole rose 44 per cent; among FSA farmers it rose 70 per cent. In the country as a whole Farm Security borrowers, representing 7.6 per cent of the country's farms, were responsible for more than one-third of the 1942 increase in the output of milk and 10 per cent of the rise in chicken and egg production. Livestock production throughout the United States was 8 per cent higher in 1940 than the 1936-39 average; among FSA borrowers it was 43 per cent higher.

This is an impressive record. It is particularly significant because the FSA farmers are without exception small farmers. For this reason it might seem that their capacity for expanding food production would be more limited than that of the large producers who dominate the Farm Bureau Federation. But experience has shown that the small farmer is more responsive to the financial and managerial assistance provided by the government than any other group.

If Congress is sincere in its alarm over the threatened shortage of farm labor it should take steps to increase the FSA appropriation instead of threatening to eliminate it altogether, for the FSA has shown over a period of years that through small, supervised loans it can increase production substantially without drawing further on man-power supply. It has done this during the years when its objective was not quick production but general agricultural rehabilitation. Today, with a change in emphasis and extended service, the Farm Security Administration offers our greatest opportunity for an increased food output in 1943. Congress must not be allowed to kill it.

Peace—the Culbertson System

BY LOUIS FISCHER

PRECEDED by much high-pressure promotion, Ely Culbertson, bridge expert, has launched a plan for world federation. To me the most interesting thing about the plan is that intelligent persons like Dorothy Thompson, Frederick L. Schuman, and Max Eastman appear to have fallen for it. The Culbertson scheme is, I think, among the least valuable and most deceptive contributions to our fast-growing peace literature. It is unrealistic and reactionary.

As outlined in Culbertson's sixty-four-page "Summary of the World Federation Plan" and in an earlier, slightly dissimilar publication entitled "A System to Win the War and to Win the Peace to Come," the plan is simple. During this war if possible, later if necessary, the eleven regions into which it divides the world are to be organized in a world federation. The scheme can start functioning when any two regions unite. Each regional organization is supposed to serve as "a cohesive force for the membership states composing it." A world police will guard the peace.

The eleven regions are (1) the Japanese, led by Japan and including "sovereign" Korea; (2) the Chinese, consisting of China, to which Culbertson blithely gives Hongkong and Shanghai as "free trade zones," Manchuria, Japanese Formosa, Tibet, and Mohammedan Sinkiang (Turkestan); (3) the Russian, consisting of the Soviet Union, which obtains Estonia, Latvia (but not Lithuania), Bessarabia, "a strategic frontier with Finland," part of the Polish Ukraine ("subject to plebiscite"), and the provinces taken from Russia by Turkey under the terms of the 1918 Brest-Litovsk treaty; (4) the Middle European, including Lithuania, Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Albania, which are all expected to live peacefully together under the leadership of Poland; (5) the North European federation, with Germany as leader, and including Holland, Austria, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Finland, plus the Belgian Congo, Portuguese Angola in West Africa, and the southern Sudan, which are thrown into this German family as special step-children; (6) the Latin European, under French leadership, whose other members are Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium; (7) the British, consisting of the United Kingdom and the British dominions and Eire and enlarged by the annexation of Portuguese Mozambique, French Djibouti, Ethiopia, "and the rest of Italian East Africa"; (8) the Middle Eastern region, in which Turkey will lead Persia, Iraq, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Afghanistan, and Egypt;

(9) the American federation, led by the United States and comprising in addition all the Latin American republics. Non-American countries must give up their American possessions to America. The tenth and eleventh regions are so-called federations which have no independence: India, under British control, and the Malaysian federation, a protectorate of the United States. The Malaysian federation (capital Manila) embraces the Philippines, all the Dutch East Indies, Thailand, the many Pacific islands, and French Indo-China.

What a nice mess all this will make!

SECURITY A LA CULBERTSON

The single feature of the Malaysian federation demonstrates the complete folly, and danger, of the plan. Although Culbertson thinks his scheme "offers an adequate substitute for power politics," what would America's domination of Malaysia represent but the worst kind of power politics plus a new, far-flung American imperialism?

Culbertson likes to throw around words like "sovereign" and "non-imperialistic." They cost nothing; they may delude some innocents abroad; but they also change nothing. When you call imperialism "non-imperialistic" it smells just as bad.

Culbertson convicts himself. "In the Netherlands East Indies," he writes, "the Netherlands shall retain her essential sovereign rights, except the right to maintain military or air-naval bases." Who will maintain those bases? The United States, of course. Why? For these reasons:

It would be suicidal for the United States to allow any other power to obtain military lodgement in any part of these key territories. Already the cost to us of the Marshall and Caroline Islands, so magnanimously handed over to Japan after the First World War, is staggering. If the Netherlands were permitted to keep its own bases in the eastern Pacific, the future security of the Western Hemisphere might be gravely jeopardized. . . . It follows that in restoring their possessions to the Netherlands and to France [Indo-China] after the war, the United States must, for her own and their sake, retain the military [non-imperialistic] control of these territories by means of leased bases. It would be the height of strategic folly for the Netherlands or France to oppose such an eminently just and reasonable solution of the vital problem of the defense of the East Pacific [obviously]. Nor should England, China, or Russia object to the American Strategic Zone, since each has its own Strategic Zone. The establishment of the American Strategic Zone is a matter of vital necessity to the United States, and must be accomplished regardless of whether or not the World Federation is adopted [italics mine].

So there you have Culbertson, the great world reformer. If you imagined that his World Federation introduced some new principle of world security you were wrong. The plan is based on the ancient imperialist and Hitlerian justice of seizing the maximum territory beyond your frontiers as a sort of protective cushion against attack. Security, therefore, will not be found in a new system of world government, or in a new concept of internationalism, or even in a world police force protecting all countries against all aggressors. No, security, à la Culbertson, lies in colonies, in distant bases, in the military and strategic advantage of one nation over the other. To be sure, only the powerful are thus smiled upon by Culbertson. The United States, the mightiest nation of the world, will defend itself by arming territories thousands of miles from its own shores. Then what about Czechoslovakia, or Spain, or Holland, or Italy? Ah, they are too weak to extort these benefits. They will have to look to the World Federation for protection. But America won't be so foolish, or England, or Russia. They get their "strategic zones."

If Culbertson believes in the necessity of protective zones for the major powers his whole world-federation plan is nonsense. You either believe in security through international organization or you don't. Apparently, Ely Culbertson doesn't.

1919 AGAIN

Stripped of its 1943 dress, the Culbertson plan begins to look like the peace of 1919. After the last war the Anglo-French balance of power undertook to preserve the peace. England and France rounded out their empires in Africa by dividing Germany's colonies between them, Britain cushioned its Indian empire with Iraq and Palestine; France got Syria (gentlemen like Culbertson called it a "mandate") and also created a strategic zone in Europe by forging a chain of satellites—Poland, Czechoslovakia, and so forth. It looked wonderful. Germany was in a state of military and economic collapse and under foreign supervision. Who could defy the Anglo-French combination? As a superstructure upon this combination, a world federation was erected—the League of Nations. Not everybody joined? But Culbertson foresees that not everybody may join his federation. He would go ahead nevertheless. The League of Nations was always dominated by France and/or England. Yet the League failed, and the Anglo-French balance of power failed to maintain peace or to protect England and France from aggression; any combination of powers sooner or later is challenged by a rival combination.

It may be objected that the League of Nations failed because America did not participate, whereas we are expected to be a mainstay of the Culbertson federation. America's absence, however, was not the cause of the League's failure. There never was an instance in which France and England, eager to block an aggressor, called on the United States and were refused. On the contrary, in 1932 Secretary of State Stimson urged action in China against Japan; it was Britain that demurred. If England and France had been ready to take adequate measures against Italian aggression in Abyssinia, Washington would have cooperated. The British and French governments lobbied hard to keep us anti-Loyalist toward Spain. If they wanted any help from America in the Czecho-Slovak crisis it was in the direction of appeasing Hitler, not the reverse. No, the League's failure was not due to American abstention. The League failed because it was an instrument of the Anglo-French balance of power. That is what Litvinov was up against, and that is why Russia's adherence in 1934 added little except some good propaganda for peace and some delightful debunking of the appeasers.

The Culbertson federation would be another League of Nations designed to maintain the Anglo-Russian-American balance of power or, if Russia does not join, the Anglo-American balance of power. Vanquished Germany, Japan, and Italy would be compelled to take membership. The lesser powers, Culbertson hopes, would string along. But the post-Versailles balance of power was upset by Germany's economic recuperation, the emergence of the airplane as a decisive military weapon, and the internal decay of France and the British Empire. Who can guarantee that even an Anglo-Russian-American coalition, which today seems as unbeatable as the Anglo-French coalition seemed in 1919, will not be upset by defections and new combinations of power, or by new economic and logistic conditions?

Culbertson's plan creates a paradise for the major powers. With a few exceptions all the territorial changes he advocates are to the benefit of Russia, China, America, and Britain. He trusts that this will induce the giants to join. But how will the rest of the nations feel? Moreover, there is no rhyme or reason in most of his territorial shifts. Culbertson writes not a single word, for instance, in explanation of the transfer of the Congo from Belgium to Germany. Nor does he honor us with the reasons for giving Estonia and Latvia but not Lithuania to Russia.

At this very moment White House and Downing Street brows are knit over the map of Europe, endeavoring to deal with Russia's claims to the Baltic states and eastern Poland. It seems to be a baffling problem. But the statesmen should be told that Culbertson has already solved it. He has assigned two of the three Baltic countries to Moscow and decreed a plebiscite for eastern Poland. But why not give Latvia and Lithuania instead of Latvia and Estonia to Russia? It makes just as much sense. And maybe Russia doesn't want a plebiscite in eastern Poland. Russia insists on its right to eastern Poland now, before a plebiscite can be held. Maybe Poland doesn't want a plebiscite. Maybe everybody knows that plebiscites are usually unfair.

It looks as if Mr. Culbertson had retired into his modernistic study with a pack of cards marked with the names of countries and started playing solitaire. When the "Latvia" card turned up he placed it on top of "Russia," and "Estonia" on top of that, but "Lithuania" went into a separate pile. "Congo" he put on top of "Belgium," but then "Germany," the jack, faced him; so he took the "Congo" queen from the "Belgium" pile and used it to cover "Germany." That is all very nice, but it has nothing to do with the complicated reality of world affairs. Culbertson should quit playing solitaire and go back to bridge.

I should like to linger over many pleasant questions raised by Culbertson's plan. Will the British, for instance, cede Hongkong to China? Will Turkey present Kars, Erzerum, and Ardagan to Russia? Would not England after the war be more prosperous with India free? Would the United States allow a sealed Canadian highway through New York State to New York harbor under Canadian political control, or would only Russia obtain such a right from Persia? But I must rush on, now, to the pièce de résistance on the Culbertson menu, the "quota-force principle" for the organization of a world police.

PEACE THROUGH ARITHMETIC

The Culbertson World Federation, when permanently organized, will have a World President elected for a term of six years (the first President is to be an American, the second a Britisher, but the third is not scheduled to be a Russian), a legislative branch consisting of two houses, a "World Equity Court," and many officials. "The manufacture, transportation, and possession of heavy weapons shall be the monopoly of the World Federation." Heavy weapons are military planes, tanks, heavy guns, and warships. No private person or company and no national government will be permitted to own or make such weapons or to own or operate factories making them. All such factories, everywhere in the world, will be the property of the federation, which will run them. I am sure the Soviet government would not submit to this, and I doubt whether the British or American governments would. It would be interesting to calculate how much control the World Government would exercise over the various national economies if this provision could be implemented.

"ARE YOU QUITE SURE THIS IS THE SOVIET DELEGATE?"

"The World Police Force (army, navy, and air forces) shall be the only force in the world which is armed with heavy weapons." It will consist of eleven national contingents and one international contingent, or "Mobile Corps," all financed by the World Government. The eleven national contingents will be stationed in the eleven leader or "initiating" states of the federation and will consist of citizens of those states. The eleven leader states are the United States, Great Britain, Russia, France, Germany, Poland, Turkey, China, Japan, India, whose contingent will be under British command, and Malaysia, whose force will be under American command. No other states will have armies equipped with heavy weapons. Thus in the Germanic regional federation only Germany will possess a real army and manufacture heavy weapons; in the Latin European region only France, not Italy, Spain, Belgium, or Portugal; and in the Middle European region only Poland, not Lithuania, Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, or Albania. Imagine how the non-leader states will take that!

The international Mobile Corps will be composed of regiments recruited in other than leader states. It "shall be stationed in strategically located islands purchased by the government of the World Federation and in leased bases in the Two-Way States." The two-way states are Switzerland, Luxembourg, Armenia, Austria, Danzig, the Sudetenland, and perhaps others which may belong to two regional federations at one time.

Now each of these twelve armies will have a quota strength which represents its percentage of the total World Police force. The United States gets 20 per cent of the World Police plus 2 per cent in Malaysia; Britain 15 per cent plus 4 per cent in India; Russia 15 per cent; France, Germany, Poland, Turkey, and China 4 per cent each; and Japan 2 per cent. That adds up to 78 per cent. The Mobile Corps has the remaining 22 per cent of the World Police.

The heavy arms for each national contingent would be manufactured in the countries where the contingents are stationed and in amounts proportioned to their size. Thus 22 per cent of the world's heavy arms would be produced in the United States, 19 per cent in Britain, 15 per cent in Russia, 2 per cent in Japan, and so forth, while the 22 per cent for the Mobile Corps would be produced in non-leader countries—like Czecho-Slovakia, Argentina, Persia, and others.

In time of peace each national contingent is subject to the orders of its national government. But if war breaks out, the national contingent "becomes automatically, and without the necessity of approval by the Initiating State, a part of the World Police, under the command of the President of the World Federation, and at the disposal of the World Federation government." The World Government may send the American or Russian or Chinese army wherever it sees fit.

Now where are we? Says Culbertson: Let us suppose that the United States, England, and Germany unite to conquer the world. They defy the World Government. Together, the three of them have 45 per cent of the well-armed forces of the universe. But the World Police has the remaining 55 per cent. Ergo, the American-British-German aggressors will be defeated. Suppose, he continues, a league of Communist states springs up, consisting of Russia, Japan, China, Poland, Germany, and France. Together they have 33 per cent of the world's armies. The federation opposes them with 67 per cent. Suppose Russia alone attacks China. Russia has 15 per cent; China its own 4 per cent, plus the Mobile Corps's 22 per cent, plus the national contingents of America, England, and the others, which will immediately march to China's aid.

On paper this seems perfect. Indeed, Bertrand Russell, the great English mathematician, was called in by Culbertson to check all these calculations, and I understand that he finally gave his verdict that 67 is more than 33, and 55 more than 45. I myself have deliberated long over this question, and I too am compelled to admit that a large number is larger than a small number. That vitally affects the price of cheese, but its direct influence on world peace is not so clear. For mathematics is not the soul of politics.

BUT WHAT ABOUT GEOGRAPHY?

Mr. Culbertson, at home in New York, has forgotten at least one little item, geography. The United States, with 22 per cent of world armaments, attacks Mexico with none. What happens? The Mobile Corps (22 per cent), stationed in Switzerland, Armenia, Austria, and where not, and consisting of assorted Iraqi, Lithuanians, Czechs, Brazilians, Cubans, and Persians, throws itself at America, and very soon the Russian, Chinese, and British contingents, not to speak of the Polish and Turkish and Japanese armies, will speed across the Pacific and the Atlantic to save Mexico. Poor Mexico! Poor Mexico, World Federation or not. Of course! Then what has changed? Or suppose Russia, with 15 per cent, attacks Persia with none. You either have appeasement or a world war.

But it is really unnecessary for me to prove that the quota-force principle will not work, its mathematical perfection notwithstanding. Culbertson proves it. He writes: "The question may be raised, What is to prevent a leading nation from seizing control of its National Contingent to use it for purposes of conquest, or to prevent its constitutional use by the World Federation?" Yes, that is a good question, the key question. How can we be sure that the United States or Russia or Germany will not use the national contingent stationed on its soil, and consisting of its citizens, to attack a foreign nation? And how can we be sure, when the World Government calls, say, the British contingent to fight France, that the British government will let it go? What is Culbertson's answer? It is ludicrous. "It is highly improbable," he wishfully thinks, "that any government could thus seize control of its National Contingent." Why? Because, he says, the officers and men have been recruited to serve the World Government, and for them to refuse to do this or consent to serve their own country in aggression "automatically constitutes an act of rebellion, for which they can be shot in disgrace." That is, if the Soviet contingent takes orders from the Kremlin and invades Finland, it will be in "rebellion," and the Red soldiers will be shot "in disgrace." By whom, pray? Is Culbertson really so naive?

As to a national government engaging in aggression, he proceeds, "Something akin to a revolutionary conspiracy would be required for it deliberately to break the solemn pact of defensive alliance which binds member states together, and thus become an aggressor against the World Federation." In other words, it would be very naughty to become an aggressor, and no nation ought to be so mean and nasty. "Any attempt at conquest," furthermore, "would create a divided public opinion within the country, and a divided National Contingent." Culbertson is suggesting that the American contingent or the German contingent would be so loyal to the World Government that it would refuse to obey its own government. And this bunk has been hailed as "a workable solution"!

Let us turn all this around. If Culbertson is so sure that no nation will engage in aggression, and that all nations will cooperate with the World Federation, why does he need the national contingents? Maybe just a Mobile Corps would suffice. Maybe all you need is general disarmament and a limited police force.

Actually, Culbertson admits by implication that under his plan peace will be at the mercy of the big powers, to whom he panders and who have the arms and the factories. His peace plan depends on the good-will and desires of the great nations. Peace always has. He has devised no way of inducing or compelling the mighty not to use their might.

Culbertson is tinkering with the status quo, trying to juggle it around, to repair it and patch it, and then to build modernistic edifices upon it. To change the metaphor, he is dealing the old cards. He almost makes you think—if you don't watch closely—that the cards are new. But they are old, and the deal is old.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

DAYLIGHT SAVING was established in the United States on March 31 at 2 a. m. . . . Our interference with our clocks leads one to wonder whether we could not go on and fool ourselves a little more. . . . If a false clock can make us rise early, a false calendar may banish spring fever. Kant has said, at some length, that our time is our own.—April 4, 1918.

RATIFICATION of the federal prohibition amendment by Massachusetts makes its adoption morally certain. When Maryland, Delaware, and the Bay State swing into line, and New York holds out only after the utmost efforts of her anti-prohibition leaders, the end is in sight.—April 11, 1918.

WHEN AMERICA entered the war the regular army comprised about 128,000 men, besides which there were some 80,000 of the National Guard in the federal service. Now the federal forces number more than 1,600,000 men. . . . The need for immediate production of cannon or shells has been obviated by the fact that France and Great Britain have agreed to furnish these for all American troops arriving in 1917 and 1918, but plans have been laid for future production at home.—April 11, 1918.

MOB VIOLENCE against persons suspected of disloyalty is increasing.—April 11, 1918.

WAR AND THE DRAMA do not make a happy combination, and the war play has become one of the minor horrors of war. . . . The declining theatrical season is approaching its end amid bursting bombs and perfervid oratory in an orgy of bellicose patriotism as noisy as it is undramatic. . . . More reputable and genuinely American contributions to our war drama earlier in the season were "Efficiency," . . . in which Mr. R. H. Davis and Mr. P. P. Sheehan satirize the spirit of militarism, and "In the Zone," by Eugene O'Neill, with its scene laid in the forecastle of a munitions ship, produced by the Washington Square Players with full justice to its realism and dramatic quality.—April 11, 1918.

OCCASIONALLY of late has come news of a weak college suddenly closing its doors in bankruptcy. . . . A large endowment fund is a rock of refuge for some which have lost one-third of their young men; others are seeing as never before the attractiveness of the coeducational principle.—April 18, 1918.

GENERAL FOCH has been given the title of Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Armies operating in France, by the French and British governments, and thus another step has been taken in realizing complete unity of command on the western front.—April 18, 1918.

A NEW WORD much affected is "camouflage," generally mispronounced and misunderstood.—April 25, 1918.

IT IS OFTEN impossible to tell from the shape of a woman's hat whether she is coming or going.—April 25, 1918.

Relaxing Too Soon

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 18

A CURIOUS atmosphere is visible in the world of business. Though we are as yet only ankle-deep in the war, the impression is growing that the job of war production has passed its peak, and that we can now begin to think of a return to greater civilian production. The service-equipment division of the War Production Board has prepared a plan for resuming the manufacture of office machinery. The WPB has issued an order easing its prohibition against the use of steel for non-essential purposes. Manufacturers may use stocks of partially or wholly fabricated steel parts in the production of a wide variety of gadgets ranging from electric hair-curlers to shoe buckles. Trade papers began to talk last fall of the possibility of obtaining materials for renewed civilian output, and the same sort of speculation has now reached the daily press. The financial section of today's New York Times, for example, carries no fewer than three articles on the prospect of greater civilian output.

William J. Enright, who covers business circles for the Times, says "war agencies intend to start the reconversion of industry to the production of essential civilian goods by the end of the summer." Kenneth L. Austin, who reports on finance and heavy industry, declares New York and Washington are hearing "forecasts that the supply of steel for military, naval, and shipbuilding needs soon will appear to have been more than amply covered, and . . . metal will be available for non-essential civilian needs within the next six months or less." C. F. Hughes, who writes the enlightened and well-informed Merchant's Point of View for the Times, reflects widespread opinion at the capital when he says, "In guns, bombs and shells, motor vehicles and tanks we have already produced more than enough for any reasonable requirements of [our] armed forces or those of our allies."

This feeling that the job of war production is in its declining phase has found expression in the ranks of both capital and labor. Walter D. Fuller, president of the Curtis Publishing Company and chairman of the executive committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, said here last week that the country was suffering from overproduction of certain types of war materials. Fuller declared that we had built up a sufficient backlog of weapons to justify more emphasis on civilian needs. Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., told the Institute of Women's Professional Relations that the United States is confronted with mass unemployment because we have produced more war materials "than the United Nations can use or the United States can transport." He was unwise enough to speak of difficulties created by "a mad desire to expedite war materials."

There are many parts of the earth in which talk of this kind must make painful and puzzling reading. Our men in the Southwest Pacific are not suffering from an excess of supplies. Australia is worried about a possible Japanese offensive. Last year's widely ballyhooed offensive in Burma has subsided, for lack of matériel, into the faintest kind of a nudge. The Chinese, who have done more with less than any of the United Nations, must think us mad. Our French allies in North Africa, from latest reports, are still using outmoded equipment. The Soviet Union, still the only nation fighting Hitler on a major scale, continues to look for a second front, a military enterprise that will require huge amounts of matériel if it is to be successful. Granted that we may be producing more than we need on the present scale of our operations, granted even that in some items we have produced enough for any scale of warfare, is it possible that in the over-all picture we have reached a stage where we can relax and turn back to more normal production?

There is evidence that even on the present scale we are still far from the point where we can begin again to make gadgets. Expansion of steel-making facilities is behind schedule and is being curtailed on the general view that we now have enough steel not only for war but for more civilian output. Yet WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson said last week that ordinary carbon steel had now become our most serious bottleneck. Production for the third quarter of this year, according to Nelson, will be only about 14,450,000 tons. The demands of our various military and lend-lease agencies and essential civilian supply for that quarter total 20,830,000 tons. There is a deficit of more than 5,000,000 tons, or 25 per cent.

The full significance of those figures becomes more apparent if we recognize that the President's Victory program of January, 1942, has been quietly revised downward not once but several times. "The earlier question of whether we would need eighty billions in war output this year," C. F. Hughes writes, "is on the way to being answered with a flat 'No.' " The phrase "on the way" is an understatement. Except in shipbuilding, even in aircraft, we not only are failing to meet those goals but have reduced them. In this connection I should like to call attention to an authoritative article on the Army Supply Program by Major General Lucius D. Clay in the February issue of Fortune. Major General Clay is assistant chief of staff for matériel in the General Staff Corps. His article is extraordinarily revealing. It shows how long the War Department waited before drawing up plans for an all-out effort and how soon it relinquished them.

"Immediately after Pearl Harbor," General Clay writes, "the Supply Division of the General Staff recognized the necessity for the revision of the Army Supply Program for all-out war. By early February it had completed the first Army Supply Program for this purpose." The Pearl Harbor mentality seems to have dominated the General Staff as well as the commanding officers in Hawaii. General Clay says this first program "was based on the mobilization rate and the composition of troops deemed desirable at that early stage of war, and it included large quantities of matériel that our allies had ordered or requested the year before." This first program called for $62 billion in supplies "through the calendar year 1943" or $31 billion a year in 1942 and 1943. This was reduced, according to General Clay, to $45 billion in April, 1942. Later it was reduced again, to $38 billion. In November, 1942, it was further reduced—to $31 billion. "For 1943," General Clay reports, "our problems in materials and facilities appear to be solved —to the extent that objectives have finally been brought within the limit of available supplies and facilities" (my italics). The production problem was solved by reducing the production program! It is measured by these reduced goals that we now have "overproduction of war material." It is on the basis of these reduced goals that plans for expanding production in steel and other basic materials are being curtailed and the resumption of non-essential production is planned. The monopolies which fought expansion have succeeded in cutting the war effort down to size, and "business as usual" is again raising its head. This is a dangerous tendency, which may yet prove costly in terms of lives.

India's Fighting Men

BY COLIN S. MACLAREN

THE presence of a division of Indian troops in the British Eighth Army and the commendable part it has played in the campaign highlight once more the much-discussed question of India's war effort. The Indian army of today, a component part of the strength of the United Nations, consists of nearly 2,000,000 volunteers. Some say this is a poor figure for a subcontinent of 390,000,000 inhabitants, but if they looked beneath the surface they might wonder that the number was actually so large.

Raising and maintaining an army in India is a radically different problem from what it is in the West. Often the first task is to teach the men a new tongue. There are some twenty-four distinct languages in India, perhaps ten more than are found among the major United Nations. The recruit, when he comes "out of the jungle," usually from some agricultural village, rarely speaks more than his local bat, or patois. Before "eating the oath," as the Urdu has it, he must have picked up some Hindustani, India's lingua franca, and to become a candidate for promotion he needs a knowledge of English. This was not the case in the past, but the lack of native words for mechanical processes is making English more necessary. Even the sepoy, the ordinary private, must at least know "Roman Urdu," Hindustani written in English characters, to be of much use in a specialized corps. Without a common language

Indian troops would have no means of intercommunication, and it would be very hard to bind them together into a homogeneous group. As it is, a knowledge of Hindustani is far from universal. Gurkhas are clannish and stick to their Gurkhal; Pathans speak Pushtu, and learn Hindustani with reluctance; Madras troops may speak Tamil, Telugu, or some other language—they are, however, more proficient than the average Indian in English.

Another preliminary job is teaching recruits how to dress as soldiers. They have to give up their loin-cloth or loose pajamas and get used to regular trousers, tightly wound puttees, boots, and pagris compactly bound in regimental style. The khaki pagri must be wound on the head while it is wet, so that it forms a solid headgear that will not disintegrate easily. It takes the place of the piece of cloth loosely wound about the straggly locks of the "jungle-wallah" recruit. Today, as in the last war, Indian soldiers also wear steel helmets, although the Sikhs sometimes request a dispensation from them because their hair is tied on top of the head in a bun.

Most of this early training is attended to by Indian officers holding the "Viceroy's commission," which is traditional in the service. These officers, all of them veterans, are generally the platoon commanders. They form the recruits into small squads and start them on their drill and manual of arms. Six months later the erstwhile rookies would hardly be recognized by their own families. Some may be expert riflemen or machine-gunners, others embryo signalers; all are able to make intelligent responses to words of command in English. Once trained, the Indian is one of the best soldiers in the world, cheerful, industrious, reliable, and fatalistic.

Several practical difficulties stand in the way of a larger Indian army. There is the difficulty of getting the equipment for it—much stressed by the government of India. There are also the barriers of caste: religion and tradition in India have usually required that soldiers should be drawn only from the second highest major caste. Whether this tradition could now be radically changed and the army enlarged by the unrestricted inclusion of non-martial castes is a very complicated question.

The records indicate that in the past two years the number of men offering to enlist has been steadily ahead of the number that could be accepted. In 1939 India had an army of 177,000 men, organized for internal security and to defend the frontiers. By March, 1941, half a million more men had been raised. The monthly recruiting rate was then 30,000. In July, 1941, it was 50,000. In May, 1942, 70,000 recruits were enrolled out of a total of 100,000 who offered themselves. In July 75,000 were taken. In spite of the caste difficulties, recruiting has been extended to many classes and many districts not previously represented; more than 50 per cent of the May, 1942, recruits were, in fact, of this new blood. Enlistments in Madras, which has always supplied much of the engineering rank and file, the sappers and miners, have gone ahead at an unusually fast rate, and the training schools for junior officers and N. C. O.'s there have been particularly successful.

In the last war the officer personnel for the Indian army was almost entirely British and was trained chiefly at two temporary war colleges, one at Quetta in the Northwest, the other at Wellington in Madras. A batch of 100 cadets was turned out every six months. The Indian Military Academy today trains British and Indians together and turns out more than 300 officers a month. The officer corps has been Indianized to such an extent that the proportion is roughly seventy British to thirty Indian, or sixty to forty if the Viceroy's commissions are included. And the percentage of Indians is increasing rapidly. The Viceroy's commissions, which in almost all cases have been won on merit by promotion through the ranks, are lower than the second-lieutenant King's commission. But today a large number of Indians are in the higher ranks—lieutenant, captain, major, lieutenant colonel.

I asked a senior Indian officer recently whether Englishmen ever objected to taking commands from him. He replied that only once had such a thing occurred, and the offender was so severely rebuked, not only by the commandant, but by every British officer in the place, that he deeply regretted his action and made most profuse apologies.

This Indianization of the officer corps has led some observers of the political scene in India to the conclusion that the army will become a political force after the war, though it has never been one in the past. A "soldiers' lobby" may develop, unified despite racial differences and possibly 2,000,000 strong, including air-raid wardens and other defense workers. Such a group might be numerically able to dominate any other party. But to the Indian mind any politico-military combination is strange. Even stranger is the recent report that the Japanese have formed an army of Indian ex-prisoners. To think that the Japanese, with their methods and their lack of linguistic and traditional background, could lead Indian troops for long is fantastic to anyone who has ever served with Indians.

In the Indian Air Corps, ten squadrons strong, the personnel, except for a few technical instructors, is entirely Indian. Their main activity so far has been bombing on the Burma front, but fighter squadrons are being formed. The air cadets are now trained in India.

Although the army as a whole has sometimes been carelessly described as consisting of "a few Mohammedans from the Punjab," the proportion of Hindus and Mohammedans is now reported to be almost equal; in fact, the Hindus may be slightly in the majority. The Dogras, high-caste Hindus from the north, have long made the best soldiers in the service, but little has been heard of them outside of India. A national magazine in this country not long ago labeled a photograph of them "Sikhs," although they had shaved their beards, a thing no true Sikh in the Indian service has ever done.

Mechanization, not at all general before the war, has been going on apace. The modern equivalent of the famous Bengal Lancers is a motor corps. Lieutenant Colonel S. R. K. Rajendrasinhji of the Second Royal Lancers, formerly the Bengal Lancers, an officer who won the D. S. O. in Libya, told me when I met him recently in Washington that the troopers of the Indian cavalry had adapted themselves to mechanization with keen zest, realizing that the world required it today. Paratroops also have been trained for the new army.

When one considers that tradition in India has required the soldier to be illiterate, and that even in modern times the Indian sepoy has not concealed his contempt for the babu, the native who can read and write, one looks with wonder at all these developments. If I remember rightly, one of the Mogul emperors refused, as a soldier, to learn to read and write. I know that I spent many long hours on pay days during and after the last war in obtaining the "signatures" of the sepoys by means of the thumb impression.

Another serious problem for the Indian army is that of rations. The American religious minorities, the Catholics and the Jews, have forgone strict observance of their religious dietary laws in order better to serve their country. While every possible provision has been made for them, the heads of their churches have said that in extreme national emergency the dietary laws can be waived. But this cannot be done in India. Religion is too powerful a force, and religious freedom, which the British have always maintained, too deep-rooted. Not only is the cow sacred to the Hindu, and pork unclean to the Mohammedan, but bully beef and Maconochie stew, being in tins, are unacceptable to the Indian soldier, who as a rule requires his meat fresh. Mutton and goatflesh are about the only kinds of meat practicable for rations, but luckily the Indian is not a big meat-eater. His absolute essential is atta, Indian flour, from which he makes the flat cakes of unleavened bread that are his staple diet. A problem in transport, however, is posed by his bulky cooking pots, which he must carry everywhere with him. Other things he can hardly be without are ghee, or clarified butter, sugar, lentils, and garlic. He drinks tea.

It is useless to deny that the strict observance, under all circumstances, of Indian dietary laws puts a big burden on the quartermaster. But Hindu soldiers have been known to starve to death rather than eat beef, and cartridges greased with pork and beef fat were the spark that touched off the Indian Mutiny.

One Indian custom which has always impressed me is that of darbar. Darbar, in English "meeting," is held every week in an Indian regiment, and during it any man may personally make of his commanding officer any request within reason and get a hearing.

Aside from the question of caste, a potent factor against general mobilization of the people for war is their widespread pacifism. According to the "Encyclopedia Britannica," "in the immense population of India the number of men of martial proclivities, or even personal courage, is a very small proportion of the whole." The author of this statement was probably thinking of the banyas, the tradespeople of the bazaars, who any Indian of a martial caste will tell you would not fight for anything. But there are also the Jains, whose faith enjoins them from taking life in any form, and who are reputed to carry it to such extremes that they will remove vermin rather than exterminate them, and turn aside from important business if they meet a party of ants crossing their path. Such doctrines are not strictly adhered to by groups that are numerically large in proportion to the whole population, but their general philosophy has exerted some influence over very large numbers.

Sepoys who serve side by side often have similar backgrounds, but a battalion is generally made up of at least four distinct tribes from different sections of the country; Sikhs, Dogras, Punjabi Mohammedans, Pathans, in companies, make a typical battalion. While critics have charged that this system was developed to keep the Indians divided among themselves, in practice it promotes healthy rivalry and is instrumental in making different groups forget their mutual hatreds. Hindu and Mohammedan sepoys, after fighting side by side, respect each other and will cheerfully take orders from each other, a thing they would have believed impossible before entering the service. Is it too much to suggest that this system holds the germ of far wider usefulness?

In the Wind

THE FREE WORLD ASSOCIATION recently planned a public debate on the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution that the United States should cooperate with other nations to enforce peace after the war, but had to call it off because it could not find two isolationists willing to submit their views to debate. Senators Hatch and Ball were to speak for the resolution; Senator Nye, after a great deal of persuasion, consented to speak against it, but no teammate for him could be found. The association then asked him to debate with Senator Ball alone, but he declined. Among those who refused, for one reason or another, were Hamilton Fish, Bennett Clark, Tom Connally, Robert M. La Follette, Burton K. Wheeler, Arthur H. Vandenberg, Robert A. Taft, Kenneth S. Wherry, and Hugh A. Butler.

A NEW YORK RESTAURANT is decorated with a series of mural panels showing dramatic plane flights from 1903 to 1943. The Lindbergh transatlantic flight is missing.

ATLANTA HAS SEVERAL all-white movie theaters, several white theaters that admit Negroes in the gallery, and several all-Negro theaters. The all-Negro film, "Cabin in the Sky," was shown in two lily-white theaters and then left town. Atlanta Negroes may be allowed to see it on a return trip.

FOR THOSE who have been uncertain as to the aims of the United Nations, an anonymous bulletin now being circulated should clarify them. The United Nations, it says, represent the tyranny of "Jewish fascism." . . . Vice-President Wallace's popularity during his recent trip through Mexico led the Sinarchists to claim him as one of their own. His plea for Christian democracy was construed as indorsement of their "New Christian Order."

FEWEST EUROPA: The guard at Quisling's home has recently been increased to forty-two men. . . . With orders on hand for 30,000 pairs of shoes to be made of wood and paper, a Norwegian factory had to delay production when the Nazis discovered that the paper for the uppers was red, white, and blue. . . . Smoking at street-car stops in Belgium is now verboden. Too many German soldiers, innocently waiting for street cars, have had holes burned in their uniforms.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $3 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

More than Expediency

NEXT week we shall publish the first of a series of articles analyzing the situation which will present itself to the Allied armies when, after finishing the Tunisian campaign, they invade Hitler's European fortress. It is a very tempting subject and an important one for those who wish to follow the development of events during the coming months. But it carries with it this question: if the great venture of attacking Hitler through his occupied territories is not a purely military operation but also an operation of political warfare, what policy will the United Nations pursue in regard to Europe? When American and British armies land in Sicily, in France, or at some point on the Aegean Sea, will they serve as genuine armies of liberation or will they promote a Europe that is democratic in appearance but profoundly reactionary in essence?

To answer that question, we lack certain important elements of information. Nobody knows exactly what was agreed upon by the President of the United States and Prime Minister Churchill in their tête-à-tête discussions. It is possible that they were so absorbed in the problem of winning the war that they discussed only those immediate and acute issues which threatened the unity of the greater Allied powers. It is possible, on the other hand, that they formulated a program more comprehensive than anyone suspects, one containing general directives for the Allied authorities who will be set up on the European continent.

That aspect of the delicate question confronting us is still a secret, and to speculate about it is a mere waste of time. The only legitimate basis for judging what kind of policy is likely to be followed when the invasion of Europe takes place is found in the policies which have so far been upheld and the situations which have been allowed to develop.

For a time it might well have been thought that the only Allied policy in regard to Europe was the absence of any policy at all. The dearth of initiative, the poverty of imagination, the lack of aggressiveness in the field of political war, the childish and unbelievable rivalries among official agencies seemed to indicate that the tremendous task of recovering from the military unpreparedness of the last ten years had left no time for consideration of the political character of the present war.

Such an interpretation would have been fallacious. A real democratic conception of the war was always missing and is missing today. But the people who apparently decide the major diplomacy of the United Nations have had —and still have—a very clear and concrete political line. Their aims are simple and transparent indeed. From the old Metternich game they inherited only the reactionary point of view—nothing of its shrewdness or subtlety.

Their policy consists in preventing the peoples of Europe, in the name of maintaining order and preserving Christian civilization, from having the last word. It consists in interpreting Article III of the Atlantic Charter, not according to President Roosevelt's reading, but according to the reactionary inclinations of the men who enjoyed the collaboration of Vichy, who preferred Pétain to De Gaulle, who preferred Darlan to De Gaulle, who prefer Giraud to De Gaulle; and who, should Giraud disappear, would support any Peyrouton or Noguès rather than a man who really wants a democratic France.

The key to the whole future situation is to be found in Algiers and in Casablanca. The most important aspect of the disgraceful incident of North Africa is that it was not an accident but the expression and the result of a consistent policy. The facts are there in plain view. The situation in North Africa furnishes the pattern that will be followed in Europe tomorrow.

Repeatedly, an effort has been made to quiet the public uneasiness and indignation in the United Nations by the statement that the policy in North Africa "is temporary in nature and not prejudicial of the future." That declaration in itself contained the principle of retreat. No one who felt very sure about a policy would be inclined to make such a statement. It carried the implication that what has been done in North Africa had nothing to do with the Four Freedoms or the war for democracy. But besides that, it could not maintain itself against the facts. The truth is that the same principle which inspired the deal in North Africa inspired American policy with regard to St. Pierre and Miquelon, Martinique, the Austrian Battalion and the "mistake" about Otto of Hapsburg, relations with Franco, and the conversations in Italy with Marshal Badoglio and similar discredited politicians. We still await a single instance of serious consideration being given to the underground movement, to labor, or to proved anti-fascist groups—the real forces making for a democratic Europe.

No, this policy is more than expediency. It is a true reactionary conspiracy to prevent the possibility of a Europe governed by the people and to establish in Europe puppet governments chosen as security against too sharp a turn to the left. Expediency is the name. Reaction is the substance.

A. DEL V.

Dr. Goebbels Loses Sweden

BY KURT BERNHEIM

HISTORICALLY, Sweden has always been within Germany's cultural sphere of influence, and until recent years German was the second language of most educated Swedes. That was but natural. The two countries are near neighbors, have long-standing commercial ties, and are closely linked religiously through the Lutheran church. It might be thought, then, that Sweden would offer particularly fertile soil for Nazi cultural propaganda and that during the war, when the country's physical connections with the West have become so tenuous, Goebbels could reap a bumper harvest. The facts, however, indicate that the Swedes have turned the coldest of cold shoulders to every invitation to join the "Nordic circle" and have found a way, in the field of the arts, to give an overwhelming vote of confidence to democracy.

Of fifty-nine moving-picture theaters in Stockholm, twenty-one, during the past few weeks, have been announcing Swedish full-length pictures and thirty-eight, Anglo-American films. In addition to drama by Scandinavian authors, the legitimate theaters have been showing plays by Karel Capek and several Broadway hits, including Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down." Of the ten best-selling novels, five are by Swedish writers and five by foreigners—Pearl Buck, A. J. Cronin, C. S. Forester, Daphne du Maurier, and Marguerite Steen; the non-fiction foreign best-sellers are Howard Smith's "Last Train from Berlin," Gontran de Poncin's "Kabloonka," Fritz Thyssen's "I Paid Hitler," Anna Rauschning's "No Retreat," and Prince Starhemberg's "Between Hitler and Mussolini."

In this galaxy of authors the Nazis are conspicuously absent. But it is not because the Swedish producers, publishers, and film distributors receive nothing from Germany; on the contrary, Nazi works pour into their offices. The German Ministry of Propaganda has spared neither effort nor money to crowd out the cultural influence of the Western democracies. A veritable horde of cultural emissaries—officials, writers, movie stars, university professors—has descended upon Sweden. Swedish writers are showered with invitations to the fashionable "Writers' Homes" that have been established in Germany to promote "friendly relations," and representatives of Swedish culture are urged to be guests of honor at conventions of the arts in Germany. Despite the military successes of the Axis, however, the tone of Swedish books and newspapers has been hostile, and occasionally the Nazis have changed from honeyed words to threats.

Nothing has been gained by either method. During the past ten years the only authors living in Germany who have been translated into Swedish are the non-political veteran Hans Carossa, the religious mystic Ina Seidel, the relatively harmless Hans Fallada, and the romanticist Ernst Wiechert, who has been threatened several times with the concentration camp for his heresies. Among works published by reputable Swedish firms the ratio of Nazi German to Anglo-American authors has remained at about one to twenty. Anglo-American supremacy on the film front is even more overwhelming. If the Nazi film producers finally succeed in getting one of their boring products shown in a Swedish theater, it is always quickly withdrawn—the public simply refuses to patronize it. The Nazi propaganda films of the campaigns in Poland and France and the "Ufa" newsreels—with new comments supplied by the Swedish board of censors—satisfy a certain curiosity in the Swedish public, but there can be no question of the audiences' reaction. Their icy silence is broken only by their laughter at the goose-stepping troops, Hitler's hysterical grimaces, or Il Duce's grotesque posturing. On the other hand, British and American films are shown for long periods at first-run theaters; the reserved Swedes have for weeks been breaking into stormy applause at "Mrs. Miniver." Of the younger German playwrights only Bertolt Brecht and Friedrich Wolf—both political refugees—have been represented on the Swedish stage since 1933. This actual boycott of Nazi movies, plays, and literature is not instigated by any "conspiracy," as Nazi observers so frequently complain in their press. When it does not arise from the people's political sympathies, it is the result of the poor quality of Nazi works of art.

More serious than this polite rejection, which can, after all, be excused on the ground that there is no accounting for taste, is the unmistakably anti-Nazi attitude of the Swedish intellectual world. The atrocities committed by the Nazis in occupied Europe, especially in neighboring Norway, are publicly condemned from all Swedish pulpits, and congregations are exhorted to pray for "our tortured brethren of Israel's tribe." "Our people are ready to die for the defense of our democratic institutions," Osten Undén, chancellor of the Swedish universities, said in a radio interview obviously intended for Sweden's powerful neighbor. And there is hardly a prominent Swedish writer or journalist who has not earned a place on the Nazi black list, either through his publications or by signing some anti-Nazi resolution like that directed against Knut Hamsun's political outpourings.

The Triangle

Two appointments made by Hitler last week were given the customary publicity. Dr. Hans H. Dieckhoff, former German ambassador at Washington, was named the new ambassador to Madrid; Baron Ernst von Weizsäcker, until now Under Secretary in the Berlin Foreign Office and Ribbentrop's right-hand man, was sent to the Vatican. Both are extremely familiar with affairs in the United States, and both move as freely in Catholic circles as genuine Nazis can. Another appointment—completing the triangle—has not been officially announced. It is that of General Count Francisco Gomez de Jordana as Hitler's ambassador at large. In spite of the apparent reserve, all news reports at hand agree that the impressive voice and the majestic tone with which General Jordana broadcast from Barcelona Berlin's offer of a negotiated peace must have met with the Führer's most gracious approval.

Even Selma Lagerlöf, the Nobel prize-winner, was honored shortly before her death by the suppression of her works in Germany. Only a handful of stuffy academicians under the spiritual leadership of Sven Hedin still give allegiance to Nazi German culture.

Because of Swedish stubbornness—one example is the insistence that the English language be placed first on the teaching schedule of all Swedish high schools—the Nazi exporters of culture have to depend on their own efforts to influence the Swedish mind. Obscure new German publishing firms offer propaganda pamphlets and periodicals from Adolf Hitler's Public Enlightenment Bureau in Swedish translation. A Swedish edition of Goebbels's pictorial weekly Signal and a new daily called Dagsposten, which is full of advertisements of Nazi firms and is printed on the presses of the Paris Humanité, try desperately to make converts. The elections of last fall, in which the Swedish Nazis lost their nine seats in city and provincial councils, showed that the tiny catch formerly netted is dwindling rapidly. Even Thorsten Kreuger, owner of the lone pro-German evening paper Aftonbladet, who was formerly a director of the famous match syndicate of his brother Ivar Kreuger and was sentenced to jail for fraudulent transactions, is now doing his best to find a safe niche for himself. It is likely that he has been influenced by the boycott of Aftonbladet that was launched by the Swedish trade unions with their 1,023,000 members and supported by all the parties represented in the Swedish Parliament.

Today as before the war the book trade in Sweden offers a comprehensive list of new publications of contemporary world literature. Unhindered by advance censorship or ministerial decrees, the publishers determine their production according to their own judgment and conscience. One can count on the fingers of one hand the books which the Swedish government has confiscated by virtue of its unpopular emergency powers. The more frequent government action against papers that have "offended" Berlin can be explained by the fact that the law very clearly leaves the initiative to the foreign power that feels itself aggrieved.

The year 1918, which brought victory to the labor movement, established democratic ideals in Sweden. In that year, too, appeared the first signs that the country was turning its back on the hitherto dominating German influence. The mass expulsion of outstanding intellectuals from Germany after 1933 gave further impetus to Sweden's cultural orientation westward. The present war has made it final. Sweden has taken stock of Nazism and found it wanting.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

A NEW word has appeared in the official German dictionary—Wohnraumlentkung—and even for ears accustomed to Nazi gibberish it has a painful sound. It may be translated roughly as regulation of living quarters. The simple fact behind it is that the air bombardments are destroying more and more houses in more and more towns, and that living quarters have to be provided for the inhabitants. In city after city living space is now being rationed. The number of square yards—it varies in different places—to which each person is entitled is determined, and anything above this is requisitioned. The rooms must then be vacated so that strangers can be moved in.

Apparently Wohnraumlentkung began in Düsseldorf and was quickly taken up by other cities. It is interesting to note that compulsory measures became necessary as voluntary action to meet the situation declined. Until this spring a kind of solidarity prevailed among the people of a bombed town. There were always some who without compulsion would offer a roof to their homeless fellow-citizens. In Hamburg, for example, "regulation of living quarters" was introduced only at the beginning of last April; it had not been necessary before though the town had suffered almost a hundred attacks. Apparently the people's attitude has changed. In fact, the inhabitants of the Rhenish town of Bielefeld were told very plainly by the newspaper Rote Erde on March 29 that the rationing system had to be set up because "so few persons showed themselves ready to share the common burden. They failed to exhibit the spirit of comradeship which is indispensable in a total war."

Little by little, as they are reflected in the press, we are learning of other results of the bombardments. Really serious damage, especially to industry, is of course kept a close secret. But we hear, for example, of the glass problem. Inadequate as such a statement may seem, the effects of the bombardments for millions of persons are summed up in broken windows. The general hunt for window glass—and for glaziers—seems to play a not unimportant role in daily life. In heavily bombed Essen another phenomenon is to be noted. The Essener Nationalzeitung of March 23 informs us that "luggage shops are doing a big business because many persons who have been bombed out of their homes need trunks and bags to pack their belongings in." Naturally such a demand cannot be met, and "day after day customers stand in line for hours in front of these stores and then cannot be served." "Very unpleasant scenes," according to the newspaper account, are continually taking place in these queues, but what sort of scenes is not stated.

Is it because of the bombardments that precisely in Essen and the Ruhr "rumors" seem to flourish most luxuriantly? In any case the Essener Nationalzeitung combats rumors more vehemently and more tirelessly than any other German paper and refers to them more specifically. Its scoldings reached a high point in an article printed on April 7. The rumor is circulating in the Ruhr, the paper said—its proprietor is Hermann Göring—"that the Waffen-S.S. has moved into Essen to keep down the workers" and "that a state of siege is to be proclaimed." Of all the rumors of which the German press has taken notice, that went the farthest—so far as this observer can discover. And though there was apparently no truth in it, a tale of such dimensions reveals to some extent the conditions from which it sprang.

It was preceded by a succession of other local rumors. On April 2 the Nationalzeitung declared: "In the past weeks we have repeatedly heard rumors that a special allotment of real coffee destined for Düsseldorf was sent to Berlin." Here it should be remarked that the expression "sent to Berlin" is obviously a circumlocution. In reality the rumor must have said that the precious "real coffee" had fallen into the hands of Göring or some other high-placed gentleman. Nothing else would explain the heated rebuke that followed: "Since there are some simpletons who believe such rumors, they cannot be ignored. On the contrary, those who spread them must be energetically opposed." The newspaper then found a new way of discrediting such tales. "If rumors are traced to their source, it is always discovered that they were invented by men and women who carry less of the burden of the war than most of us, but who by their complaints wish to give the impression that they also have their troubles. That is one of their crude tricks."

"Do Not Lose Patience" was the title of the leading article of the Völkischer Beobachter of April 2. The virtue of the Germans, the article said, is patience; the vice of the Jews is haste. "Patience is our weapon; it will smash Jewish haste and hurry."

A sign of the times is the sharply increasing number of small law suits in Germany. The cause is clearly the growing general nervousness and irritability. But the Angriff, which considered the subject on April 2, found the reason, first, in a lack of the spirit of comradeship and, second, in too much leisure. "There should really be an investigation," said Goebbels's sheet, "to see whether some people have not too much time on their hands, those, for instance who bring a suit for trifling reasons, such as a dispute between tenant and landlord or a fancied libel." The newspaper recommended a simple solution: "Every court should on principle take the position that people who have collected petty evidence against others must wait till the end of the war to be heard. And since they have apparently too much free time, they should be sent to factories, where their services can be used effectively."

Hostages

NEWS from France indicates that Himmler has changed his methods. Until a few months ago the policy of the Gestapo in occupied countries was to shoot anybody who could be considered a menace to Hitler's World Order. Now every such person is arrested, and if he is just a common man he is sent to work on the defenses of Fortress Europe. If he is a man of some standing, he is imprisoned in Germany. A list of women condemned by the Nazi tribunals in France and deported to Germany has been received here. On it are the names of Mai Politzer, wife of Professor Politzer, who was shot by the occupation authorities; Danielle Casanova, former secretary of the Union of Young Women of France; Henriette Mauvais, wife of the recently arrested Communist leader; and Hélène Langevin-Salomon, daughter of the great doctor Paul Langevin (Nobel prize-winner) and wife of the young mathematician Jacques Salomon, who was delivered by the Vichy government to the Nazis and executed by them.

In the light of these facts, the deportation to Königsberg of Léon Blum, Edouard Daladier, and Paul Reynaud appears to be more than a casual act. One is inclined to think that these political deportations are the Nazi reply to the Allied announcement that Nazis guilty of war crimes will be punished. Himmler is building up a mass of hostages as part of the terrorist plan to be carried out when the moment arrives for the Reich to "slam the door so hard that the universe will shake and mankind will stand back in stupefaction."

Last week there were rumors of the deportation to Germany of Francisco Largo Caballero, the former Spanish Prime Minister and labor leader. There seems to be no doubt that he has been arrested again by the Vichy authorities. But the question is whether he is being held for delivery to Franco or whether he is part of the hostage group that the chief of the Gestapo is collecting.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE LIMITATIONS OF DICKENS

BY HENRY JAMES

[This review first appeared in The Nation of December 21, 1865. It is reprinted in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Henry James.]

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND* is, to our perception, the poorest of Mr. Dickens's works. And it is poor with the poverty not of momentary embarrassment but of permanent exhaustion. It is wanting in inspiration. For the last ten years it has seemed to us that Mr. Dickens has been unmistakably forcing himself. "Bleak House" was forced; "Little Dorrit" was labored; the present work is dug out as with a spade and pickaxe. Of course—to anticipate the usual argument—who but Dickens could have written it? Who, indeed? Who else would have established a lady in business in a novel on the admirably solid basis of her always putting on gloves and tying a handkerchief round her head in moments of grief, and of her habitually addressing her family with "Peace! hold!" It is needless to say that Mrs. Reginald Wilfer is first and last the occasion of considerable true humor. When, after conducting her daughter to Mrs. Boffin's carriage, in sight of all the envious neighbors, she is described as enjoying her triumph during the next quarter of an hour by airing herself on the doorstep "in a kind of splendidly serene trance," we laugh with as uncritical a laugh as could be desired of us. We pay the same tribute to her assertions, as she narrates the glories of the society she enjoyed at her father's table, that she has known as many as three copperplate engravers exchanging the most exquisite sallies and retorts there at one time. But when to these we have added a dozen more happy examples of the humor which was exhaled from every line of Mr. Dickens's earlier writings, we shall have closed the list of the merits of the work before us. To say that the conduct of the story, with all its complications, betrays a long-practiced hand, is to pay no compliment worthy the author. If this were, indeed, a compliment, we should be inclined to carry it further, and congratulate him on his success in what we should call the manufacture of fiction; for in so doing we should express a feeling that has attended us throughout the book. Seldom, we reflected, had we read a book so intensely written, so little seen, known, or felt.

In all Mr. Dickens's works the fantastic has been his great resource; and while his fancy was lively and vigorous it accomplished great things. But the fantastic, when the fancy is dead, is a very poor business. The movement of Mr. Dickens's fancy in Mrs. Wilfer and Mr. Boffin and Lady Tippins, and the Lammles and Miss Wren, and even in Eugene Wrayburn, is, to our mind, a movement lifeless, forced, mechanical. It is the letter of his old humor without the spirit. It is hardly too much to say that every character here put before us is a mere bundle of eccentricities, animated by no principle of nature whatever. In former days there reigned in Mr. Dickens's extravagances a comparative consistency; they were exaggerated statements of types that really existed. We had, perhaps, never known a Newman Noggs, nor a Pecksniff, nor a Micawber; but we had known persons of whom these figures were but the strictly logical consummation. But among the grotesque creatures who occupy the pages before us, there is not one whom we can refer to as an existing type. In all Mr. Dickens's satires, indeed, the reader has been called upon, and has willingly consented, to accept a certain number of figures or creatures of pure fancy, for this was the author's poetry. He was, moreover, always repaid for his concession by a peculiar beauty or power in these exceptional characters. But he is now expected to make the same concession with a very inadequate reward. What do we get in return for accepting Miss Jenny Wren as a possible person? This young lady is the type of a certain class of characters of which Mr. Dickens has made a specialty, and with which he has been accustomed to draw alternate smiles and tears, according as he pressed one spring or another. But this is very cheap merriment and very cheap pathos. Miss Jenny Wren is a poor little dwarf, afflicted, as she constantly reiterates, with a "bad back," and "queer legs," who makes doll's dresses, and is for ever pricking at those with whom she converses, in the air, with her needle, and assuring them that she knows their "tricks and their manners." Like all Mr. Dickens's pathetic characters, she is a little monster; she is deformed, unhealthy, unnatural; she belongs to the troop of hunchbacks, imbeciles, and precocious children who have carried on the sentimental business in all Mr. Dickens's novels: the little Nells, the Smikes, the Paul Dombeyes.

Mr. Dickens goes as far out of the way for his wicked people as he does for his good ones. Rogue Riderhood, indeed, in the present story, is villainous with a sufficiently natural villainy; he belongs to that quarter of society in which the author is most at his ease. But was there ever such wickedness as that of the Lammles and Mr. Fledgeby? Not that people have not been as mischievous as they; but was anyone ever mischievous in that singular fashion? Did a couple of elegant swindlers ever take such particular pains to be aggressively inhuman?—for we can find no other word for the gratuitous distortions to which they are subjected. The word "humanity" strikes us as strangely discordant, in the midst of these pages; for, let us boldly declare it, there is no humanity here. Humanity is nearer home than the Boffins, and the Lammles, and the Wilfers, and the Veneerings. It is in what men have in common with each other, and not in what they have in distinction. The people just named have nothing in common with mankind at large. What a world were this world if the world of "Our Mutual Friend" were an honest reflection of it! But a community of eccentrics is impossible. Rules alone are consistent with each other; exceptions are inconsistent. Society is maintained by natural sense and natural feeling. We cannot conceive a society in which these principles are not in some manner represented. Where in these pages are the depositaries of that intelligence without which the movement of life would cease? Who represents nature? Accepting half of Mr. Dickens's persons as intentionally grotesque, where are those exemplars of sound humanity who should afford us the proper measure of their companions' variations? We ought not, in justice to the author, to seek them among his weaker—that is, his mere conventional—characters: in John Harmon, Lizzie Hexam, or Mortimer Lightwood; but we assuredly cannot find them among his stronger—that is, his artificial—creations.

*"Our Mutual Friend." By Charles Dickens. New York: Harper Brothers. 1865.

Suppose we take Eugene Wrayburn and Bradley Headstone. They occupy a halfway position between the habitual probable of nature and the habitual impossible of Mr. Dickens. A large portion of the story rests upon the enmity borne by Headstone to Wrayburn, both being in love with the same woman. Wrayburn is a gentleman, and Headstone is one of the people. Wrayburn is well-bred, careless, elegant, skeptical, and idle; Headstone is a high-tempered, hard-working, ambitious young schoolmaster. There lay in the opposition of these two characters a very good story. But the prime requisite was that they should be characters: Mr. Dickens, according to his usual plan, has made them simply figures, and between them the story that was to be, the story that should have been, has evaporated. Wrayburn lounges about with his hands in his pockets, smoking a cigar and talking nonsense. Headstone strides about, clenching his fists and biting his lips and grasping his stick. There is one scene in which Wrayburn chaffs the schoolmaster with easy insolence, while the latter writhes impotently under his well-bred sarcasm. This scene is very clever, but it is very insufficient. If the majority of readers were not so very timid in the use of words we should call it vulgar. By this we do not mean to indicate the conventional impropriety of two gentlemen exchanging lively personalities; we mean to emphasize the essentially small character of these personalities. In other words, the moment, dramatically, is great, while the author's conception is weak. The friction of two men, of two characters, of two passions, produces stronger sparks than Wrayburn's boyish repartees and Headstone's melodramatic commonplaces.

Such scenes as this are useful in fixing the limits of Mr. Dickens's insight. Insight is, perhaps, too strong a word; for we are convinced that it is one of the chief conditions of his genius not to see beneath the surface of things. If we might hazard a definition of his literary character, we should, accordingly, call him the greatest of superficial novelists. We are aware that this definition confines him to an inferior rank in the department of letters which he adorns; but we accept this consequence of our proposition. It were, in our opinion, an offense against humanity to place Mr. Dickens among the greatest novelists. For, to repeat what we have already intimated, he has created nothing but figure. He has added nothing to our understanding of human character. He is master of but two alternatives: he reconciles us to what is commonplace, and he reconciles us to what is odd. The value of the former service is questionable; and the manner in which Mr. Dickens performs it sometimes conveys a certain impression of charlatanism. The value of the latter service is incontestable, and here Mr. Dickens is an honest, an admirable artist. But what is the condition of the truly great novelist? For him there are no alternatives, for him there are no oddities, for him there is nothing outside of humanity. He cannot shirk it; it imposes itself upon him. For him alone, therefore, there is a true and a false; for him alone it is possible to be right, because it is possible to be wrong. Mr. Dickens is a great observer and a great humorist, but he is nothing of a philosopher. Some people may hereupon say, so much the better; we say, so much the worse. For a novelist very soon has need of a little philosophy. In treating of Micawber, and Boffin, and Pickwick, et hoc genus omne, he can, indeed, dispense with it, for this—we say it with all deference—is not serious writing. But when he comes to tell the story of a passion, a story like that of Headstone and Wrayburn, he becomes a moralist as well as an artist. He must know man as well as men, and to know man is to be a philosopher. The writer who knows men alone, if he have Mr. Dickens's humor and fancy, will give us figures and pictures for which we cannot be too grateful, for he will enlarge our knowledge of the world. But when he introduces men and women whose interest is preconceived to lie not in the poverty, the weakness, the drollery of their natures, but in their complete and unconscious subjection to ordinary and healthy human emotions, all his humor, all his fancy, will avail him nothing if, out of the fulness of his sympathy, he is unable to prosecute those generalizations in which alone consists the real greatness of a work of art. This may sound like very subtle talk about a very simple matter; it is rather very simple talk about a very subtle matter. A story based upon these elementary passions in which alone we seek the true and final manifestation of character must be told in a spirit of intellectual superiority to those passions. That is, the author must understand what he is talking about. The perusal of a story so told is one of the most elevating experiences within the reach of the human mind. The perusal of a story which is not so told is infinitely depressing and unprofitable.

"Henry James Place"

I WONDER whether, among the homages paid to William James and Henry James on the centenaries of their births, New York City itself is going to do anything to honor two of its greatest sons. William was born in the old Astor House on January 11, 1842; Henry at 2 Washington Place on April 15, 1843. I know of no mark or sign, anywhere in the city, to commemorate these events. The lack is particularly lamentable in the case of Henry, who left some of the most memorable images of New York in our literature. The old city of the 1840's and '50's was a memory so vivid throughout his life that he summoned it up for exquisite commemoration, after seventy years, in the books of his old age, "A Small Boy and Others" and "Notes of a Son and Brother." It served him from his beginnings in fiction: his first fine

War is People

BY LORNA LINDSLEY

"Here are the people who help to fight this war, whom Mrs. Lindsley saw fighting it in Spain, in Palestine, in France . . . The incidents of the book are dramatic because of their human equation; it is a liberal book, a sophisticated book, a beautifully written book. Mark it must."—Boston Globe

$2.75

White Man's Folly

BY VANYA OAKES

From the vantage point of ten years in China's underground she watched the white man's mistakes in Asia. Here she tells us the harm that was done and how we may still right it. "As powerful as it is fascinating."—Philadelphia Inquirer

$3.00

Mein Kampf

BY ADOLF HITLER

The deformed mind of the man who has upset the world is revealed in these pages. Here are the insane prejudices, the fantastic dreams of world empire, the compulsion to slaughter and the presentiment of ultimate defeat that make up the personality of the man who is responsible for global war.

$1.89

Just published

A Time to Act

BY
ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

"Poet and patriot, MacLeish has become the spokesman for countless Americans who love their country, but have no gift of words to say so . . . When he speaks on public affairs — on the responsibility of the American press, on the American bureaucracy or on the defeatists among us — every American who hears him or who reads the address later feels that he has heard the thoughts of his own best moments spoken out as he could never do it for himself."—Dorothy Canfield, Book-of-the-Month Club News

$2.50

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY • PUBLISHERS

HARVARD BOOKS

WILLIAM LAWRENCE:

Later Years of a Happy Life

By HENRY KNOX SHERRILL

His successor and intimate friend completes the story which Bishop Lawrence carried to the eve of his retirement in Memories of a Happy Life. $2.00

The Building of Eternal Rome

By EDWARD KENNARD RAND

"The mellow wisdom of the book abounds in stimulating observations and keen criticisms."—Kansas City Star. $3.50

Charles Carroll of Carrollton

By ELLEN HART SMITH

"The best biography of the year, in its interpretation of a complex personality . . . and in the charming, zestful and informal style."—Boston Herald. $3.75

Thucydides

By JOHN H. FINLEY, Jr.

"Should prove just as attractive to those who know Thucydides well as to those who seek an introduction."—Providence Journal. $3.50

The Origin of the Grail Legend

By ARTHUR C. L. BROWN

Propounds the thesis that the Grail was not Christian in origin but was a heathen talisman in an Irish fairy palace. $5.00

Formalization of Logic

By RUDOLF CARNAP

A distinguished philosopher raises the question whether symbolic logic has actually reached full formalization. STUDIES IN SEMANTICS, 2. $3.00

Persian Miniatures in the Fogg Museum

By ERIC SCHROEDER

An illuminating account of Persian book painting from the fourteenth to the end of the seventeenth century. 34 illustrations. $5.00

Can Our Cities Survive?

By J. L. SERT

"An ideal book for the reader who wishes to understand the problems of the modern city."—LEWIS MUMFORD, in New Republic. 300 illustrations. Modern format. $5.00

Space, Time and Architecture

By SIGFRIED GIEDION

"A brilliant study of the trends and developments of the modern scene with its historical background and true significance."—N. Y. Times Book Review. FOURTH PRINTING. $5.00

Management and the Worker

By F. J. ROETHLISBERGER and W. J. DICKSON

"The most outstanding study of industrial relations that has been published anywhere, any time."—Personnel Journal. SIXTH PRINTING. $4.50

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge

Massachusetts

novel, "Washington Square," centers in the childhood world that stretched between the Square and Fourteenth Street:

. . . the Square, containing a considerable quantity of inexpensive vegetation, inclosed by a wooden paling, which increased its rural and accessible appearance; and round the corner was the more august precinct of the Fifth Avenue, taking its origin at this point with a spacious and confident air which already marked it for high destinies. I know not whether it is owing to the tenderness of early associations, but this portion of New York appears to many persons the most delectable. . . . It was here, as you might have been informed on good authority, that you had come into a world which appeared to offer a variety of sources of interest; it was here that your grandmother lived, in venerable solitude, and dispensed a hospitality which commended itself alike to the infant imagination and the infant palate; it was here that you took your first walks abroad, following the nursery-maid with unequal step and sniffing up the strange odor of the alanthus trees which at that time formed the principal umbrage of the Square, and diffused an aroma that you were not yet critical enough to dislike as it deserved; it was here, finally, that your first school, kept by a broad-bosomed, broad-based old lady with a ferule, who was always having tea in a blue cup, with a saucer that didn't match, enlarged the circle both of your observations and your sensations.

Later "those spacious, sociable Arcadian days that we flattered ourselves we filled with the modern fever" were succeeded by the "loud longitudinal New York" of the following decades—the city of "the long, the perpendicular rattle, as of buckets, forever thirsty, in the bottomless well of fortune"; of "the fantastic skeleton of the Elevated Railway, overhanging the transverse longitudinal street, which it darkened and smothered with the immeasurable spinal column and myriad clutching paws of an antediluvian monster"; of the tall meridians of its avenues and the numbered latitudes of its streets—"Good heavens!" exclaims a later character, "what a nomenclature! The city of New York is like a tall sum in addition, and the streets are like columns of figures. What a place for me to live, who hate arithmetic!"

Which brings us to the point. New York's street arithmetic, however convenient, allows few of the charms we encounter in the other great towns of the world—the pleasure of being reminded of the great who once were born and lived in them. George Washington is honored plentifully; so plentifully indeed—by square, arch, street, place, mews, bridge, heights, and not only in New York City but all over the rest of America as well—that he can easily spare one of his shrines. My suggestion is that Washington Place be renamed Henry James Place. (Or, if the family is to be honored, let it be James Place. But Henry James Place is on all counts more appropriate.) Thus a great family and a great man would be restored to the daily memory of their fellow-townsmen. Number 2 should be equipped with a marker to remind the hauntings of the Square of an ancestor of theirs for whom the place was a shrine—"the good easy Square, known in childhood, and as if the light were yellower there from that small accident, bristled with reminders as vague as they were sweet." Washington Place is a short street; few people would be inconvenienced by a change of name; they would acquire a more distinctive address. Perhaps when another hundred years have elapsed, this vestige of a respectful generation of 1943 will stir the Americans and New Yorkers of 2043 to admit that the day is ripe for another and even better memorial—a complete cheap edition of the fiction of Henry James, accessible to everybody who wants to read it; this to be followed in 2143 by a complete reprinting of his non-fiction, which by that time should be sufficiently distant and classic to warrant the outlay of cash and care now so munificently lavished on the secret coffers and waste-baskets of James Boswell, the wash-lists of Mrs. Thrale, and the understandably "lost" plays of Broadway.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Notes by the Way

HENRY JAMES was born a hundred years ago this month. His first published writings appeared in 1864 and 1865, and some of them were written for the new weekly magazine The Nation, which was launched in the latter year by E. L. Godkin. Though James was only twenty-two when he first contributed reviews to The Nation's literary section, his essays on then-current books were brilliant; today they still shine brightly. In honor of James's hundredth anniversary, his criticism of "Our Mutual Friend" by Charles Dickens, first published in these pages in 1865, is presented as the leading review in this Spring Book Issue of 1943.

I HOPE that Mayor LaGuardia and other New York City Fathers will look with favor on Mr. Zabel's suggestion that Washington Place be renamed Henry James Place in honor of a great American writer who has too often been dismissed as an "expatriate" because he settled in another country and actually became a British subject. Such superficial patriots will never read James in any case, I suppose; and without reading him they will hardly discover that his perennial subject was the American character, or that, as Constance Rourke points out in "American Humor," "the international scene became a great American scene" in the decades when James was coming into maturity as a writer. "There is, irony in the circumstance," she says at another point, "that the American character should first have been fully realized [by James] within the European scene." There has been another irony, long drawn out, in the persistent refusal of Americans to recognize James's achievement.

SUCH RECOGNITION as he has had in his native country has been, so to speak, the refraction of his reputation in Europe. He has been most appreciated by those Americans preoccupied with Europe. His work has given rise to dozens of excellent but often rather forbidding essays—which have thrown up still another barrier between the intelligent, non-academic American reader and our finest novelist. His admirers have thus unwittingly cooperated with his detractors to make James appear not only as remote and alien but as a "writer's writer" too difficult for ordinary mortals to understand. Some of his later books are difficult—I admit not having read the very last ones. And in an age when "digests" pass for books, when reading time is measured with stop-watches, when the act of reading is regarded as a species of "freewheeling" in which the mind is disengaged, even "The

A New Novel by

MICHAEL BLANKFORT

A TIME TO LIVE

"A rich, emotional experience. Against the background of world events, the novel traces the agonized uncertainties and evasions of a well-meaning intellectual . . . depicted with acid clarity and understanding. The book is a passionate affirmation of the intellectual's social responsibility."—John Howard Lawson

"A sincere history of the intellectual crisis of many young Americans of the 1930's."—N. Y. World-Telegram $2.50

HENRY MORTON ROBINSON

FANTASTIC INTERIM

A spirited, slashing history of America from Versailles to Vichy.

"A terribly strong indictment of the attitude and outlook of the American people in the period between the two World Wars."—James T. Shotwell

"The style is brilliant; it is strong, it is American."—André Maurois $3.50

GEORGE WELLER

SINGAPORE IS SILENT

"Weller is a correspondent of great personal courage. His indifference to danger is equal to his skill in writing and reporting. That makes this an exciting book of tremendous value to a thorough understanding of the fighting in Malaya."—Cecil Brown, N. Y. Times Book Review $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
333 MADISON AVENUE NEW YORK

NOTE: Below We List the Balance of Books to Be Closed Out—These Titles Are Printed Here for the First Time

ONE-SHOT-WHILE-THEY-LAST SALE OF GOOD BOOKS!

We are clearing our shelves of hundreds of books which won't be reprinted. This is necessary in order to make room for hundreds of new books now being planned. This means a wonderful chance to pick up numerous bargains AS LONG AS THE BOOKS LAST, WHICH CAN'T BE LONG. We feel positive it won't be necessary to reprint this advertisement. It's certain that it will clean out every title we want to dispose of. For that reason please act promptly. You can get a wonderful library of fine books at extremely low cost if you go through the list below now, check off the ones you want, and rush us your order.

As an added inducement we are figuring everything on a DELIVERED PRICE. Just send ■ the amount stated below and you'll get your parcel of books CARRIAGE CHARGES PREPAID. This sale positively closes when present stock is sold out. This is a new low in prices for these books. We promise to ship books the same day we receive your order. Remember, these are NOT Little Blue Books. They are our larger volumes, measuring $5\frac{1}{2} \times 8\frac{1}{2}$ inches in size, which is slightly larger than the average library volume. Minimum order is \$1 worth. Take your choice of these book bargains before it's too late! This is a RED-HOT SALE, which means you have the chance of a lifetime to get the best kind of reading matter at almost give-away prices. As stated before, these bargains cannot be repeated. It's a case of now or never.

Take your pick of the books listed below. They cost only 15¢ each, carriage prepaid. Many of them sold for as much as a dollar per copy; none sold for less than 50¢. But you can order all you want for only 15¢ each.

15¢ EACH

THE MEANING OF ALL COMMON GIVEN NAMES—By Miriam Allen deFord.

THE RATCLIFFE MURDERS—By Thomas De Quincey.

ICONOCLASTIC REACTIONS — By E. Haldeman-Julius.

SOCIALISM-COMMUNISM DEBATE—Norman Thomas and Earl Browder.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH OUR SCHOOLS? —Edited by E. Haldeman-Julius.

HOW TO PUBLISH YOUR OWN MAGAZINE—Every phase explained, for professionals and amateurs.

A REPORT OF THE REV. J. FRANK NORRIS TRIAL—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

THE MAID OF ORLEANS—Friedrich von Schiller.

FAUST—Vol. 1—By Goethe.

FAUST—Vol. 2—By Goethe.

NATHAN THE WISE—By Gotthold Ephraim Lessing.

APPEAL TO REASON, NO. 1—By Joseph McCabe.

APPEAL TO REASON, NO. 2—By Joseph McCabe.

APPEAL TO REASON, NO. 3—By Joseph McCabe.

APPEAL TO REASON, NO. 5—By Joseph McCabe.

APPEAL TO REASON, NO. 6—By Joseph McCabe.

TALKS WITH JOSEPH McCABE—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

GRIMMS' FAIRY TALES—By Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm.

HOW ROCKEFELLER BUILT THE STANDARD OIL CO.—By Morton Grad.

THE SIGN OF THE FOUR—By Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.

THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S HEART—By Guy De Maupassant.

FRAMEUP OF MOONEY AND BILLINGS —By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

DUST—Mr. and Mrs. E. Haldeman-Julius.

SHOULD CHURCH PROPERTY BE TAX EXEMPT?—By Harry Hibbschmann.

THE KING AND MRS. SIMPSON—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

FUNDAMENTALS OF A DANCE EDUCATION—By Ted Shawn.

LINDBERGH-HAUPTMANN KIDNAPING CASE—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

SOCIAL SCIENCE THE HOPE OF DEMOCRACY—By Harry Elmer Barnes.

A SANE FOREIGN POLICY FOR THE U. S. —By Harry Elmer Barnes.

THE CASE FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—This problem is important to every American.

THE ORIGINS OF MODERN CIVILIZATION—By Harry Elmer Barnes.

RHYTHM METHOD OF BIRTH CONTROL—By Joseph McCabe.

HOW TO KEEP YOUNG—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius.

THE STORY OF MY HEART—By Richard Jeffries.

POPE'S ENCYCLICAL ON BIRTH CONTROL—Pope Pius.

BACKSLIDERS TO GOD—By Isaac Goldberg.

SCENTIMENTAL WIND-BREAKING—By Benjamin Franklin.

ON HOW TO CHOOSE A MISTRESS—By Benjamin Franklin.

SEX PROBLEMS IN MODERN SOCIETY —By Dr. R. S. Yarros.

ASSASSINATIONS OF U. S. PRESIDENTS —By M. Haldeman-Julius.

AMERICAN BANDITS—By Anthony Gish.

(continued on opposite page)

Miscellaneous Bargains . . . All prices include carriage charges

PHOENIX—How to Rebuild the World. By H. G. Wells—30c.

HOW TO BECOME A PHILOSOPHER, A LOGICIAN AND A MATHEMATICIAN—By Bertrand Russell—30c.

THE NEW RIGHTS OF MAN—By H. G. Wells—14c.

DIVIDE AND CONQUER—14c.

AUTOMOBILE USERS' GUIDE—14c.

"ASLEEP!"—Full text of official Roberts report on Pearl Harbor—14c.

NIETZSCHE'S ARISTOCRATIC RADICALISM—By G. Brandes—23c.

GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR—By Robert Blatchford—23c.

GETTING THE MOST OUT OF LIFE—By Joseph McCabe—23c.

HOW TO VALUE OLD COINS—This book will help people who want to know what coins are worth—14c.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE LABOR PRESS—This book gives the general rules of press writing—14c.

A COMEDY OF MANNERS—By Benjamin Disraeli—14c.

DESCARTES' DISCOURSE ON METHOD—Introduction by Joseph McCabe—14c.

MICHAELANGELO—TITAN OF ART—By Emil Ludwig—23c.

REMBRANDT—HIS AMAZING LIFE AND WORK—Biography by Emil Ludwig—23c.

PEACE OR WAR FOR THE U. S. A.—Debate. Upton Sinclair vs. Phil LaFollette—14c.

A DEFENSE OF PHILOSOPHICAL SKEPTICISM—By Sir Leslie Stephen—14c.

A STORY OF PRIMITIVE LOVE—By Robert W. Chambers—14c.

INFERIORITY COMPLEX ELIMINATED—By Joseph McCabe—23c.

INTERNATIONAL FREETHOUGHT ANNUAL—By a group of Rationalists—23c.

GREAT AND MIND-LIBERATING THOUGHTS—Compiled by John Mason—14c.

DIARY OF A NIGHT CLUB HOSTESS—By Irene Dale—23c.

WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT AMERICA'S ECONOMIC TROUBLES?—By Upton Sinclair—14c.

EXPECT NO PEACE!—By Upton Sinclair—14c.

"YOUR MILLION DOLLARS"—By Upton Sinclair—14c.

HOW FREETHINKERS MADE NOTABLE CONTRIBUTIONS TO CIVILIZATION—By Jos. McCabe—23c.

WHAT WE LAUGH AT—AND WHY—By Isaac Goldberg—23c.

RACKETS THAT GET YOUR MONEY—By George M. Husser—23c.

FAMOUS SCANDALS IN AMERICAN HISTORY—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—23c.

SHACKLES OF THE SUPERNATURAL—By Wm. J. Fielding—23c.

CONFESSIONS OF AN EX-ALTAR BOY—An informative and entertaining book—14c.

POPULAR HISTORY OF THE U. S.—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—23c.

FAMOUS UNSOLVED MURDER MYSTERIES—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—23c.

GREAT COURT TRIALS OF HISTORY—By M. Haldeman-Julius—14c.

RELIGIOUS BELIEFS OF OUR PRESIDENTS—By Franklin Steiner—41c.

APHRODISIACS AND ANTI-APHRODISIACS—By A. F. Niemoeller—14c.

WILD WOMEN OF HISTORY—By Henry Thomas—23c.

HISTORY OF THE WORLD SINCE 1918—By Joseph McCabe—23c.

FUTILITY OF BASIC RELIGIOUS IDEAS—By Joseph McCabe—23c.

JUMBO JOKE BOOK—A large collection of jokes—23c.

THE PRICE WE PAY—By Dr. A. Strachstein—23c.

HOW TO IMPROVE YOUR ENGLISH IN SPEECH AND WRITING—By Rex Eastman—23c.

MODERN SEX BOOK—Contains seven sections by various authors—23c.

THE HOW-TO MAGAZINE—By H. G. Wells, Bertrand Russell, Prof. Burma, and others, 20 volumes—$1.

JANE ADDAMS AS I KNEW HER—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—14c.

FAMOUS GUESTS AT A KANSAS FARM—By M. Haldeman-Julius—14c.

THREE GENERATIONS OF CHANGING MORALS—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—14c.

PROTOCOLS OF THE ELDERS OF ZION—By Isaac Goldberg—14c.

THE HARDING SCANDALS—All the hidden facts—14c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE—By Edward Carpenter—14c.

FACTS ABOUT VENEREAL DISEASE—T. Swann Harding—14c.

THE CHURCH THAT WAS FOUNDED ON LIES AND FORGERIES—By Joseph Wheless—14c.

GIBBON ON CHRISTIANITY—By Edward Gibbon—14c.

McCABE'S ANCIENT GREAT MEN SERIES—In three attractive volumes—41c.

IN PRAISE OF FOLLY—By Erasmus—14c.

THREE BIG BARNES BOOKS IN ONE—By Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes—23c.

MISTAKES OF MOSES—By Robert G. Ingersoll—23c.

GREAT GENIUSES OF THE MIDDLE AGES—By Joseph McCabe. In 3 volumes—41c.

MEN WHO MADE THE MODERN WORLD—By Joseph McCabe—$1.55.

WHAT CAN A FREE MAN BELIEVE?—By E. Haldeman-Julius—41c.

IS RELIGION NECESSARY? — Debate. Clarence Darrow vs. Rev. Robert MacGowen—14c.

GREAT IDEAS MADE SIMPLE—By Joseph McCabe—14c.

FACTS ABOUT THE U. S. GOVERNMENT—Tells about every department and function of our government—14c.

THE LIBERTY ENCYCLOPEDIA—In six large volumes—$1.15.

WEAVERS OF WORDS—By Henry Thomas, Ph.D.—65c.

THE OUTLINE OF BUNK—By E. Haldeman-Julius—$1.80.

RISE AND FALL OF THE GOD IDEA—By Joseph McCabe—85c.

FROM MONKEY TO MAN—By Maynard Shipley—$1.15.

STORY OF THE HUMAN RACE—By Henry Thomas, Ph.D. In five volumes—75c.

THE HISTORY OF SEXUAL MORALS—By Joseph McCabe—$1.80.

THE KEY TO LOVE AND SEX—By Joseph McCabe—$1.

WHAT I HAVE LEARNED ABOUT ANIMALS—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—23c.

STORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH—By Joseph McCabe. In six double volumes—$1.40.

SPURTS FROM AN INTERRUPTED PEN—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius—23c.

Send Your Order Today to: HALDEMAN-JULIUS PUBLICATIONS, Dept. B-3, GIRARD, KANSAS

4th Large Printing!

WE CANNOT ESCAPE HISTORY

By John T. Whitaker

"On of the best books by a foreign correspondent that I have ever read."—John Gunther.

"Vivid, dramatic, rich in detail and incident, it covers a wide range and variety of material. The men who played leading parts come alive in the pages."—N. Y. Herald Tribune $2.75

American Reasons

By Bonaro W. Overstreet

Every once in a while there come to light a group of poems that reach deep into the heart, verse that voices the feelings of inarticulate millions. Six typical Americans telling their reasons why give here the essence of the American concept of life—and a challenge to the future. $1.00

ITALY FROM WITHIN

By Richard G. Massock

"A comprehensive, thoughtful and vivid account of the Fascist regime in Italy . . . a graphic portrayal of the steadily increasing disappointment, disillusionment, hardship and misery of the Italian people . . . by the former chief of the Rome Bureau of the Associated Press, who personally witnessed much of this history."—New York Times $3.00

VICHY: TWO YEARS OF DECEPTION

By Léon Marchal

"The most penetrating analysis yet presented of the complex factors in the tragedy of France from the Spring of 1940 through 1942. . . . Americans who want an authoritative close-up of France's collapse, both as to personalities and events, can't afford to miss this book."—Philadelphia Inquirer $2.50

At All Bookstores

The Macmillan Company, New York

Ambassadors" and "The Golden Bowl," casually undertaken, may seem slow; approached by way of the luminous, less dense, and charming earlier books—"Washington Square," "The American," "The Portrait of a Lady"—they appear as the flowering, inevitably more and more complex, of a great talent; the journey through James takes on an exhilarating suspense; and once experienced, his books set up a taste that the "easy" contemporary novel cannot satisfy.

FULL CIRCLE: A front-page headline in the New York Times of April 11 read as follows: "U. S. Now Planning to Educate Europe."

On page 15 the Times printed further outraged comments on how little Americans know of their own history.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Lower Depths

MEN FROM NOWHERE. By Jean Malaquais. L. B. Fischer. $2.50.

DARK WEDDING. By Ramón J. Sender. Translated from the Spanish by Eleanor Clark. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

JEAN MALAQUAIS'S "Men from Nowhere" first appeared under the formidable sponsorship of André Gide. In France, where it was awarded a prize called the Renaudot Prize, it is said to have been "enormously successful." And certainly it is a work of considerable talent. Yet when we have reckoned with the portentous but not very complex irony of its tone and with certain scenes of quasi-significant madness, this story of the foreign and stateless men who work an exhausted mine on the Riviera turns out to be merely another piece of information about the Lower Depths.

And I find it increasingly hard to understand what books of this sort are supposed to do. Their presence in our literature is of course one of our most important cultural characteristics—for about two centuries the angle of literary vision has moved slowly downward, the old upward gaze to the eminent tragic hero dropping to the eye-level view of the bourgeois hero, then farther downward to take in people of lower social position but equal human quality (the working people of the Victorian novels), then downward still farther to focus on people, like most of those in "Men from Nowhere," whose emotional and intellectual organization is so much less complex than the reader's as to make them seem almost a different species. We commonly regard the writing and reading of books like "Men from Nowhere" with considerable moral complacency; they indicate the social goodwill of author and reader. But more and more I read them with a kind of bewildered frustration.

My confusion is literary, not political. I am sure that the great fact for the modern consciousness is the insupportable and inhuman existence of the larger part of humanity. Sometimes this fact seems challenging, sometimes desperately depressing, but I never find it confusing in the way that I find literature's response to it confusing.

For example, almost every novel that tells me about poverty and degradation asks me to pity the people it describes. But

April 24, 1943

I am enough of a Spinozist and Freudian to believe that pity is an emotion much to be suspected. Then some books—for example, "The Grapes of Wrath"—complicate the matter by telling me that the people I am to pity are, exactly because of their pitiable condition, a great deal more decent than I am. Then I find it disconcerting to have novels imply that I live on the heights of moral freedom from which I am to look down toward people who are wholly in the toils of necessity; these novels endow me with god-like emotions but not with god-like powers. Again, it is worth considering whether stories of social horror do not inure us to social horror, making us glib about it and acceptant of it—if we suffer enough in a literary way, perhaps we have done all that can be expected of us! Literature, no matter what we say about its "social function," must in some way give us pleasure, and it is to be considered whether social literature as we know it has not been an elaborate hoax of ourselves; perhaps it gives us not the moral stimulus we think we are getting but a kind of circuitous, cheap, and illegitimate satisfaction. "Facing the facts" may be the newest and subtlest way of "escaping reality." Perhaps we have become connoisseurs of misery, with a fine taste in suffering.

Is literature, then, to ignore the terrible facts of social injustice? No, but literature must evolve new sensibilities to deal with them, for the ways of the old sensibilities eventually falsify what they represent. Like continual melodrama, they debase the emotions; and they do not permit thought and therefore they check and limit the emotions. The limits of Malraux's emotional range are a case in point. This author does not find real significance in his pitiable miners or any real sense of human connection with them—they are for him merely the objects of his highly trained humanitarian feelings. All his novelistic interest centers in his three educated characters and in the love of a sensitive prostitute for one of them, and this interest is at best a sentimental one. To me the lack of any plot or development or ideas in the story and the complete reliance on isolated incident and on "poetry" indicate the inadequacy of the author's perception of misery.

In "Dark Wedding" Ramón Sender does not succeed in solving the problem of how to deal with misery and the brutalization that results from it, but at least he makes a considerable and admirable effort. He has chosen the method of fantasy and symbolism. His story begins in sober and rather brilliant realism and tells of the director of a Latin American penal island who returns to the colony with his new young bride and, after a more than usually brutal display of authority, is murdered on his wedding night. From here, by gradual stages, the story moves into fantasy as the convicts, insane to a man, struggle for the political control of the island and the possession of the virgin widow. The fantasy is wild and sometimes obscure, but the ideational intention of the book is always kept clear—it is that the horrible past crimes of the convicts and their present lust for the girl are, despite all appearances, actually perversions of love and twisted manifestations of the ideal; and this idea is of sufficient scope to require that the mind keep pace with the emotions as we read; and it effectually keeps us from condescending to the almost inhuman creatures we are reading about.

Andre Gide

THE CRISIS OF MODERN THOUGHT

Second Printing

Klaus Mann, in a brilliant, comprehensive analysis, has set forth for the English-speaking public the life and work of André Gide, one of the greatest of modern European writers. Critics say—

"a searching study of a great artist... an achievement which cannot fail to command the interest and respect of American readers."

—Ernest Boyd in the N. Y. TIMES

"Klaus Mann sends us back to the works of Gide with clearer sight and a more understanding heart."

—Albert Guérard in the N. Y. HERALD-TRIBUNE

At your booksellers,
$3.00

by KLAUS MANN

THE CREATIVE AGE PRESS • New York

LIGHTING UP LIBERIA

Second Printing

By ARTHUR I. HAYMAN
and HAROLD PREECE

Here is the inside story of Liberia, Key African base for American troops and potential source of greatly needed raw rubber. Arthur Hayman, American engineer, has just returned from the little-known African Republic, with startling disclosures of corrupt politicians, rubber barons, slavery and undeveloped vital resources.

"It is a calmly written indictment."
—HARRY HANSEN,
N. Y. World-Telegram

"...raises some large and largely neglected questions."
—LEWIS GANNETT,
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

Illustrated
$2.50
At all bookstores

CREATIVE AGE PRESS.

New York

Perhaps the comparison will seem extravagant and certainly it is bitterly unfair to an admirable if not wholly successful book, but there are many elements in "Dark Wedding" which brought "King Lear" to my mind. Both works are concerned to show man as naked as possible; both have a plethora of madness, by which they achieve their largest effects; both are pervaded by the themes of justice and both involve justice with sexuality; in both there is a dominant sense of the horror of nature (of creeping, crawling, and decaying things) as well as of the terror of nature, and both constantly question whether nature is good or bad; in both love in its perfection (Cordelia; the virgin widow) is true salvation, in its perversion (Goneril, Regan; the mad convicts) the source of evil.

"King Lear" is the greatest comment on human misery ever uttered; it puts the fact of misery under the greatest possible intellectual and emotional pressure to extract its meaning; it makes the universe rock, turns everything upside down, uses the loudest possible noise and the tenderest possible reticence to make us know what misery really is. It seems to me that this is the only way for literature to deal with the subject; anything less had better be no more than a sociological report. And Sender, in so far as he succeeds, uses Shakespeare's method of terrible, fantastic pressure.

But eventually Sender does not succeed. The pressure turns out to be insufficient. The symbols cease to work, the language becomes false—and Sender can write remarkably well, and Eleanor Clark has made one of the best modern translations I know—because eventually Sender's moral sensibility does not support them. His moral sensibility is modern: like all of us, he wants to hope, and since hope is hard to come by these days, he descends to facile optimism. Throughout the book

I had the uncomfortable awareness that even a gifted modern man cannot discourse about "love" without making it seem disconcertingly squashy. When the young hero, the school teacher Dario, begins to think of himself as "Lord of the Dawn," the débacle of sensibility begins; and when the hitherto sinister convicts begin showering the young lovers with the thousand-peso bills of the stolen fortune, the fantasy begins to deflate to the dimensions of a René Clair picture or even—what with the quaint Indians of the island—to the scale of "Peter and Wendy." This collapse is dispiriting, but it does not negate the energy and the rightness of the book's intention.

LIONEL TRILLING

Mr. Willkie's Two Odysseys

ONE WORLD. By Wendell Willkie. Simon and Schuster. $2.

MR. WILLKIE has been engaged in two great pilgrimages. The one took him around the world. The other carried him from the presidency of a public-utility corporation through a Presidential campaign to the position of an honored tribune in the nation. The fact that he has gained in moral stature since his defeat in the election has made thinking Americans look forward particularly to this report of his trip around the world. They had reason to expect that it would be a report of the two odysseys, though it would ostensibly be a record of only the more obvious one. It is possible to report gratefully that these expectations have not been disappointed. The more spiritual pilgrimage is fairly well indicated in the process of recording the trip around the globe. There are some tantalizing lacunae in the statement of his growth in political maturity. But it is fairly clear in outline. Furthermore, the indirect account of the one pilgrimage contributes to the value of the other. For Mr. Willkie is a keen observer, and some of his most casual reflections on men and events betray a remarkable grasp of the essential realities.

The book is worth reading, in other words, merely as a travelogue. His estimates of both personalities and social forces strike one as true, even when given in briefest terms. He speaks of some of the colonial officials of the Middle East as derived from "Rudyard Kipling untainted even with the liberalism of Cecil Rhodes," and thinks that "only new men and new ideas in the machinery of our relations with the East can win the victory without which any peace will be only an armistice." He records his conversion to the Zionist idea in Palestine after a single conference with Miss Henrietta Szold, the founder of Hadassah, and yet makes his position convincing. His estimate of Stalin is worth recording: "When we talked of the causes of the war and the economic and political conditions that would face the world after it was over, his comprehension was broad, his detailed information exact, and the cold reality of his thinking apparent. Stalin is a hard man, perhaps even a cruel man, but a very able one. He has few illusions." In his account of General de Gaulle Mr. Willkie allows one to suspect that the leader of the Fighting French takes himself rather seriously, comparing himself a little too obviously with Joan of Arc. Of all the people he met, Chiang

World Federation?
International Police?
Union with Britain?

POST-WAR WORLDS

By PERCY CORBETT

Is the sanest, clearest discussion to date of the form which the world-after-the-war must take. Written by the Professor of International Law at McGill University, it peddles no private panaceas but discusses the bases on which any successful proposal must rest—in the light of past experiences, both of the League of Nations and other experiments. It exposes the weaknesses of the current "paper plans" and shows why an international police force, alone, won't secure the Four Freedoms throughout the world.

Index. $2.00 at all bookstores or from

FARRAR & RINEHART, Dept. N,

232 Madison Ave., N. Y. City

Kai-shek and the leader of the Siberian republic of Yakutsk seem to have impressed him most. One must resist the temptation to quote indefinitely from his succinct and vivid accounts of men and events in order to come to the real message of the book.

It is of course not news that Mr. Willkie believes that the world is one and that America cannot find its rightful place in it if it does not become fully aware of the vast interdependence which a technical civilization has achieved. He wants neither isolationism nor isolationist imperialism. He deprecates the present policy of the State Department and observes that expediency, calculated to save a few lives, may lose many more in the end. He is convinced that Russia must be brought into any post-war system of mutual security and believes that the fear of Russia is a sign of weakness because the "best answer to communism is a living, vibrant, fearless democracy, economic, social, and political." His appreciation of the necessity of a generous relation with China, in which present disproportions of power will not be allowed to prompt policies which will cause future embarrassment, is as sound as his advice on Russia.

In general Mr. Willkie seems a little too much of a Wilsonian libertarian, emphasizing the necessity of granting freedom to all the nations without giving a full statement of how this liberty is to be kept from becoming suicidal in an interdependent world. It must be admitted, however, that he has a broad program for world order. He wants a United Nations Council now; and he wisely observes that "nothing much of importance can be won in peace which has not already been won in the war itself." This recognition of the organic character of historical processes would, if more fully developed, surely modify his more abstract libertarian conceptions. On the question of colonial policy he allows himself some rather sweeping condemnations without offering any specific suggestions for administering the affairs of peoples not yet capable of self-government.

Mr. Willkie, in short, substantiates the general impression of him as a proponent of a wise internationalism. The trip around the world may have sharpened his perceptions and matured his convictions. But he would not have seen what he did see if he had not brought a considerable wisdom to his adventure.

Unfortunately Mr. Willkie does not answer the one question about his development which many of us have found most intriguing. Has he learned anything about economic life which would prompt him to disavow the laissez faire nonsense which he talked in the Presidential campaign? Has his knowledge that the world is interdependent and that its international processes must be "managed" dissuaded him from his previous fear that any form of domestic management of economic life must lead to communism? It is hardly conceivable that some of the pages of this book are written by the same man who insisted during the campaign that we must defeat Hitler but must do it in the "American way" without any restrictions upon "free enterprise." Nevertheless, Mr. Willkie neither disavows any previous convictions nor yet gives any clear indication of present views. He does seem tremendously impressed by the fact that able men do rise to the top in the Soviet scheme.

The closest he comes to baring his heart is in an account

New Books from CHAPEL HILL

FREEDOM FORGOTTEN AND REMEMBERED

By Helmut Kuhn. Concentration camp — race hatred — global wars: these are the outward symptoms of a malady that has devastated Europe and threatens the freedom of the world. This provocative book uncovers the current superstitions.

May 8. $2.50

THIS IS LORENCE

By Loduwick Hartley. A delightful introduction to the Reverend Laurence Sterne, the enigma of English letters. His morality has often been called in question — his literary conscience, never.

May 15. $3.00

THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

By C. Herman Pritchett. A brilliant analysis of the background of the T.V.A., its program, its development as one of the greatest power agencies in the world, and its role as a regional planner, with particular attention to the administrative problems encountered.

$3.50

THE INTERNATIONAL STEEL CARTEL

By Ervin Hexner. Appraisal of the greatest collective marketing control in human history, emphasizing the political ideas underlying its development, the interaction of politics and economics during the time of its operation. Invaluable to persons interested in post-war reconstruction, cartels and foreign trade.

$6.00

RELIGION AND EMPIRE

By Louis B. Wright. The alliance between religion and trade from 1558 to 1625, with emphasis upon the part played by the English clergy in developing the concept of British imperialism.

$2.00

THE FLOOR OF THE OCEAN:

New Light on Old Mysteries

By E. A. Daly $2.50

ROBERT BURNS

Edited by Robert T. Fitzhugh $3.00

THE NATIVE LABOR PROBLEM OF SOUTH AFRICA

By J. M. Tinsley $3.00

THE GOVERNMENT OF LABOR RELATIONS IN SWEDEN

By James J. Robbins $3.50

HEINE IN ENGLAND

By Stanton L. Wormley $4.00

THE BRIGHT PLAIN

By Charles Edward Eaton

A volume of collected poems. $2.00

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE AND GERMANY

By W. A. McCongha $2.50

COMMUNITY ORGANIZATION AND ADULT EDUCATION

By Edmund deS. Brunner $2.00

DISCIPLINE FOR DEMOCRACY

By T. V. Smith $2.00

The University of NORTH CAROLINA PRESS

Chapel Hill, North Carolina

of a conversation with a Russian factory superintendent. He presses the Russian official to reveal the sources of his zeal and the driving force of his ambition. For once Mr. Willkie seems to be again the president of a public-utility corporation as he seeks to persuade the Russian that he is not really free if he cannot give expression to the economic or commercial motive. But the Russian remains adamant in his insistence that the Soviet system gives him both the required security and the incentive. What is really significant about this interview is that Mr. Willkie concludes the record of it with the following statement:

As I turned to go I overheard Major Knight, our amazingly skilful and intelligent pilot, say to Joe Barnes, "Listen, don't let's get away before you explain to that fellow that Mr. Willkie was just trying to get him to talk. Sure, we in America like what money can buy and want to get ahead a bit. . . . But at the same time I got this piece of ribbon here," pointing to the ribbon of the Distinguished Flying Cross, "and that didn't bring me a cent. You tell him that I'd give the rank and the pay rise back for nothing, but I wouldn't give away the ribbon for a million dollars."

I may be wrong but I think the old Mr. Willkie conducted that debate with the Russian superintendent, while the new Mr. Willkie found it necessary to add his pilot's refutation of his commercial creed. It was probably the political and circumspect Mr. Willkie who allowed his pilot rather than himself to give expression to sentiments which the traditional devotees of the "American way of life" must regard as rank heresy.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Growth of Cities

THE CITY: ITS GROWTH, ITS DECAY, ITS FUTURE.

By Eliel Saarinen. Reinhold Publishing Corporation.
$3.50.

WE ARE looking forward to a great Renaissance in which mankind will again be moved by other purposes than fear and greed. In this Renaissance the rebuilding of cities will have a prominent place; and I know of no single book on the subject so comprehensive, so free from crotchets and pedantries, so generous and yet so practical, as Eliel Saarinen's.

Saarinen does not spurn the city planning which is merely good housekeeping; but he looks beyond immediate needs. His field is city building, which, he claims, is "three-dimensional." May I put in a plea for the fourth dimension, time? In a historical city the preservation of traditional values is the essential rule. In a new city—and Saarinen recognizes it explicitly—we should "think of the future"; not merely in terms of increased traffic, but also in terms of style. We should not clutter up the next generation with buildings which represent merely a passing vogue.

Saarinen's keyword is "organic growth." An admirable principle, but taken as a shibboleth, as it was in the nineteenth century, it would be the negation of planning. Organic growth is unconscious. "It is foolishness," quoth the Organicist, "to create a city, write a constitution, plan an economy, invent a language." Joseph de Maistre wagered that the proposed city of Washington would never come into being. Voltaire would cap this reasoning: "It is absurd to believe that you can build a bridge across the Golden Gate by the radical and utopian method of first drawing blueprints. The bridge must grow organically." The truth is that we must conquer nature according to her own laws. Our method should be a rational and purposive evolution. And such is the gist of Saarinen's thought.

Saarinen considers the medieval city the perfection of organic growth. He is right, if we remember that a growth may be malignant. The medieval city was the result of a disease—fear. It was cramped, stunted, starved for air and light, by its defensive armor. A poignant beauty often was the result. In the same way, the twin disease, greed, is responsible for the cañons and towers of our modern Megalopolis. There also the result may be undeniably impressive. But impressiveness is no criterion. A Nazi mass-meeting or a battlefield may possess the dramatic power that we are seeking to destroy.

The other kind of city goes back to the Roman camp, and to the "free" towns deliberately created in the Middle Ages. Usually the checkerboard plan was adopted; it is not an American invention. In rare cases that least imaginative of all patterns is the most adequate. Nothing could have worked better in an elongated island like Manhattan. Broadway, the sole exception, creates a bad traffic problem at each intersection with an avenue. When the checkerboard plan is imposed upon a hilly site, with no regard for contours, as in San Francisco, it is an abomination. But the planned city is not necessarily quadrilateral. It developed in the classical age from the avenues traced in the royal forests. At Versailles, at Karlsruhe, the city plan is almost the replica of the pare

The City
ITS GROWTH ITS DECAY
ITS FUTURE
By ELIEL SAARINEN

THIS book is the most significant work yet written on the future of the city, as seen through the eyes of a world-renowned architect and city designer. Therefore it will interest all social-minded citizens concerned with post-war urban development.

Saarinen clearly appreciates the influence of environment on man's cultural and social development. To him—slum clearance, decent living and working conditions for the city's working population offer a challenge that cannot go unheeded. He therefore sets forth the physical and economic causes for urban decadence—and then calls for action—with a logical, vigorous, corrective plan based on urban rehabilitation and decentralization.

The urgency of intelligent city planning has long been appreciated and now Saarinen has made the subject vibrant and alive. Timely, authoritative and thought-provoking, THE CITY is the outstanding book in its field.

Illustrated by the author
$3.50 at Leading Bookstores or
REINHOLD PUBLISHING CORPORATION
122 WEST 42nd STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.
Also publishers of "New Pencil Points," the architectural magazine of the planning profession.

layout. The Invalides, Ecole Militaire, and Etoile districts in Paris were conceived in the same spirit. The standard example is our own Washington.

Saarinén contrasts the Informal Revival, of which the best theorist was Camillo Sitte, and the Formal Continuance, the Louis XIV and Haussmann tradition. With these schools of planning, as a rule, went certain styles: Gothic and Renaissance when the goal was picturesqueness; and when the grandiose was desired, the classical, with a touch of the baroque, leading to the banal elegance of the Beaux-Arts. Saarinen deprecates "styles." Our own age should evolve, and is evolving, organically, a style of its own. Banks that ape the Parthenon or the Palazzo Vecchio are as absurd as Gothic railway stations. This has now become so obvious that a plea for the defeated side may be needed. We do not discard from our speech ancient words which still serve our purpose. We even go into deliberate archaism, as Lincoln did, when the occasion warrants a particular solemnity of tone. In the same way, there are architectural idioms which are best able to express thoughts that are still with us. A Gothic cathedral is not absurd if the doctrine and ritual of the thirteenth century are kept alive under its vault. The colonial and early republican styles are not dead: like the Constitution, they stand for a way of life which we still cherish. I should like to meet my friends in a Louis Quinze salon, if only we could live up to our furniture. But for the bulk of our architecture—public buildings, offices, stores, apartments, and most private dwellings—Saarinen is manifestly right.

He has no love for what is most distinctive and modern about American cities—the skyscraper and blatant advertising. He condemns both, not so much in the name of beauty as in that of efficiency. Both are self-defeating. They start a spiral—ever higher, ever louder—which must lose itself in the absurd.

The compact Megalopolis is doomed. Many remedies have been proposed. Saarinen's is "organic decentralization." Split up the big city into self-contained units, separated by vast open spaces, if possible by forest belts. Prost adopted the idea for the development of the Paris region: instead of expecting new rings to grow solidly round the old core, he would have the satellite cities remain separate. Los Angeles offers an adumbration of that method—a hundred suburbs in search of a city. The formula might be very successful. Saarinen offers sketches of decentralization patterns for Tallin, Helsinki, Athens, and even Chicago and Detroit.

All this is right: but is it feasible? Saarinen proves, conclusively, I believe, that values, in real terms, would be increased and stabilized through his method. But will he ever convince the realtors, for whom the city is first of all a roulette table? Even if the city as a whole should gain by the reform, the realtors and their clients will not easily forfeit the "incentive" of fabulous wealth. Our political and legal system is geared to the defense of private interests; and the greatest of these, the palladium of our economic liberty, is the right to buy a lottery ticket. Saarinen's admirable proposals, although conceived in a truly conservative spirit, demand a revolution in thought. Cooperation must be substituted for scramble; or—why mince the words?—socialism in all social matters, collectivism in all collective enterprises,

BUSINESS AS A SYSTEM OF POWER

By ROBERT A. BRADY

"To all who think that the peace is being largely made during the war, this book is timely in the accurate ~~order~~ of that overworked term."—Free World.

"... the facts he has so skillfully gathered necessitate a radical rethinking of what is happening in the capitalist world."—New Republic. $3.00

THE TRAGEDY OF EUROPEAN LABOR

1910-1939

By ADOLF STURMTHAL

"... a very important contribution to our thought ... all people who are interested in democratic politics will find this book most helpful and revealing."—Reinhold Niebuhr.

"... a discerning analysis of the political and ideological forces that have conspired to emasculate the labor movements of Germany and other European countries."—Paul F. Brissenden. $3.50

Columbia University Press

For Unity and Victory

Labor Rally

Prominent speakers representing the

UNITED NATIONS

Chairman: JOS. CURRAN

ENTERTAINMENT

PAGEANT CHORUS

STAGE AND SCREEN

★ ★ ★ STARS ★ ★ ★

★ Yankee Stadium
★ Sunday, May 2nd
★

AT ONE P. M.

★ Auspices: LABOR FOR UNITY & VICTORY COMMITTEE
★ 80 E. 11th Street, New York City

★ TICKETS: 55¢ each (30¢ in blocks of 100)

★ INVADE ★ EUROPE
★ NOW!

Instead of rugged individualism and the survival of the most callous.

That revolution is under way. If we leave it to "organic," that is, unconscious, development, we might very well be heading for that extremely natural phenomenon, a cataclysm. If we apply the method of purposive, planned evolution, we may be spared. It will require firm and expert steering; and, in his own domain, Saarinen, artist, technician, thinker, and poet, would be an invaluable guide. ALBERT GUÉRARD

Welcome, Stranger!

THE HILL. By David Greenwood. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

IT IS a great temptation to endow Mr. Greenwood's first book with all the tokens of a critical desideratum. But that would be to consume an unpretentious, a warm, a really blooming book in the critical oven, to bury it, in fact, under the cinders. The reason for the temptation is simply that Mr. Greenwood has written about small-town life as if it were his first exciting visit. (Welcome, stranger!) The story begins when a writer, having lost his way in a fog, stumbles on the ghost town of Wabash Hill, a derelict of the California gold-rush days. The writer discovers the small town. And it is his general air of wonder, his fresh point of view, and his gradual understanding of the inhabitants that infuse a stale theme with new life. The characters are presented naturally; we understand them through their understanding of each other. The humor too is their own, the unconscious humor of the inarticulate, as in the enormously funny account of the fight over a gift fishing reel; or the conscious humor of mock seriousness in the delightful legend of the moon dog. Both types spill over into poetry. The conversation is especially good; Mr. Greenwood seems to have located the essential and unbroken connection between native American speech and revelation of character.

It is significant that both town and characters are imaginary, which is to say they are created, "written," not recalled in passive retrospection. The small town has become the deadliest of subjects, although as a basic American theme it contains perhaps a greater concentration of the traditional elements of American culture than any other single theme. The trouble has been that novelists have not been aware of these elements as a tradition which must necessarily be expressed in terms of the present if both tradition and expression are to have meaning. Novelists have been content merely to use the small town as an emotional escape, to relive the past by projecting into the present feelings that belong to the past and no longer have a living source. This sentimental archaeology is a dead end; emotion becomes glamour, characters become frustrated, and writing becomes academic. Mr. Greenwood's method is better. He chose his setting, as he says in his preface, "as one well suited to highlight certain human values which in American life are indestructible." He has succeeded in realizing that intention in a series of sketches of extraordinary vitality. He has made a beginning. It remains to be seen whether he can carry over his knowledge of American character and its modes of expression into the more hazardous form of the novel. H. P. LAZARUS

"Manners, Morals, and Mistakes"

FANTASTIC INTERIM. By Henry Morton Robinson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

MR. ROBINSON deals with America's course from Versailles to Pearl Harbor in terms of our "manners, morals, and mistakes." Being the author of "Private Virtue—Public Gain" (1938), a thumping defense of private enterprise, he quite properly acknowledges that his is a hindsight view of our past quarter of a century. But since it is so very necessary for us to understand just what happened to us during the interval between the two wars—what our mistakes were, what alternatives we had—we cannot follow him too hastily, even when he is castigating the most brazen scoundrels and national follies. His method, admittedly borrowed from Frederick Lewis Allen, has its dangers. Mr. Allen, in "Only Yesterday" and "Since Yesterday," recounted the interesting events, personalities, and "national temper" of the 1920's and 1930's. But this is a vastly different thing from discovering our "mistakes" in national policy, separating causes from effects, and laying responsibility squarely before the right people.

Mr. Robinson paints a picture of the 1920's which, so far as it goes, will be generally accepted. He writes sharply about our failure to include the League of Nations in our plans. He is duly disgusted with "normalcy" under Harding, "prosperity" under Coolidge, and Hoover's unbending ineffectiveness. But the real question is why we shirked our international and domestic obligations, and who it was precisely that did the shirking. Mr. Robinson is no analyst. He never looks back of 1919, and he treats Europe solely in terms of its war debt to us. He describes with indignation and detail how "we" patronized speakeasies, entered flag-pole-sitting contests, and played Mah Jong. But his accounts of the La Follette Presidential campaign of 1924, Sacco and Vanzetti, the Gastonia strike, and similar issues are superficial even when not brief.

Mr. Robinson, of course, reviews our foreign policy with an eye on Pearl Harbor. But granting the fatuity of the Washington Conference on Naval Disarmament, and our—to say the least—muddled relations with Germany, Japan, and other nations, the author does not formulate anything that approximates a philosophy, hindsight or otherwise. For example, he contends that Japan and Germany studied the art of war, and that we should have done likewise. He does not tell us what forms a military program might have taken under the reactionary politicians he describes, and under the "brass hats" who broke "Billy" Mitchell; or what forms it did take in the field of dollar diplomacy. He pours scorn on the peace societies; but he never considers how peace is to be achieved, and what role peace organizations—the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, let us say—can play in the question.

Mr. Robinson is, in short, an exponent of private enterprise who has been busy reevaluating our "fantastic interim"; and all things considered, he has not done badly. For here we have the author of "Private Virtue—Public Gain" approving the cause of the bonus marchers and hailing the New Deal for having come to grips with the economic crisis—at one point he even takes exception to the President for having failed to go far enough! He accepts the C. I. O. as the historical agent of the unorganized and unskilled workers, and he upbraids private enterprise—which in his earlier book he defended against what he called "federal socialism"—for having failed to rise to its tasks either during prosperity or depression. He is all out for the war. He condemns the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey for its well-known dealings with I. G. Farbenindustrie, and business in general for having, as he angrily underscores, put its private interests first and our war needs second.

It is interesting to have so earnest a business moralist as the author concerned with the possibilities of another post-war cycle of "normalcy," prosperity, and depression, and to read his anxious recommendations for sound education, economic security for the masses, and private industry run on social lines. Is Mr. Robinson's book symptomatic of a new attitude developing in the circles of formerly rugged individualists? One would like to think so.

LOUIS FILLER

Fiction in Review

TO SAY that Mark Aldanov's "The Fifth Seal" (Charles Scribner's Sons, $3) is one of the most disappointing novels I have read this year is of course not to suggest even an oblique compliment to the novels which failed to disappoint me simply because they never promised anything. Rather, I mean it as a compliment to the fine opening chapters of Mr. Aldanov's book and as profound regret that a novel which starts so handsomely should turn out, finally, to be so much less than successful. For in its first pages, or even on any given page throughout its length, "The Fifth Seal" is stamped with the signs of a first-rank talent: here are the relaxation and discipline of style, the sense of space and air, the energetic eye, the proud intelligence, all the virtues which we associate with novels in the great Continental tradition and miss in contemporary fiction. (Mr. Aldanov, by the way, wrote "The Fifth Seal" in Russian; it is beautifully translated by Nicholas Wreden.) But if Mr. Aldanov's novel has one foot, its stylistic foot, in the great tradition, its other foot is in modern politics—slippery ground for any writer, but especially for a moralist; and Mr. Aldanov is above all a moralist. Indeed, the story of "The Fifth Seal" is all a matter of moral-political problems; or, to put it more precisely, its story is a counterpoint of characters (somewhat à la Jules Romains), and its characters are moral-political symbols. The author is therefore in the position of having to solve modern politics in order to control his plot. It is a bad situation for a novelist to contrive for himself. And since Mr. Aldanov has no political answer, his story is confused and, long before its end, merely dull.

Mr. Aldanov works with two sets of characters, a group of Soviet diplomats and government specialists which includes an ambassador, an Old Bolshevik, an Old Guard general, and a girl interpreter, and a group of Frenchmen which includes a famous writer, a pair of aristocrats, a murderer, and a Socialist lawyer. Because of its treatment of the Soviet contingent, "The Fifth Seal" has been attacked even before publication as anti-Soviet propaganda. Well, if such attacks

AMUSEMENTS

John Steinbeck's

THE MOON IS DOWN

Now!

A 20th Century-Fox Picture

Rivoli

B'WAY AT 40th ST.

CAPITOL

B'way at 51st St.

ON THE SCREEN

"HANGMEN ALSO DIE"

Starring
BRIAN DONLEVY
Released thru United Artists

Sparkling Stage Show

"An extraordinary fine, understanding and fighting treatment of the Czech resistance to the Nazis."

—John McManus, PM.

THE THEATRE GUILD'S
NEW MUSICAL PLAY

OKLAHOMA!

ST. JAMES THEATRE

44th Street West of Broadway
EVES. 8:30 • MATS. Thurs. & Sat.

Musical by Richard Rodgers

Book and Lyrics by

Oscar Hammerstein 2d

Directed by

Rouben Mamoulian

Dances by

Agnes de Mille

Betty • Alfred • Joseph • Juan
Gardner • Drake • Buloff • Roberts
Lee • Howard • Celeste
Dixon • da Silva • Holm

FRANCE FOREVER

The Fighting French Committee in America

MASS MEETING

THURSDAY, APRIL 29th, 1943

AT 8:30 P.M.

HUNTER COLLEGE AUDITORIUM

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER

National Director of the Non-Partisan Council to Win the Peace, Lecturer and Journalist.

HENRY TORRES

Member of the Executive Committee of FRANCE FOREVER.

FERNAND LAURENT

Member of the French Parliament for Paris who escaped from France last December, will give an eye-witness account on the general situation in France (in English)

TWO SHORT FILMS ON FIGHTING FRANCE WILL BE SHOWN.

Tickets are on sale at FRANCE FOREVER,
567 FIVE Avenue, New York, N. Y. • Eldorado 5-4051 and at the day of the meeting at Hunter College Box Office, Park Avenue at 69th Street, New York, N. Y.

$1.65 - $1.10 - $0.65

Special prices for students and men in uniform can ever be said to be justified, I suppose there are grounds for this one. Certainly, concerned as he is with political morality, Mr. Aldanov has not spared the Soviet Union. What all the Russian characters have in common is their awful insecurity, and Mr. Aldanov is profoundly critical of a regime that can make fear the dominant factor in the lives even of people who are so many miles away from GPU headquarters. And, a Kerenskyist himself, he is also at some pains to go behind the present regime, if not to destroy the historical and personal picture of Lenin, at least to assign to the father of the Russian Revolution his due responsibility for what has happened in Russia since his death. (Communists, however, can take what comfort they will from Mr. Aldanov's obvious lack of partisanship for Trotsky.) But the important point about "The Fifth Seal" is that it is quite as severe with its Frenchmen as it is with its Russians; indeed, there is no one in this novel, living or dead, whatever his party or country, who really earns its author's approval. It is the price, evidently, that Mr. Aldanov must pay for making political symbols out of people: what begins as political pessimism ends up as misanthropy. "The Fifth Seal" not only deprives us of a hero—that most elementary gratification of fiction—but treats all its characters with an ironic superiority and as if they deserved their fates.

And even misanthropy must be under the author's full control if it is to have stature. But a large part of "The Fifth Seal" reminds one of a collection of stills taken at random from a moving picture, a series of isolated views which may hint at connections and larger significances but never really make or state them. And even where his meaning should be clear, Mr. Aldanov's symbolism is often so weary that I doubt my reading of it. For instance, there are four old men in "The Fifth Seal" who worry about their health; the diseases from which they suffer are heart trouble and high blood pressure, and two of the characters meet at the office of the same doctor—but I can scarcely believe that Mr. Aldanov is using this hackneyed way of saying that Europe is sick and old. Or the dramatic high moment of the novel is the murder committed by Alvera; since Alvera's trial and the Moscow trials seem to take place at approximately the same time, I gather that the whole Alvera motif was introduced in order to complement the Russian political situation—but all Mr. Aldanov seems to be saying, then, is that murder is murder, whether public or private. Or again, when Alvera's Socialist lawyer arrives late at his client's execution and faints, if Mr. Aldanov is saying what I think he is saying—namely, that this is the historical role of the Socialist Party, that it always arrives too late and then collapses before the ensuing mess—what are we to make of the fact that Alvera actually committed the murder and that his execution is the meting out of justice? Nor, just by the way, is the lawyer, who defended Alvera to the best of his ability, in any way responsible for either the execution or the mess! I admit it is a sad way to read a novel, solving it like a puzzle, but here is another result of an author's treating his characters primarily as characters in a parable and only secondarily as human beings.

I could wish, in other words, that Mr. Aldanov had recognized both his intentions and his limitations and written an out-and-out satire. For certainly his clearest and best moments are his moments of satiric play. There is the scene, for example, in which the king of the unnamed country formally receives the accredited representatives of the Soviets at a formal reception, or the whole wonderful episode in which Nadia, the beautiful girl interpreter, decides to write a story and walks the chalkline between ideology and creativity so successfully that she gets hailed as the new Soviet genius. (I believe it is early in Nadia's literary career that she talks to the Russian ambassador about her plot. "Plot against whom?" asks the frightened diplomat.) Out-and-out satire, especially when it is written on the high level of the satiric passages in "The Fifth Seal," is not only an excellent medium for moral criticism but, it seems to me, much better suited to Mr. Aldanov's temperament and political point of view than the kind of novel he has attempted.

DIANA TRILLING

PUBLISHERS!

We are fully licensed to purchase electro-types, copper, zinc and other non-ferrous scrap metals which you are required by law to sell. Immediate cash. For information, telephone EVergreen 9-4131.

FRIEDMAN METAL COMPANY
310 OAKLAND STREET
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MUSIC

A LATER performance of "Petrushka" by the Ballet Theater was even more exciting than the first. With the playing of the orchestra more secure, Stravinsky's conducting produced an even more powerful statement of the music; and the stage performance gained enormously from the vitalization and enrichment of the title role by Lazovsky. Together with his brilliance, verve, and style as a dancer Lazovsky has remarkable powers as an actor—the superb comic actor of "Three Virgins and a Devil," the deeply affecting tragic actor of "Petrushka," who achieves what nobody else is able to achieve so well: the sharpened, intensified style of movement which makes the puppet more puppet-like than any other, and its quasi-human emotions more pathetic—but always as the quasi-human emotions of a puppet.

The completed "Romeo and Juliet" strengthened some of the impressions I had got from the first, incomplete performance: Tudor's limited vocabulary makes for repetitiousness; but among the things that are repeated is the beautifully imagined invention for the scenes of the two lovers, marvelously executed by Markova and Laing; and there are interesting new things that Tudor contrives for situations and characters which he has not dealt with before, such as the brawls, and the menace and violence of Tybalt. The work is, I think, a distinguished achievement.

On Columbia's April list is Shostakovich's Piano Concerto Op. 35, played by Eileen Joyce with the Hallé Orchestra under Leslie Heward (Set 527, $3.68). Looking to see what I had written about this work when it was first played here in 1935-36, I found this gratifyingly perceptive comment: "Shostakovich possesses great fluency, but in an acrid idiom which lends itself in fast tempo to mockery and grotesquerie and in slow tempo to a distorted lyricism; and these ends are furthered by a technical skill which knows how to produce effects that shock and amuse one with their impudence. The mockery and grotesquerie, the distorted lyricism, the amusing impudence were all prominent in . . . last night's concerto, which turned out to be for the most part arid and unrewarding." At that time I had only as much acquaintance with Shostakovich's music as warranted this restrained comment; but by now I have heard enough to say with confidence that the concerto is merely another piece of the appalling rubbish that has come in an inexhaustible flow from this composer's mind. The performance in the Columbia set is good, and well recorded except for an overweighing of the bass.

With one superlative performance of Beethoven's First Symphony by Toscanini in the Victor catalogue, and another excellent one by Weingartner in Columbia's own catalogue, there would seem to be no need of recordings of Beethoven's First Symphony; but Columbia offers one made by Rodzinski with the Cleveland Orchestra (Set 535, $4.75). Rodzinski's performance is faster-paced than Toscanini's, and is taut and hard-driving whereas Toscanini's has a relaxed grace and power; but in its taut and hard-driving way it is an effective statement of all but the second movement. It is well recorded, with more spaciousness than Toscanini's but with less brightness, and with the first movement spread over three sides instead of Toscanini's two.

Walton's "Scapino: A Comedy Overture" (11945-D, $1.05) is arid stuff, excellently performed by Stock with the Chicago Symphony; the recorded sound of the performance is brilliant and spacious but not clean. Nelson Eddy's singing of "Rolling in Foaming Billows" and "Now Heaven in Fullest Glory Shone" from Haydn's "Creation" (71450-D, $1.05) I do not recommend.

For its April record classic Columbia has selected what is in fact one of the outstanding sets in its catalogue—the one (300, $7.88) of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," performed by Bruno Walter with the Vienna Philharmonic, Kerstin Thorborg, and Charles Kullman. Mahler's emotion, his musical language, his processes of thought, his gigantic forms make his works something special in music. A person who would like to acquaint himself with it will find in "Das Lied von der Erde" not only Mahler's fully matured style but a work that is more easily accessible for being in the form of a song-cycle. And in this Columbia set he will find a superb statement of it that is well recorded except for occasional shrillness.

B. H. HAGGIN

IN EARLY ISSUES OF The Nation

"Autobiography of a Curmudgeon," by Harold Ickes, reviewed by Eliot Janeway; "Round Trip to Russia," by Walter Graebner, reviewed by John Scott; "Physics and Philosophy," by Sir James Jeans, reviewed by Ernest Nagel; "Art and Freedom," by Horace M. Kallen, reviewed by Eliseo Vivas; "The Machiavellians," by James Burnham, reviewed by Reinhold Niebuhr; "Baudelaire the Critic," by Margaret Gilman, reviewed by Morton Dauwen Zabel.

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY INSTITUTE ON POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION

First Series of Conferences on Full Employment
and Minimum Living Standards . . . 11 Successive
Wednesday evenings at 8 P.M.

Subject of April 28th Conference

THE ECONOMIC REQUIREMENTS FOR FULL EMPLOYMENT

Single admission, 75¢

Auditorium, Education Building

Greene and West Fourth Streets, near Washington Square East

Conference Speaker:

NOEL SARGENT

Secretary, National Association of Manufacturers

For full particulars about this conference and the entire series of conferences, address The Director, Institute on Postwar Reconstruction, New York University, Washington Square, New York . . . telephone SPring 7-2000, Ext. 278.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 10

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 The boy appears to have stolen a letter from his aunt
- 5 The first syllable is what the second is not!
- 9 Part of a plant, but the size of the squad is suggested
- 10 By wearing this the Highlander is assured of cash in advance
- 11 What's cooking? Perhaps these hold the secret
- 12 A runaway match — but not on the sports field
- 14 Winston Churchill once called them "terminological inexactitudes"
- 15 The little yellow man makes a geometric reference
- 18 Last stage of lumbago
- 20 A fairy turns from wickedness
- 21 Broken English
- 23 It sounds a stable concern
- 26 Exit pater (anag.)
- 28 One of the Brontë sisters
- 29 Do these prepare children for the ups and downs of later life?
- 30 There appears to be a little trouble in Japanese currency
- 31 Is this how a Rotarian moves?
- 32 Obtains by crafty manipulation, in a manner of speaking

DOWN

- 1 Not halfway up but halfway down
- 2 Lightweight at the Zoo
- 3 There's no question but what a policeman's work is this

- 4 They let the cat out of the bag
- 5 A failure on the line
- 6 Got up like a flower
- 7 Hardy characters not found in a Hardy novel
- 8 Small additions — to the family, perhaps (two words, 4 and 4)
- 13 Exclamation evoked by a hug?
- 16 European from a wan region
- 17 It's a pinch!
- 18 One doesn't mind getting a good rating from him!
- 19 Simple Susie felt the druggist had gypped her when she found no fly in it
- 22 Passes, and pleases in a way
- 23 A tool from the Far West
- 24 Descriptive sometimes of lightning or slumber
- 25 They never can tell what they're laughing at
- 27 Smiling in a train

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 9

ACROSS:—1 COMMERCE; 5 RAIDER; 10 NICKS; 11 OFFENDING; 12 OARSMAN; 13 ERRATUM; 14 SHINER; 15 TREASON; 18 AIRGUNS; 21 TICKET; 24 DECLINE; 26 PIPETTE; 27 ARMY ORDER; 28 TREES; 32 DEBAMP; 30 IDOLATER.

DOWN:—1 CANNON; 2 MacARTHUR; 3 EASTMAN; 4 CROONER; 6 AINTREE; 7 DRIFT; 8 REGIMENT; 9 EFFECT; 16 SWEETMEAT; 17 HANDMAID; 19 UNIFORM; 20 STEADY; 21 TAVERNED; 22 CAPITAL; 23 LESSER; 31 COMIC.

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER'S competence to analyze the Culbertson plan rests on a career as a political observer dating back to 1921. He has covered capitals from Moscow to Madrid to Delhi and has followed closely the failures of the League of Nations. His books include "Men and Politics," "The Soviets in World Affairs," and "A Week with Gandhi."

COLIN S. MACLAREN served as an officer in the Indian army during and after the last war. He is now on the staff of the New York Times.

KURT BERNHEIM was for ten years a literary critic for European papers and magazines, as well as an editorial adviser to various Swedish publishers. For the past year he has been in New York as editorial representative of the Stockholm Tiden.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is the author of "Literary Opinion in America." He was formerly editor of Poetry.

LIONEL TRILLING is assistant professor of English at Columbia University.

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, has written "The Future of Paris: A Book on City Planning" and "The France of Tomorrow."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

$6.16 an inch

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

ALgonquin 4-3311

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 1, 1943

NUMBER 18

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

Roosevelt and Camacho
The Kerr Committee
The Tokyo Raid
Blind Date with Clío

613

ARTICLES

Findings on Bolivia by I. F. Stone
The Battle of MacArthur by Donald W. Mitchell
Shopping in 1943
by Louis Walinsky and Edward Sard
Waste on the Ways by Selden C. Menefee
10 Years Ago in The Nation
London in the Spring by Ida Treat
In the Wind

615
617
617
618
619
620
622
626
628
629
630

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

Europe Against Hitler by John W. Gerber and Alfred Kantorowicz
Wallace in Chile by Manuel Seoane
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus

631
634
635

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

In Distrust of Merits by Marianne Moore
Study in Cynicism by Reinhold Niebuhr
Hollywood View by Marcus Duffield
Russian Journey by John Scott
New Physics and Old Philosophy by Ernest Nagel
Drama by Margaret Marshall
Films by James Agee
Art by Jean Connolly
Music by B. H. Haggin

636
636 638
639
640
642
642
643
644

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

645

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 11 by Jack Barretts

648

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON
Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

MAXWELL S. STEWART
Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Association, Inc., 65 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 866 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE DAYS OF THE AXIS IN TUNISIA ARE numbered, but will the number be high or low? The course of the whole 1943 campaign of the United Nations in Europe hangs on the answer General Eisenhower's command is able to give to that question. For it is improbable that any other major operation will be attempted by the Anglo-American forces until this nest of Nazis is cleaned out. Thus every day that the Axis can gain in Africa is a day saved for the strengthening of the European fortress and for preparations for the one last offensive which most military observers expect Hitler to launch this summer. If the battle can be prolonged for weeks, a new and powerful drive against Russia seems likely. But if the Allies can push von Arnim, or whoever now commands the Axis army in Tunisia, into the Mediterranean by mid-May, Hitler may be compelled to concentrate on the defense of his fortress, which then can be threatened from many different points. In the past week the progress of the Allies measured in miles has not been great, but the Axis defenses in the mountains surrounding the Tunis-Bizerte triangle are being steadily ground down. As we write, a great battle is being fought for the key position of Pont du Fahs, to defend which most of the remaining Panzers seem to have been concentrated. If the enemy line can be breached at this point, the Allies should be able to swing into the plains before Tunis and turn the left flank of the Axis, against which the British Eighth Army is now pressing. Since Tunis itself does not appear to be an easily defensible position once the outlying mountain wall is pierced, the Axis forces are likely to be crowded into a small area around Bizerte for their final stand.

★

SCORE A BULL'S EYE FOR DOCTOR GOEBBELS.

With his tale of 12,000 Polish officers massacred near Smolensk, he has succeeded in snapping the already taut relations between the U. S. S. R. and Poland and producing the first break in the front of the United Nations. Both governments involved reacted blindly to the manipulations of the Wilhelmstrasse. We can understand the anger of the Russians but still regret their adoption of a remedy which plays into the hands of the enemy.

The suicidal eagerness with which the Poles jumped into the Nazi trap is almost beyond belief. The German report of the alleged atrocity, first broadcast from Berlin on April 12, had all the earmarks of a phony. As William Shirer has pointed out in the New York Herald Tribune, it started by talking of 3,000 murdered officers, but before the end of the broadcast the total had been hoisted to 10,000. Two days later the German press and radio had added on an extra 2,000 for good measure. Another doubtful point about the tale is the fact that, although the Germans have occupied Smolensk for nearly two years, they have only just turned up this gruesome evidence. The coincidence between their "discovery" and the Russo-Polish friction over the border question is just a little too perfect. Nevertheless, the Polish government quickly seconded a German proposal that the International Red Cross should be asked to investigate and help identify the bodies in the mass grave that is supposed to have been uncovered. Of course, the Nazis can easily produce 12,000 Polish corpses for inspection; their own victims in Poland total more than one hundred times that number. But surprisingly enough the Polish government has not asked the International Red Cross to take this opportunity to investigate German atrocities in Poland. In its agitation about the possible loss of its eastern provinces if the United Nations win the war, the Polish government seems to have forgotten that there will not be any Poland at all if Germany wins and that the best way of promoting a German victory is to split the Allied front.

✱

THE SUDDEN WITHDRAWAL FROM HELSINKI of the whole United States legation staff, with the exception of the chargé d'affaires and one clerk, seems to indicate that we are on the eve of a break with Finland. It is true that the State Department, with its usual anxiety not to commit itself, has explained the move as merely "administrative," but the effect of the action is to administer a strong rebuke to the Finnish government. According to some reports, our representatives in Finland recently communicated an informal offer, on behalf of the United States government, to act as go-between in initiating peace negotiations with Russia. The Finnish government is said to have returned an evasive reply and to have consulted the Nazis, who took the occasion to demand that Finland should stop thinking about peace and launch an offensive against the Murmansk Railway—one of the chief routes by which lease-lend supplies reach the Soviets. Whatever the truth of these stories, the fact is that the time has come for Finland to get off the fence. It can no longer hope to continue as a de facto ally of Germany while retaining American friendship as an ace in the hole to be turned up on the day that Germany is defeated. The position of Finland is admittedly desperate. It is dependent on Germany for most of its food supplies, and should it attempt to make a separate peace, it would probably find its allies turning into invaders. But if it wishes to retain any shreds of Western esteem, it must take the risks which many other small countries accepted when they refused to accommodate themselves to Nazi demands.

✱

THE NEW TAX BILL REPORTED OUT BY THE House Ways and Means Committee is better designed to appease the vociferous supporters of the Ruml plan than to meet the urgent inflationary crisis facing the country. If 1941 tax rates are applied to 1942 incomes, as suggested by the committee, a large number of taxpayers will escape the necessity of paying anything on their 1942 incomes and a larger group—including most of the so-called middle income groups—will have their tax liability cut by more than half. This may seem unimportant in view of the fact that a similar tax on 1943 incomes is to be collected this year. But in practice what has happened is that the committee has abandoned all plans to increase the 1943 income-tax rates, and the liability of the remaining 1942 tax has been spread over a three-year interval beginning March 15, 1944. The President's urgent request of last January for $16,000,000,000 additional revenue during 1943 to absorb the huge reservoir of war-created excess spending power has been ignored as far as the income-tax payer is concerned. The committee is reported to be considering seeking additional revenue from the lowest income groups through a sales tax. But apparently no effort will be made to collect the whole $16,000,000,000. This, of course, fits in exactly with Republican strategy. While the Republicans would like to go a little farther and get complete forgiveness of the 1942 tax liability, they have apparently already succeeded in their purpose of shifting the burden of taxation from the higher to the lower income groups and in preventing the drafting of dollars on the same basis as men. The price of their success must ultimately be a complete breakdown of the government's anti-inflation program.

✱

A STRIKE OF 450,000 BITUMINOUS COAL miners is likely unless the National War Labor Board is more successful than the Conciliation Service in obtaining the agreement of the mine operators to a reasonable basis for compromise. In their desire to destroy John L. Lewis once and for all, the operators seem determined to precipitate a strike which they hope will be broken by the government. Every fair-minded observer has been convinced from the beginning that the miners had a case for increased wages. Several ways of granting their demand without violating the spirit of the President's hold-the-line anti-inflation order have been suggested. All these proposals have been turned down by the operators. Lewis is, of course, playing a dangerous and unpatriotic game in defying the WLB; but there can be no doubt that he has the full support of the miners in his action. If Presidential intervention is necessary to settle the dispute, it is to be hoped that it will come before a strike actually gets under way.

✱

LIKE AN ALLEY CAT CAMPAIGNING FOR "Union Now" with a canary, Colonel McCormick has taken the stump for "Union Now" with Britain and its dominions. "States Across the Sea" is the theme of the plan put forward in all solemnity by the reformed isolationist, and it envisions six more stars for Old Glory—one each for England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and Canada, and one for Australia and New Zealand combined. As the Colonel sees it, the problem is simply one of sovereignty. Naturally we can't surrender any part of ours, he points out, "without repealing the Constitution." Since that is out of the question, all that remains is for Britain and the dominions to surrender theirs. Like all great ideas, the McCormick plan is so simple that its author marvels at the failure of his fellow-internationalists to advance it. "Certainly," he writes, "it is the one that would be most readily acceptable to the American people." Then, with a delicacy of feeling for the amour propre of the nations he would entice into statehood, the Colonel suggests what they would gain in acquiring the status of North Dakota. Australia should be delighted because it is "now aware of the inability of the British Empire to furnish protection." The British themselves, aside from gaining access to American manpower and gold reserves, would rid themselves "of the incubus of their nobility and aristocratic system." Other states of Western Europe may also join the union in time, provided they display an "aptitude for constitutional government." We hope the Colonel won't be jolted by the rudeness of the London Sunday Observer, which professes to trace the plan back to "The Apple Cart" by Bernard Shaw. And did the Observer have to add that "The Apple Cart" was voted "quite good comedy"?

✱

THE RECENT VISIT TO MONTEVIDEO OF TWO prominent Spanish Republicans has led to a slight conflict between the Franco administration and the Uruguayan government. Invited by Uruguayan and Spanish liberal groups, Señor Martínez Barrio, president of the Spanish Parliament until 1939, and General José Miaja, famous for his defense of Madrid, arrived in the Uruguayan capital to celebrate April 14, anniversary of the Spanish Republic. There were several impressive demonstrations of sympathy for the Republican cause, whereupon the Franco legation presented a protest to the Uruguayan government based on three points: that the "Sodre," the official radio station of Uruguay, had broadcast the speeches of the two Republican leaders; that the president of the Uruguayan House of Representatives, Señor Luis Batlle Berres, was present at the dinner given in their honor; and, finally, that General Miaja had worn the uniform of a full general at some of the ceremonies. The Uruguayan reply was bold and prompt. It said, first, that Uruguay is a democratic country and its government not only has no right to interfere in any manifestation of public opinion but is eager to promote the greatest possible freedom of speech. It pointed out, secondly, that in the case of Señor Batlle Berres, only the Uruguayan Parliament could decide about the use its members made of their special prerogatives—and added, rather ironically, that the government could anticipate the reaction of the House since the House had already officially welcomed the two Republican leaders in a special session held in their honor. It said, thirdly, that in the opinion of the Uruguayan government the uniform worn by an officer who had distinguished himself in the defense of Madrid was as much an honor to the Spanish army as to the Uruguayans who welcomed him.

Roosevelt and Camacho

THE President showed himself at his best when he crossed the border into Monterrey to meet the people of Mexico. If Mexico is a black spot to a handful of oil magnates and to that part of the press which is in the service of big business, every progressive American looks on it as the most socially advanced country of the continent. There are subtle and interesting implications in the fact that the President chose Mexico for his first official visit to Latin America during the war.

Mexico's foreign policy during the past ten years has been exemplary. President Camacho could well say that "Mexico has not had to change her course to be in the forefront of nations fighting Nazi-Fascist world domination." Mexico, in fact, condemned Japanese aggression in Manchuria. Mexico was one of the first to vote sanctions against Italy at the beginning of the attack on Ethiopia. The Mexican delegates walked out of the council room of the League of Nations in protest against the Laval-Hoare move, which by lifting the sanctions delivered a terrible blow to the Geneva institution. Mexico was firm in its policy in regard to Austria and Czecho-Slovakia. It was opposed to the Munich agreement. It was not only firm but splendid in its Spanish policy. Openly and officially supporting the Loyalists in the war, it has never recognized Franco. After having taken some 25,000 refugees from Hitler under its protection, Mexico opened its doors to Spaniards when the problem of the Spanish prisoners in North Africa arose.

Now, Mexico appears at the head of a strong movement favoring greater Latin American participation in the war as well as in the organization of peace. It believes that more must be done to help the United Nations' effort against fascism. At the same time it believes that the Latin American countries must sit at the peace table with equal rights; that their clamor for social justice and fair international treatment must be taken into consideration. President Roosevelt was very concrete when he said, "We know that the day of the exploitation of the resources of one country for the benefit of any group in another country is definitely over." That statement and his reaffirmation of "unconditional surrender," an answer to the pro-Nazi peace offer of Franco's Foreign Minister, Count Jordana, were the most important points of the President's speech. After the gesture of his appearance in Monterrey, there was nothing more to be said.

The fact that the meeting of the two Presidents on Mexican soil occurred just at the end of Vice-President Wallace's tour through South America is significant. In Buenos Aires, where Wallace's careful avoidance of Argentina was duly noted, President Roosevelt's visit to Mexico has made a deep impression. It has given a weapon to the liberal opposition, which is already taking advantage of the fact that Argentina, despite its stores of meat and grain, has not been invited to the Food Conference at Hot Springs, Virginia. It underlines the unfavorable national consequences of the pro-Nazi policy of the Castillo regime.

But if all this is encouraging, the warning that Manuel Seoane offers elsewhere in this issue must not be forgotten. Referring to the Wallace tour, and to the hopes it has awakened in Latin America, he says very bluntly that should these hopes be extinguished "nothing will restore the mutual confidence" upon which real inter-American cooperation must be based.

Nor can it be forgotten, at this moment of self-congratulation, that certain aspects of our foreign policy are regarded with deep mistrust in Latin America. One of the most unhappy elements in the State Department's international program is its constant self-humiliation before the hated Franco regime. Ambassador Hayes's speech offering El Caudillo the most benevolent treatment after the war has aroused a veritable tempest of indignation in Latin America. We could cite dozens of editorials, articles, and cartoons to illustrate it. The most representative men of Latin American democracy—former presidents and ministers, scientists, writers, and artists—have signed statements denouncing Ambassador Hayes's new version of non-intervention.

President Avila Camacho could have told President Roosevelt many interesting things. We are not sure that he did not. He could have told him, for instance, of the great dinner held in Mexico not many weeks ago, when the Mexican President appeared before 2,000 Spanish refugees gathered in his honor and told them that "aggression began in Spain" and that "you are the only Spain we recognize and esteem." A strong movement for the reestablishment of the Spanish Republic is spreading throughout Latin America. Our Department of State would do well to remember that fact in the prosecution of its inter-American policy.

Great as the resentment may be against the State Department, resentment is even greater against the way the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs approaches the problem of relations between the United States and Latin America. We have heard frequent complaints from important Latin American visitors, some of them in this country on the invitation of Nelson Rockefeller's office. They stress their personal gratitude for the courtesy shown them, but they believe that the policy of the Coordinator's Office, under the guise of cultural activity, actually supports the interests of American companies in Latin America. "The United States," one of these visitors said, "approaches Latin America from the same angle that the British approach India. The Rockefeller committee is transforming itself into the Colonial Office of the United States."

The complaints of our Latin American friends are not all of a general character. They can be quite specific. For instance, they resent the fact that the majority of executive positions in the Coordinator's Office are gradually coming under the control of representatives of American businesses which operate in South America. Another complaint is that Latin Americans working in the office have been relegated to secondary positions; that they are used only for reediting or for Spanish translation. The few advisers who remain, like Maria Rosa Oliver, an Argentine, Rose Ugarte, a Peruvian, and José Antonio Arce, a Bolivian, are constantly sent away from Washington to lecture or to take part in round tables. They are not allowed to exercise effective influence on the work of the Coordinator's Office.

All this resentment, which seems to be well founded, reveals a dangerous American attitude, one in open contradiction to the policy inherent in President Roosevelt's visit to Mexico and Vice-President Wallace's tour. The office of Nelson Rockefeller has successfully struggled to maintain complete control over inter-American affairs. The Office of Strategic Services and the Office of War Information have frequently had to curtail their activities because the Coordinator's Office claimed an infringement of its territory. Perhaps the Coordinator can justify himself by maintaining that he prevents disturbing interference. But he can maintain that position only on condition that his authority is used to promote the cause of the United Nations in Latin America, to secure genuine cooperation between the United Nations and Latin American democracy, and not to promote the interests of big business.

The Kerr Committee

THE Kerr committee, named by the House of Representatives to check on the Dies committee, has gone beyond the latter in unfairness. In Volume X of the Dies hearings it is stated, "The committee is not charging that government employees affiliated with the League for Peace and Democracy are members of the Communist Party. There is no evidence to this effect." But the Kerr committee, in declaring Goodwin Watson and William E. Dodd unfit for government office, seeks to establish the principle that membership in a so-called "front" organization is proof of subversive activity.

In arriving at this conclusion the Kerr committee tries to give the appearance of relying upon the opinion of the Attorney General. But inquiry at the office of the Attorney General in Washington disclosed that the Department of Justice has never gone beyond the principle that membership in a "front" organization warrants investigation under the Hatch Act barring from government employment persons who believe in the overthrow of the government by force and violence. Mere membership has never been held evidence of subversive activity, since it is well known that most persons in so-called "front" organizations are not members of the Communist Party. The Kerr committee, we are informed by the Attorney General's office, was also wrong in stating that the Washington cooperative bookshop, to which many government employees belong, had been branded a "front" organization by the Attorney General.

The Kerr committee also established another new low in political persecution and unfairness. We agree with Dr. Watson that it "represents the first instance in American history when Congress has held hearings involving the removal of a public official without affording him the usual constitutional safeguards, such as legal counsel, rules of evidence, and the right to summon witnesses." Dr. Watson added that while the committee had asked him to submit samples of his writing, "they did not even wait for the collection of the evidence which they themselves requested." Dodd's "conviction" is a similar combination of star-chamber procedure and "evidence" little better than gossip. The main counts against the son of our former ambassador to Germany were that he gave a cocktail party for Harry Bridges, that he wrote a greeting for the twentieth-anniversary issue of Soviet Russia Today in 1937, and that he belonged to the cooperative bookshop and the League for Peace and Democracy. Conduct of this kind, by a committee of Congress, is far more subversive of faith in our institutions than anything any revolutionary could say.

We are glad to hear that the Federal Communications Commission, which employs Watson and Dodd, will take no steps against them but will let Congress assume the responsibility for any action on the basis of this report. The FCC, notably Chairman James L. Fly and Commissioner Clifford J. Durr, has exhibited more courage in such cases than any other agency in Washington. It deserves the full support of the New Deal, which has been entirely too flabby in its relations with such groups as the Dies committee. The definition of "subversive activity" which the Kerr committee lays down will, if established, provide basis for an attack on most New Dealers. For this definition covers even "subtle and indirect" activity designed, in the opinion of the nearest snooper, "to undermine its [the government's] institutions, or to distort its functions, or to impede its projects, or to lessen its efforts, the ultimate aim being to overthrow it all."

We ask members of Congress: Has there ever been a time, since the earliest days of this Republic, when in the heat of political controversy men did not accuse their political opponents of engaging in conduct which would ultimately alter or overturn our system of government? Would there not have been endless civil strife and bloodshed if, instead of preserving freedom of opinion, our fathers had allowed the "ins" to proscribe the "outs" or vice versa on any such flimsy standards? Is it not shameful that as we celebrate the memory of Jefferson, the revolutionist, we permit a committee of Congress to trample under foot the principles of free discussion and fair procedure he did his best to establish?

The Tokyo Raid

A YEAR after the event we have at last learned the full details of the spectacular raid on Tokyo carried out by General Doolittle and his fliers in April, 1942. At first sight it may appear that we paid an extraordinarily heavy price for what the Herald Tribune describes as only a "brilliant stunt." All of the sixteen planes participating in the raid were lost except the one that landed in Siberia, and even that one may be grounded for the duration. Yet our losses in personnel were surprisingly small for such an audacious undertaking, and the raid seems to have accomplished results, quite aside from the actual damage inflicted, that may have an important bearing on the course of the war.

We can assume that the material damage wrought by the bombings was considerable although not decisive. All the bombs appear to have fallen on important military objectives, but the bombs were not heavy ones and the objectives were widely dispersed. The damage was probably more serious than a similar bombing of German war plants because Japan's recuperative power is undoubtedly lower than Germany's. It is fairly clear, however, that the bombings had a deleterious effect on Japanese morale. There was every evidence of panic in the early stories broadcast by the Tokyo radio, and there is good reason to believe that the Japanese High Command was forced to shift a large portion of its limited supply of fighter planes and anti-aircraft guns to the defense of the home base. We do not know the degree to which this may have upset the Japanese military time-table, but it is significant that the Tokyo raid came at the high-water mark of Japanese expansion. From that time until a few weeks ago the Japanese have never enjoyed aerial superiority on an important battle front.

The violence of the Japanese reaction to the raid is perhaps the best evidence we have of its success. After recovering from its bewilderment, the High Command's first action was to order a large-scale and costly drive against the section of China where it believed the raid had originated. Although the Japanese at first captured the airfields, they were ultimately driven back with heavy losses. Possibly because of their failure to retain control of these fields, from which future bombing operations might be conducted, they resorted, a few weeks later, to the extreme measure of executing some of the captured American airmen as "punishment" for the raid on Tokyo. The hypocrisy of this action beggars description. It was the Japanese who first introduced into modern warfare the ghastly practice of indiscriminate mass bombing of civilian populations. Their attacks on the helpless inhabitants of Canton in 1938, and on those of Chungking and Yunnanfu in the following years, still stand as the most destructive of human life of any air raids in history. There was no pretense that these raids were against military objectives. They were launched against defenseless cities solely for the purpose of terrifying the population into giving up. Our raid on Japan, on the other hand, was in no sense indiscriminate and was undertaken with purely military objectives. The fact that the Japanese have now committed the further barbarity of killing prisoners of war in direct contravention of international law can only increase the determination of every American to see Japan thoroughly and completely defeated.

Blind Date with Clio

THE New York Times, in conjunction with the Committee on American History, recently arranged a blind date with Clio for 7,000 undergraduates. Socially the occasion proved a colossal flop, for it seemed to show that the younger generation of Americans had a very slight acquaintance with the muse and no desire to improve it. The trouble, according to Hugh Russell Fraser, chairman of the Committee on American History, is that they have been taught the wrong approach. They have been encouraged to sidle up to the lady casually instead of advancing upon her in well-drilled chronological order; they have been introduced to her in company with ladies of less respectable lineage instead of being allowed to court her in decent privacy; and they have come away with only a very foggy idea of her figure and features.

In our letter pages this week Mr. Fraser pins the responsibility for this state of affairs on the Teachers College methods and at the same time voices a grievance against I. F. Stone, who, in The Nation of April 17 damned the New York Times history test as an attempt to divert attention from the federal Aid-to-Education bill and lumped Mr. Fraser with the reactionaries. We, of course, accept Mr. Fraser's assertion that he is a progressive, but we must point out that his attacks on the men who have been endeavoring to teach history with some social content play into the hands of the Tories and ultra-nationalists. There are all too many people who believe that memorizing facts is the equivalent of receiving an education and who are ready to seize on any argument for a return to "the good old methods."

The results of the Times survey, which is the basis of Mr. Fraser's wholesale attack on history teaching in American schools, would, if taken at their face value, suggest that something is very wrong indeed. But as an attempt to assay the quality of particular methods of history instruction the tests lacked scientific precision. No attempt was made to classify the students taking the examination into two groups—those taught on chronological lines and those subjected to the Teachers College "social studies" method. Mr. Fraser has admitted (in PM) that he has no idea how the students were, in fact, taught, but he had no difficulty in concluding that the ignorance they displayed was the result of a form of instruction which he condemns.

Again, there is good reason to believe that a considerable number of the students tested did not take the examination seriously. The fact that 1,500 out of 7,000 students called upon to name three famous railroad men wrote down "Casey Jones" may serve as a criterion of collegiate humor; it hardly permits generalizations about collegiate knowledge of American history. Moreover, as such flippancies remind us, the students taking the tests were aware that no credits were involved.

Here is a really significant fact which may help us to put a finger on one of the major weaknesses of American education—the emphasis on utilitarian standards. Whatever method they employ, teachers of history and other cultural subjects are persistently handicapped by the implications of such questions as, What's the use of it? Will it help me in getting a job? How many credits will it give me? We cannot blame students for taking this attitude, for it is simply a reflection of a social system which considers a good football coach to be worth far more than a good history professor. As long as this scale of values persists, Terpsichore is the only one of the muses likely to make much of a hit with the younger generation as a whole.

Findings on Bolivia

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 23

I HOPE I will not be thought too unkind if I suggest that the long-awaited report on Bolivia makes me think of a physician who advises an underpaid sick worker to drink three quarts of milk a day and spend his winters in Florida. No humane person will dispute the recommendations turned in by the Joint United States Bolivian Commission. Their findings, all things considered, are courageous; their proposals, progressive. If adopted, these proposals would give Bolivia a modern system of education, strong trade unions, good housing, a complete system of social insurance, and scientific (no less) nutrition. But these things, as is well known, cost money, and more revenue can be obtained only from the great companies which exploit Bolivia's natural riches and from the governments at present buying their products. This means principally the United States.

The American delegation, under Judge Calvert Magruder of the United States Circuit Court, was progressive and included representatives of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. But it was hampered by its instructions from the State Department and was bound in advance to turn in a unanimous report. On the basic question of obtaining more revenue for social welfare, the rule of unanimity was nevertheless broken by the Bolivians, leaving the Americans in an unhappy position. In the Addenda the Bolivian members point out that the solution of the country's social problems depends "on a sound economic base" and suggest that the first step would be a better price for Bolivian raw materials. The American delegation no doubt agreed but was forced to reply that it had been instructed in advance "not to deal with the question of the adequacy of present mineral or rubber prices." These Addenda cause the report to end with an anticlimactic um ph.

The Bolivian contingent on the commission was headed by the Minister of Labor, His Excellency, as he is described, Dr. Juan Manuel Balcázar. By some technicality Dr. Balcázar managed, despite the unanimity rule, to avoid signing the report. His principal contribution seems to have been a last-minute proposal for an increase in the price of tin, and his reluctance to sign the report is understandable in view of the quiet severity with which it criticizes the enforcement of the labor laws of Bolivia. Since the four other Bolivian members are government officials, their participation in these criticisms was courageous and commendable. By contrast, the American delegation was ignominiously, though reluctantly, silent where it might have been similarly critical of some agencies of our own government and their representatives in Bolivia.

While the Bolivian members joined in describing the contrast between the advanced laws on the statute books of their country and the backward conditions in its mines, workshops, and plantations, they relapsed at the end into an expression of the very thesis put forward in Washington by the tin kings. They expressed "the conviction that a better price for Bolivia's raw-material exports would automatically lead to an improvement in the living conditions of the working classes. . . ." This is also the thesis of those who, like the dominant faction in the State Department, Jesse Jones, and most of the business men at the BEW, oppose the inclusion of labor clauses in supply contracts. These clauses, which have the support of both Vice-President Wallace and Milo Perkins, would make sure that additional funds made available by the American government for mining and other enterprises go directly toward raising the living standards of their workers.

The report itself presents evidence which refutes the view that higher prices "would automatically" improve the condition of the workers. "So far," the report says, "it appears that the rubber workers have derived little or no benefit from the increased price of rubber due to the war boom." There is also a war boom for tin, tungsten, and antimony; yet the report informs us that "real wages of mine workers have declined in spite of substantial increases of cash wages." Had the commission not been fettered by the unanimity rule, some members at least might have developed the further crucial point that mere increases in price will also fail to increase production "automatically." But this would run directly athwart the philosophy of the tin kings and their friends in the RFC and the State Department.

The close relationship between greater productivity and better working conditions is, indeed, implicit on virtually every page of the report. "Mines are clamoring for additional labor"; yet "there is not a single safety engineer employed in all Bolivia." During the past seven years one worker out of five has been temporarily or permanently incapacitated—7,000 a year permanently "with a loss of 60,000 work shifts." Occupational diseases, primarily silicosis and tuberculosis, end the working careers of from 8 to 9 per cent of the miners annually. Though a law passed in 1920 requires every mine company with 500 or more workers to maintain a hospital, only ten do so, and in the country as a whole there is only one hospital bed for every thousand persons. Malnutrition and undernourishment reduce the Bolivian worker's output, and many substitute the narcotic coca leaf for the food they find it hard to get. At least 75 per cent of the population is illiterate.

These conditions, plus the severe restrictions on collective bargaining, are hardly calculated to put Bolivia's workers in the proper frame of mind to turn out more of the metals and rubber we need so desperately in our war effort. We who speak with such superiority of slave labor in the Nazi economy cannot fail to recognize that decent treatment of workers is the first step to better output and to better hemispheric cooperation. Much that is good in the report may be overlooked by critics because the commission was forced, between the pressures of the State Department and the Bolivian government, to make no mention of the recent "Nazi-inspired" strike in the tin mines. Thus it was required to skirt the actual reason for its appointment. Messrs. Patino, Aramayo, and Hochschild must be gratified by the gaping hiatus where one would expect an investigation and an account of the strike and its causes.

More serious even than this omission is the fact that the Bolivian Minister of Labor succeeded in preventing the commission from talking with leaders of the strike, who are still in jail. At least two members of the American group, Robert E. Mathews of the BEW and Martin C. Kyne of the United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America, tried until the very last to see these labor leaders, but without success. So long as these men remain in jail, the commission's report will earn less credit than it deserves. Nor can much improvement be expected without pressure for the recall from La Paz of our anti-labor ambassador, Pierre de Lagarde Boal, and a change in the dominant policy at the State Department and the RFC. It is up to the American labor movement to work for the release of the strike leaders and to support the fight for labor clauses in the contracts for Bolivian metal and rubber.

I am happy to report that Ernesto Galarza, Mexican-born chief of the Division of Labor and Social Information of the Pan-American Union, who started the battle to help Bolivian labor, has been reinstated in his job. Chief credit for this goes to Dr. Leo S. Rowe, head of the Pan-American Union.

The Battle of MacArthur

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE recent airing of conflicting opinions regarding our policy in the Southwest Pacific merely opens an old sore that has existed under cover since the early days of the war. Though certain important matters of strategy were long ago settled in Washington, the decisions have never been accepted in some quarters. The contradictory statements recently issued by General MacArthur and Secretary Knox about the imminence of a Japanese offensive in the Pacific, the divergent assertions of such high officials as Admiral Halsey and Elmer Davis of the OWI, and the general disagreement between Halsey and MacArthur regarding the entire war outlook are symptoms of conflict so basic that it is bound to hinder the efficient prosecution of the war.

After Pearl Harbor the President and his advisers were confronted with the choice of concentrating our energies against either Germany or Japan. Among those in favor of bending every effort to beat Japan first were most American naval officers, a faction in the army which realized it was not then in condition to tackle Hitler, many Americans whose thought processes had been affected by Pearl Harbor, and most of the ex-isolationists. The same opinion was held by the British Dominions of New Zealand and Australia, China, and of course the Philippines, whose most popular and influential spokesman was General MacArthur. Balancing the calls for a Pacific offensive were the cries from occupied Europe, the established war needs of the British and the Soviets, and the unquestionably greater military and industrial might of Nazi Germany.

It is doubtful whether a more difficult choice ever faced a commander-in-chief. Neglect of either enemy while energies were concentrated exclusively on the other could easily mean that the one overlooked might extend its conquests so greatly as to be unbeatable at a later date. On the other hand, if we divided our strength equally, we should probably be unable to bring a large enough concentration against either antagonist to defeat it. In short, any choice had to be made with the knowledge that it might later prove to be the wrong one.

The announced decision to "beat Hitler first," whether wise or foolish, settled only the most fundamental of our military problems. In Europe we appear to have a definite military policy which is being steadily implemented by ever-increasing force, but in the Pacific the few steps we have taken give no sign of having behind them a well-thought-out strategy. "Hold the line and wait for the breaks" about sums up the situation.

The logical corollary to the decision to concentrate our force against Germany is the employment of enough strength in the Pacific to prevent Japan from organizing attempts at further conquests and to compel it to expend large amounts of material in holding its gains. That we have recently been able to keep it in check is due mainly to the fine quality of our men and material. Our raids have not been followed by positive action, and nine months have elapsed since we opened the Solomons campaign without our making a single further move. Meanwhile the Japanese have had plenty of time to perfect their defenses.

The position of MacArthur in Australia is one of especial futility. After his retirement from the Philippines he issued a press statement to the effect that he understood his removal was for the purpose of organizing a relief expedition to expel the invader from the islands which had played so large a part in his own and his father's life. Whether any communication from Washington justified this expectation is a question which we are naturally not in a position to answer.

Geography emphatically did not justify it. Without major bases in the north, adequate interior communications, or sufficient industrial resources to support a major offensive by itself, Australia, situated as it is at the end of fantastically long lines of communication and distant also from Japan itself, seems cut out to be a military backwater. It is strategically vital only to Australians, and the decision to dispatch major aid there rather than to China, whatever its sentimental justification, was highly unsound. The launching of a full-scale offensive from so unfavorable an initial position would require a far larger expenditure of war materials, especially of shipping, than is consistent with our declared purpose of beating Hitler first. While there may come a day when even the unfavorably situated Australian base can support a campaign which will ultimately reach Tokyo, no such attempt could be made at present without a disastrous revamping of our entire war strategy.

The facts of geography and the chosen strategy rather than any sinister plot are what confines MacArthur to nibbling at the fringes of the Japanese conquests. In this undramatic role he has performed brilliantly considering the limited forces at his disposal. His handling of air power in particular has done much to redeem our earlier sorry record in the Philippines. The substantial gains achieved under difficult circumstances are peculiarly MacArthur's, and they have justly earned him the reputation of being our ablest general. It is probably inevitable that so able and self-conscious a man should be disappointed at not being able to carry out his dream. But use of the anniversary of Bataan to express this chagrin was in questionable taste.

Far worse are the crocodile tears now being shed by certain portions of the American press over the alleged neglect of MacArthur and his plans. We are glibly told by some that the dispatch of 1,000 planes would enable him to carry his campaign to Tokyo itself. A more ridiculous misreading of the lessons of the Pacific war would be hard to imagine. Here as elsewhere, air, sea, and land branches are interdependent, and the winning of new territory depends on the harmonious working together of all three, not on solo performance by any one.

If we changed our whole future policy as some of the more lurid newspapers would have us do, we should be forced to abandon the plan of knocking out Hitler first just as the possibilities were beginning to shape up favorably, and turn to supplying the materials for a Pacific offensive. Our preliminary work in Europe would then be largely wasted. Furthermore, we should be substituting the views of one commander in a specific area, who may be "playing the old army game" of spreading scare stories to get more men and weapons, for those of a group of persons having a more detached position and more comprehensive knowledge of all factors involved in our global war. This would be sheer military lunacy. The very nature of military organization necessitates compliance all down the line with the decisions made at the top, and in this respect General MacArthur's position is no different from that of the newest buck private.

It is quite possible, of course, that the recent scare stories issuing from Australia but denied by the navy have already served a useful purpose. One of the essentials of our war in the Pacific is that we hold Japanese conquests within their present limits. In the island-studded seas above Australia this can be done most easily through air power. Our present aerial margin, based on enormously better pilots and planes, must not be allowed to lapse, and the reinforcement of our air squadrons, promised by Stimson, is about the cheapest type of military insurance available.

But conflicting statements by responsible officials are in themselves serious in a country supposedly united in the cause of total war. Not only do they tend to accentuate whatever inter-service squabbles exist at the moment, but they give the public a confused and distorted picture which is no aid to national morale.

The differences between the services shown in their public utterances also exist in the field of command, though the situation here has been greatly improved since the outbreak of war. The arbitrary line which separates the domain of Admiral Nimitz in the South Pacific from that of General MacArthur in Australia and which originally cut directly through Guadalcanal Island is no promoter of military efficiency. The generals and admirals in the area are said to have worked well together, but cooperation is a poor second choice compared with a unified command. This we have not yet achieved, though it would have lessened the difficulties encountered by the navy at Guadalcanal and by MacArthur in New Guinea.

For success in the Pacific war it is vitally necessary that our High Command abandon once and for all our present opportunism and adopt a definite policy on how to beat Japan. The early raids, the bombing of Tokyo, the surprise achieved in the Solomons were isolated gestures not followed by any later acts which would give them coherence and meaning. That many of our more recent battles against the Japanese have been well managed is hardly a point at issue. Unless various raids were undertaken merely to give our men experience in attacking—they also gave the Japanese valuable practice in defensive actions—their purpose has not become manifest.

As long as a "beat Japan now" campaign is impossible because of lack of materials and concentration of our energies in Europe, we have a choice of two basic policies. We can remain passively on the defensive, trusting in superior air power as France depended upon the Maginot Line to turn back an attack; or we can fight an active war by carrying out along the perimeter of Japan's conquests numerous small actions which, without imperiling our own main war effort, will compel the Japanese to risk their forces in defense of an area too widespread to be protected conveniently and allow them no period of rest in which to consolidate their gains. The main purpose of such a strategy is to inflict the largest possible losses on Japan while Hitler is being liquidated. The tragedy of our Pacific fighting has been that we have not consistently followed either of these possible lines of action. If we choose to run the enormous risks of defeat involved in an exclusively defensive policy, the occasional offensive gestures in which we have engaged are quite meaningless. If we decide to fight an active war, then such ventures as the Solomons campaign must be made part of a far-reaching war strategy, and we must be ready to follow up our advantages by taking further steps in a planned offensive. In any case our policy must be so well understood by the generals and admirals concerned that there is unity of thought and action among them.

Shopping in 1943

BY LOUIS WALINSKY and EDWARD SARD

CONSIDERING the dire warnings and forecasts of the last two years, the war hasn't hurt us very much as consumers so far. True, shortages have developed; rationing has been introduced; prices have risen considerably. On the other hand, money incomes, for the most part, have kept ahead of rising prices. And what is more important, 1941 and 1942 saw prevalent in the United States the highest living levels ever attained in this country. This seeming miracle, of course, is easily explained. The tremendous expansion of total production (gross national product rose from $88.6 billion in 1939 to $151.6 billion in 1942) was large enough to permit war expenditures to rise from $1.4 billion to $49.1 billion, and still permit a considerable increase in the total of civilian goods and services produced (from $61.7 billion in 1939 to $81.9 billion in 1942). It is this expansion which has made possible our well-being as consumers thus far. But 1942 marked the turning-point, and from now on the trend can be in only one direction—down. American consumers got 2 per cent less for the $81.9 billion they spent in 1942 than for the $74.6 billion they spent in 1941. In 1943, no matter how much American consumers spend, they will get 15 per cent less goods for their money than they got in 1942.

How is this figure arrived at? What does it mean? In what new consumption areas will shortages appear this year? What will consumers be able to buy for their decreasingly valuable dollars?

Let us consider first the over-all picture, especially as it shapes up in the foreground of the coming months. From present indications, 1943 civilian production will decline some 20 to 25 per cent from 1942 levels. This decline will not be evenly distributed, of course. Civilian food production will drop at least 12 per cent; other fields will see declines of more than 30 per cent. This does not mean, however, that civilians will be proportionately restricted in their consumption. We shall be able to draw upon fairly substantial inventories to cushion the drop in production. We dipped into those inventories to the tune of $2.5 billion in 1942, and there was still $14 billion worth left. Production, then, may drop 20 to 25 per cent; consumption need not drop much more than 15 per cent. The over-all picture, in fact, indicates 1943 civilian consumption levels almost equivalent to those of 1939. So far, so good.

But while the prospects with regard to our total consumption are not threatening, in specific consumption areas the picture is a very mixed one. The shortages which have already appeared, and the inconveniences incident to them, are but a prelude to others which lie ahead. An examination of the latest governmental studies in the field makes possible the following forecasts:

FOOD

Early in April fifteen writers resigned from the Office of War Information. The immediate cause was a report which the OWI issued on the 1943 civilian food situation. Their own report had been rejected as "too depressing." In return they charged that high officials in the agency preferred "slick salesmanship to honest information," and that these "promoters" had turned the Office of War Information into an "office of war ballyhoo."

This conflict in the OWI could not have arisen if the forecasts of the Department of Agriculture itself were not both tentative and optimistic. These forecasts are based on certain assumptions: that weather will be favorable, that labor will be available, that there will be no shortage of farm machinery, that farmers will plant in accordance with government food-production quotas. Once production is estimated, military and lend-lease demands, which are not always predictable, must be allowed for. Estimates of the civilian food supply, therefore, while they may occasionally have to be revised upward, are much more likely to need revision downward as the year goes by.

To some extent, that is what has been happening. Food-production goals, originally set 7 per cent higher than 1942 production levels, will not be met. The latest reports indicate an over-all increase of only 3 per cent. And whereas last year military and lend-lease demands took 12 per cent of our total food production, this year at least 25 per cent will have to be set aside to satisfy these demands. The OWI report said that civilian food supplies would drop only 6 per cent from last year's levels, but this figure must now be doubled. Nor can we be sure that this revision will be the last.

The figures that follow are subject to the hazards already mentioned and should be read with them in mind.

Meat, Fish, Poultry. The latest estimates indicate that meat supplies available for consumer purchase will decline 12 per cent in 1943, averaging less than two and one-half pounds weekly per person. This prediction is based on the assumptions previously stated, plus the additional assumption that meat rationing will eliminate the black market and permit the lifting of present orders which limit meat supplies for the first quarter of 1943 to 70 per cent of the supply available for civilian use in the same quarter of 1941. A weekly ration of two pounds per person would mean a decline in 1943 of almost 25 per cent. This is a possible figure.

Fish supplies declined 23 per cent in 1942 and will decline another 23 per cent this year. This statement covers all types—fresh, frozen, and canned. Canned fish, of course, will experience the greatest decline.

Poultry provides the relief in this picture. The 1942 supply reached a record annual figure of 22.8 pounds per capita. The supply for 1943 should exceed that by 20 per cent, rising to 28.4 pounds. Turkeys too will be more plentiful, with supplies estimated at 14 per cent above 1942 levels. And although the government will take from 25 to 30 per cent of all egg production, the average consumer will have to curtail his consumption very little—not more than from 317 eggs in 1942 to 306 eggs in 1943.

Dairy Products. The total amount of milk available will drop 9 per cent, butter at least 21 per cent, cheese 25 per cent, condensed and evaporated milk 18 per cent, ice cream 35 per cent, and dried skim milk 27 per cent. The amount of fluid milk and cream, however, will increase 7 per cent. Caution: a continued black market in meat, resulting in slaughter of dairy herds, would change this forecast considerably.

Fats and Oils. No shortage here is anticipated. The total supply, excluding butter, should be about the same as that of 1942. Margarine supplies will increase by 20 per cent.

Fruits. Total production will remain near record levels. Military demands will probably increase from 30 per cent of the total in 1942 to 50 per cent this year. A decline of 48 per cent in civilian supplies of canned fruits and of 24 per cent in canned juices must be anticipated. We may expect 20 per cent less citrus fruit and a small decline in apples.

Vegetables. All forecasts indicate significant declines this year, running in some cases as high as 35 per cent. Leafy, green, and yellow vegetables will drop 18 per cent, canned vegetables at least 20 per cent. A potentially huge Victory Garden output may well offset this decline.

Other Foods. The grains show every indication of holding up, with the exception of rice, in which a decline of 21 per cent must be expected. Cereals and cereal products will undoubtedly find a larger place in the average American's diet. Government demands for domestic sugar are still increasing, and a tight sugar situation for civilians is forecast, with available supplies some 22 per cent smaller than last year. Coffee supplies will decrease 29 per cent below 1942 levels, cocoa 18 per cent, and tea 60 per cent.

This brief summary is bound to have a sobering effect, but the situation is still not a grim one. Our dietary habits will have to change somewhat, but no one should starve. The prospect is for additional rationing, rather than relaxation of present rationing. Unfortunately, averages are deceptive. Food supplies may equal, or nearly equal, those of the 1935-39 period. But black markets, transportation difficulties, concentration of population in war-production centers, and regional price differentials will certainly cause maldistribution of what we have. If, in addition, unfavorable weather, labor shortages, scarcity of farm equipment, or the discouragement of farmers should bring about still further declines in production, the situation might truly become grim. Some farm authorities are already predicting a decline of 30 per cent in civilian food supplies in 1943.

HOW WE SPENT OUR MONEY IN 1942

DOLLARS PER CAPITA

 1939 EXPENDITURE

 DECREASE SINCE 1939

 INCREASE OVER 1939

GRAPHIC BY PICK-S

Americans haven't fared so badly these past two years. From now on we shall eat less, wear less, ride less, but even so we are not likely to run into real hardship this year. In 1941 and 1942 our standard of living reached its highest level. A 15 per cent drop is likely, which would put us back on the level of 1939. The drop will not, however, be distributed evenly among all goods and services. In some it will be less than 15 per cent, in others more.

CLOTHING

Shoes. Production for civilians in 1943 will decline to a maximum of 350,000,000 pairs—not quite three pairs per person. Quality also will decline, since the top five grades of sole leather are now reserved for the armed forces. Rubber will not be available for soles.

Textiles. Here the situation is very unclear. There is no great shortage of cotton goods, or even of wool, at the moment. But military demands are constantly increasing and may take as much as one-third of all our clothing production this year. There will be no silk or nylon available for civilian production. Quality standards will continue to deteriorate. Production of all articles of clothing using rubber will decrease sharply.

HOUSEHOLD EQUIPMENT

Most things in this category are durable goods made largely of metals. Their production has been either completely halted or drastically reduced.

Heating Equipment. Because this is an essential, production will be continued, but on a very small scale. The figures that follow give estimated 1943 production as a percentage of 1940 production: cooking stoves, 25 per cent; heating stoves, 35 per cent; hot-water heaters, 45 per cent; hot-water tanks, 64 per cent; oil burners, no production; fuel-oil tanks, 12 per cent; furnaces, 16 per cent; radiators, 10 per cent. The inference is plain. Take good care of such equipment if you are a home owner; it is precious and cannot easily be replaced.

Coal production will remain high, although increasing conversion from oil to coal may strain our supplies. Civilian fuel-oil supplies will fail by 30 per cent to meet demand. This indicates another cold winter. In spite of the construction of new pipe lines, fuel oil will certainly remain rationed.

Furniture, Furnishings, and Household Utensils. Shortages of lumber and other raw materials, plus the continued drain of man-power from these industries, indicate a continuation of the declines which set in last year. Consumer expenditures in this field amounted to $3 billion in 1939, $3.3 billion in 1940, $4 billion in 1941, but fell back to $3.3 in 1942. (These figures do not compensate for constantly increasing price levels.) In 1943 production will fall below 1939 levels. Furniture production will be 75 per cent of 1940 production, and there is considerable inventory on hand; cooking utensils, only 10 per cent, with considerable inventory; electrical appliances, 2 per cent, with negligible inventory; incandescent bulbs, 75 per cent, insufficient inventory; radio tubes, 28 per cent, negligible inventory; flashlight-battery cells, 25 per cent, small inventory.

Production of the following items has been completely stopped: mechanical refrigerators, washing machines, vacuum cleaners, sewing machines, portable electric lamps and shades, radio receiving sets, and phonographs. Inventories of these items are either non-existent or very small. The prospect of rationing for some or all of these articles is by no means excluded.

SELECTED PERSONAL ITEMS

Tobacco, wines, and liquors will remain abundant, though declining from 1942's record levels. The same is true for cosmetics, most toilet articles, beauty aids, and medical supplies. Items utilizing rubber will, of course, tend to disappear; but the development of plastics and other substitutes will prevent a serious decline in the consumption of such articles.

Personal items requiring the use of metal will be increasingly hard to buy. No safety razors will be made in 1943, and the inventory on hand is dangerously small. Razor-blade production, however, will remain at 86 per cent of the 1940 level, with a good inventory to supplement it. A shortage of hairpins and bobby pins will trouble the ladies. Production will decline 75 per cent from 1942 levels, and there is little inventory on hand. Baby-carriage manufacture will hold up fairly well, but most of the metal has been eliminated.

No watches will be made in 1943, although alarm clocks, previously eliminated, will be back to some extent. Portable-typewriter production will be nil, and safety pins will decline to 50 per cent of the 1941 figure.

TRANSPORTATION

Gasoline will remain scarce, but some relief is in sight for car owners in the shape of more tires. Tire supplies for 1942 were but 10 per cent of those for 1941, but the new Victory tire, production of which was halted at the end of March, will soon begin to reach the market in large quantities. Qualified motorists will become eligible for top-grade tires next week.

Railroad travel will become increasingly difficult. Rolling stock is being utilized to its fullest capacity now; deterioration is becoming rapid; and little replacement is in prospect. As industrial production increases and a larger army gets on the move, civilians must experience greater difficulty in securing either freight or passenger accommodation. Travel priorities have already been instituted. They may be extended.

SERVICES

We all depend for our well-being upon various service and professional occupations. Laundry, domestic service, shoe repair, barber and beauty service, medical and dental aid, and the like provide a large avenue for consumer expenditures. Forecasts here must be very tentative. Yet it is clear that the draft, the high wages prevalent in war industry, fuel shortages, and other factors will make increasing inroads upon our consumption of these services. It is already almost impossible to get full-time domestic help. Laundries may have to curtail their services very seriously because of man-power and fuel shortages. The demands of the armed forces will continue markedly to reduce the number of doctors and dentists serving the public.

A few additional factors which might throw this entire set of forecasts out of gear should be pointed out. First, the opening of new fronts, the occupation of new territories, and our responsibilities to the people in them will make increasing and unpredictable demands upon civilian supplies. At the same time domestic supplies may be supplemented by "back hauls," such as cork, manganese, horsehides, sheep and lamb skins from North Africa. Secondly, a great deal will depend on how well our transportation system stands up under the increased strains to which it must be subjected in the latter part of this year. Thirdly, and most important, there remains the inflationary danger: 81.9 billion of consumer dollars bought in 1942 only as much as $69.7 billion would have bought in 1939. This year, in spite of reduced supplies, consumers, unless checked by radical tax increases and forced savings, will have even more billions to spend. In the face of this inflationary pressure, shall we be able to "hold the line"? As the total of goods and services available to consumers declines, it is vital to health, productive efficiency, and morale that they be more fairly shared. But rising prices will make it impossible for millions of families to subsist on anything better than a semi-starvation level. Higher prices, rather than shortages, constitute the greatest threat to consumers in 1943 and afterward.

Waste on the Ways

BY SELDEN MENEFEE

LAST year the nation's shipyards reached their goal of eight million tons of merchant ships. This year they must build eighteen million tons to keep pace with our war program. For the tanks, fighter planes, guns, and shells produced in this arsenal of democracy are useless unless they can be transported to the fronts.

In March the industry produced 146 ships aggregating 1,516,000 tons. This record will have to be beaten in coming months if the 1943 quota is to be attained. But there is danger that the rate of production cannot even be kept up, much less increased, and for two reasons—inefficient utilization of the existing labor supply and low employee morale. The two are closely related.

I talked to dozens of shipyard workers and technicians early this year, mainly on the West Coast, and almost all felt frustrated and angered by the ignorance or indifference of their foremen and supervisors. They resented the waste of man-power and material, and even more they resented the attacks on the workers' patriotism heard so often during the recent hysteria over "absenteeism." They felt that absenteeism was used by the owners as an excuse for their own shortcomings.

Absenteeism in the shipyards has been a serious problem, and I do not attempt to minimize it. The loss of 16,700,000 man-hours in December alone produced a dangerous situation. The fact that shipyard absenteeism ran around 18 per cent in the First World War is beside the point; even the present 6 to 12 per cent is too high.

Portland, Oregon, has shown how the problem can be tackled sanely. Early this year a committee was set up to study the causes of absenteeism. On it were representatives of the unions, employers, government agencies, and the public. The committee found that the rate of absenteeism varied greatly from yard to yard in the Portland area, ranging from 3 to 17 per cent in one week in February. Since the yards employed, by and large, the same sort of workers, this spread indicated that conditions outside the workers' control were important factors. The committee concluded that too little attention had been paid to unreported sickness, often due to inadequate housing and lack of community facilities; bad transportation, causing workers to arrive at the job so late that they were denied admittance; the need to shop, go to the bank, or conduct other personal business which could only be attended to during working hours; and, finally, dissatisfaction with the job and the management.

As a result of this investigation a campaign was launched against the conditions that kept people from work. New housing was made available; stores and banks were induced to stay open nights; and perhaps most important of all, the committee recommended that the industry eliminate favoritism and nepotism in the selection of supervisors and introduce other managerial reforms. The employer representatives on the committee agreed to this program. The upshot was that absenteeism, which ran from 12 to 20 per cent in December, dropped to between 5 and 10 per cent at the end of March in Portland yards. Improved weather conditions accounted for part of this improvement, but community effort unquestionably played an important role.

Recent press reports have given belated attention to a more basic problem in the shipyards—high labor turnover. According to Admiral Emory S. Land, chairman of the Maritime Commission, at least 650,000 workers must be added in 1943 to the 1,500,000 working in shipyards at the turn of the year. In April the Maritime Commission announced that the shipbuilding industry was losing men so rapidly as to imperil the whole program. In the first quarter of the year the turnover rate reached 11.2 per cent a month. Some 200,000 workers left the yards, and the industry suffered a deficit of 70,000 men in this period.

Labor turnover is especially high in Pacific Coast yards, which are building slightly more than half of our new ships. One Seattle yard had to hire 25,000 workers during a six months' period to achieve a net gain of 3,000 workers. Another hired 9,000 to gain 2,000. A careful analysis of the reasons for this turnover revealed the draft to be only a minor cause; inconvenient living facilities and general dissatisfaction with conditions in the yards were far more important.

In the San Francisco Bay area workers recruited for Kaiser often appear at the public housing offices and say, "Here I am; where's my house?" Discovering that no house is available, they start to hunt for one. A few get into a defense housing project, but more wind up in flop houses, furnished rooms, or trailers, often far away from the yards. Most of these workers last only a few weeks and then go home in disgust. Since few of those who stay can send for their families, they seek amusement in the beer parlors of Vallejo, Richmond, and other Bay towns. The consequent hangovers, plus disillusionment with the total situation, keep them away from the job or lead them to throw it up.

The federal government is largely responsible for the slowness in developing housing in some areas. Kaiser and the Maritime Commission have shown what is possible by the construction in a few months of the 10,000-unit "Vanport" project at Portland.

According to the workers themselves, there is no shortage of man-power; most of them complain, rather, that they are unable to put in more than four hours of good, solid work on an eight-hour shift. A Seattle electrician said to me, "It was bad enough to work under a foreman who had never seen a ship until a few months ago. But it was worse to have to waste time on the job day after day because the work hadn't been laid out right. On the day before Thanksgiving the foreman told me, 'Your crew will work tomorrow. There's a war on, you know.' I said, 'I'm not working tomorrow for you or anyone else. You know damned well we've had practically nothing to do for days and there's no rush of work tomorrow.'" This man was "absent without excuse" for several days while he contributed to the turnover rate by seeking and obtaining a job in another yard.

Symptomatic of the situation in the yards are the "funny" stories told up and down the Pacific Coast by shipyard workers. There is the tale of the man who was ordered by a foreman to carry a piece of wooden staging back and forth across the yard. After a few days he noticed that a man was following him. He told the foreman he wanted to quit because he was afraid a government inspector was shadowing him and had discovered his lack of work. The foreman laughed and said, "Don't mind him—he's only your helper."

There are dozens of similar stories perhaps better founded in fact. The man whose son was among those missing on Bataan and who gave up his own business to come to work in the Kaiser shipyard at Vancouver is an actual case. After six weeks he "asked for his time," explaining to his fellow-employees with tears in his eyes that he couldn't stand any longer to be told to walk around the yard carrying a wrench, and to be bawled out when he asked for useful work.

Kaiser's Richmond, California, yard has an especially good record on the Coast largely because it has used the services of qualified marine engineers. The same is true of Kaiser's Oregon Shipyard at Portland. But in other West Coast plants, including at least one of Kaiser's, bad management is a very common complaint.

Shipyard inefficiency can be attributed in part to simple growing pains. No industry can mushroom from near zero to 102,000 workers (in the Portland area) or to 165,000 (around San Francisco Bay) without some dislocation. Furthermore, mass-production methods are still in the experimental stage in shipbuilding. In some yards the problems are gradually working themselves out. Kaiser's Oregon Shipyard has doubled its production—from nine Liberty ships last July to eighteen in March—while taking a net loss of 4,000 workers.

Faulty allocation of materials to the shipyards has held up production in some instances. The yards get their materials through the four regional construction offices of the Maritime Commission—in Philadelphia, Chicago, New Orleans, and Oakland—over which there is little or no central control. According to one operator this has resulted in a piling up in some yards of parts which are greatly needed in others. Furthermore, the Washington staff of the Maritime Commission, from Rear Admiral Howard L. Vickery down, is made up of people with little or no experience in ship construction, and in consequence the program has lacked expert central planning.

Management, however, must bear the major responsibility for the waste of man-power and materials. Under the cost-plus system the operators have no particular incentive to keep costs down. Poor supervision is therefore tolerated. In many yards labor, skilled and unskilled, has been "hoarded" against possible future needs, with a disastrous effect on employee morale.

Under present conditions yards working on navy contracts must use the cost-plus system because of the frequent changes in specifications. But companies building cargo ships are in a different category. Though the operators vociferously deny it, their employees insist that cost-plus contracts and labor hoarding go together. As proof, they cite the case of one California yard which, when it shifted from cost-plus work to building oil tankers on a contract basis, immediately fired 2,500 of its 20,000 hands, offering the lame excuse that it had been planning to weed out "inefficient workers" for some time.

A final contributing factor in inefficiency is the failure of some shipyard unions to go all out for war. On the West Coast the A. F. of L. boilermakers' union has become chiefly a dues-collecting agency; its members have no real sense of participation in its affairs. The boilermakers got a closed-shop contract in Portland when the yards employed only about 200 workers; since then 100,000 men have been added to the rolls. Yet when the C. I. O. shipworkers' union recently asked for an NLRB election in Kaiser's Portland yards, Tom Ray, business agent for the boilermakers, asserted that such a move would "create disaster" and damage the war effort. The C. I. O. petition has now been granted, and if an election is held, the A. F. of L. will probably be defeated, since most shipyard workers resent its large fees and high-handed policies.

The high wage standards in the industry set by the unions are good for employee morale. On the other hand, the boilermakers' refusal to accept Negroes into full membership has dampened the enthusiasm of colored workers, who are not allowed to rise above the status of helpers. Both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions have been guilty of craft-union practices which should be modified in the interest of war-time efficiency. One Wilmington, Delaware, shipfitter told me that his crew was often idle for two hours at a time, waiting for the rigging crew to do a minor job. He could do the job himself in five minutes, he said, but if he touched anything in the rigging line the riggers would walk out.

To sum up: to obtain the speedier ship construction which is vital for the war effort the following steps are clearly indicated:

1. Government agencies should quickly provide more community facilities near the yards—not only housing and transportation, but also facilities for recreation, shopping, rationing, banking, and the care of children. With this being done, the yards should intensify the recruiting of women workers, who will eventually have to take over most of the lighter jobs.

2. Government control over shipbuilding should be placed in the hands of an expert in ship construction. Someone should be made responsible for bringing order into shipbuilding. Inspections should be more frequent and more painstaking to prevent wastage of labor and materials.

3. Cost-plus contracts should be done away with wherever possible. Where this is not possible, the contracts should contain a penalty clause providing that the operators' profits will be lowered as construction costs rise.

4. Labor should participate more whole-heartedly in employee-management plans, adopt more democratic methods within the unions, and abandon craft-union disputes for the duration.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE BROWN SHIRTS constitute the newest and most serious menace to the peace of Europe, particularly since the German people are now completely insulated against learning the truth, not only about their own land, but concerning public opinion abroad. . . . Hitler, Goebbels, and Göring are again training the German nation as an army for "the day."—May 3, 1933.

TO THE EDITORS of The Nation: I am amazed at the stand you are taking toward the new German government. . . . For twenty years I have read The Nation and I have admired it for its decency and fairness, but you can consider my relation with it ended when my subscription has run out.—THEODORE J. SCHERZ, May 3, 1933.

VERY SOON Adolf Hitler will emerge as a bulwark of European equilibrium, a bellicose leader for peace, a pet child of international capitalism, and a staunch defender of Western civilization against the Soviets.—OSCAR JASZI, May 17, 1933.

TO THE EDITORS of The Nation: Your misconception of contemporary affairs is astonishing. Through the Hitler party a new German nation, a young Germany, has been born. . . . Please cancel my subscription.—C. BARCK, May 24, 1933.

PEARL BUCK has quietly resigned from the missionary service of the Presbyterian Church. By so doing she has deprived us of the entertaining spectacle which a heresy trial would certainly have provided. . . . By now she is again en route to China, no longer as a missionary. . . . Probably she feels that a place where "the heathen rage" is preferable to one where the theologians rant.—May 17, 1933.

UNEMPLOYMENT is the overshadowing fact in our economic crisis. Approximately one-third of our wage-earning population is jobless. Moreover, thousands technically employed receive no pay. . . . Except for the emergency bank legislation of the first days of March, all else is of secondary importance to reemploying our citizenry. A five-billion-dollar public-construction program is imperative.—May 17, 1933.

THE UTTER CALLOUSNESS with which the average public official views crime in high places was reflected by the testimony of John W. Pole, former Comptroller of the Currency, before the Senate committee investigating the Harriman bank fraud. Explaining that the Harriman case was only a "routine affair," Pole said that "defalcations are common matters in the Comptroller's office, you know." When Senator Robinson of Indiana asked him if defalcations by bank presidents were common, Pole calmly replied, "Yes," as if it were a matter of no importance whatever.—May 24, 1933.

BY A STRANGE COINCIDENCE, at dawn of the day when Hitler was having Germany purged of everything Marxist, modern, and Jewish in its literature, the Rivera murals at Radio City were nailed into what may turn out to be a coffin.—May 24, 1933.

London in the Spring

BY IDA TREAT

London, April 5

IN THE sun this morning I discovered that London has a color—and that the color is red. Paris would be gray under any sun: stone-gray that pales out at mid-day and takes on a greenish tinge in the fading light. London's brick needs mornings like this to come alive. Through the film of varnish that coats the window panes—a guaranty against flying glass which I first mistook for grime—I looked out on a city like a reflected sunrise.

Leaning out through the round window that looks across the roofs of Mayfair, I hunted in vain for yesterday's ruins. Down in the mews brick walls—Victorian rather than Georgian—ran trim and parallel without a break. Across the street the paper strips pasted on unshattered panes might have passed for a wooden lattice. The glass of our own house is intact. "Not a pane cracked during all the blitz," our porter says and is proud of the fact. It could not be said of many houses in the neighborhood. L—, whose flat I share, declares she never will forget the edgy, scrappy, tinkly sound of glass being swept up in the street. She heard it every morning while the blitz was on.

Today, Monday, is ration day. Our grocer must get up early on Monday mornings. When I call at nine, my week's rations are ready on the counter, one little pile among many: butter, margarine, lard, bacon, cheese. He has only to cut the coupons and take in the money. "Marketing" in these days of ration books is little more than a figure of speech. The only thrill comes at the first of the month when with twenty virgin points I feel as rich and excited as a child with a Christmas dollar. Last month I lost my head and squandered the whole twenty on prunes—prunes having appeared, though not for long, on the grocer's shelves. This time I was more circumspect: one tin of American pears, twelve points; one tin of third-grade salmon, four; which left me four to spare on things like breakfast-food at three points the package, or rice at one point the pound.

Today the green-grocer made it clear that he has accepted me as a regular customer. From a basket covered with burlap he produced one pound of apples and another pound of rhubarb stalks. I put them in the bottom of my bag—feelings divided between sneaking pride at being singled out for preference and shame at taking things of which there is not enough for everyone.

As I walked home with my bag of vegetables, half my brain was busy with the query: would melted margarine make a good substitute for salad oil? while the other half kept nagging me to see about my gas mask—just in case Hitler should think up another nasty trick to celebrate the spring. The mask I own is too tight; I can breathe in, but not out—it swells up like a balloon and chokes me.

The first noisy alert London had known for months was timed almost to a day with my arrival. That evening when the sirens started I went down to the hotel lounge, where guests sat unperturbed over their coffee, no one making any comment beyond, "Well, this sounds like old times." I joined two American Red Cross workers, newcomers like myself, and we sat and smoked while the guns racketed outside and a frail-looking woman in a tin hat drifted in and out through the swinging doors from the hall to the street, where falling shrapnel tinkled on the pavement like rain. We flattered ourselves we looked like the others—old hands at that sort of thing—until someone remarked kindly, "If you feel nervous, you can always go down into the Tube."

During one of the next alerts I investigated the Tube. Many of the three-tiered bunks were full of working folk who wanted a night's sleep out of sound of the guns, and mothers with young children. There was also a sprinkling of fur-coated ladies who said the blitz had done something to their nerves. One woman with shaky, cigarette-stained fingers complained that the blitz had forced her to sleep "alongside people covered with vermin." "It's the fault of the politicians," she said mysteriously. "This is what the politicians have brought us to." She stands out as the one jittery Londoner I have met so far.

The average Londoner's reaction to the type of alerts we have been getting seems to be like L—'s. She spent the noisiest alert of the series dictating to her secretary. Only once she stopped—when a thundering crash drowned out her voice—and then only long enough to remark, "That sounds like a bomb." The secretary looked sidewise from her typing, and without missing a letter, "No, Madam, it couldn't be. There wasn't any jar."

This afternoon, with the spring air drifting through the jointed panes of my round window, London basked in the sun like a peace-time city. In the warm sky the barrage balloons flew low; bulbous creatures with wide-spread ears and blunted snout dipped earthward, grotesque in the soft spring light as the thought of war.

The pianist in the next room limbered her fingers with staccato scales that pursued me down the elevator shaft like showers of cool pebbles. The porter stood sunning himself on the well-scrubbed steps. "Fine afternoon for ■ walk, Madam." His son is overseas with the forces; his own decorations date from the last war. On his coat lapel he wears an A. R. P. button.

Over in Hyde Park the new grass had the sharp acid green of winter wheat. Crocuses and daffodils were pricking up under the trees, and gulls flocked like pigeons along the rim of the Serpentine. Spaniels and Scotties whisked over the lawns—the well-behaved London dogs that need no leash and come to heel at a whistle. Along the path Londoners strolled and sat. All the benches and iron chairs held occupants.

I stopped to watch a Land Army girl—sturdy legs in woollen socks and stout boots—spading a plot of one of the Ministry of Agriculture's model gardens. The flat prongs of her fork bit deep in the compact soil: a wrench, ■ heave, a swing, then the fork dug down again. She had ■ nice rhythm of back and arms—no peasant woman could have done better.

On the green across the path American soldiers were playing baseball, while a fringe of interested Britishers looked on, silently respectful of a sport not their own. On the sidelines a pitcher and his catcher practiced, serious and absorbed—and a London papa gave his young son (who wanted to know: "Why does the chap lift his leg when he throws the ball?") ■ highly technical explanation about levers and catapults.

Farther on men in green fatigue uniforms were doing what I took to be setting-up exercises slowed down to a spring tempo. From a distance it looked like a slow-motion ballet—a war ballet, with anti-aircraft batteries poking up above earthworks on the back drop and ■ machine-gun trained on the audience in the foreground.

Away off in the distance something jarred. The air quivered—it was more a sensation than a sound. A faraway siren cleared its throat and burst into thin wailing. A second spoke, ■ third. They were all at it, filling the sky with their clamor.

The baseball game broke off. The pitcher's arm dropped to his side; the catcher got up from his heels. The ballet stiffened to attention. Scuff, scuff—the ballet and ball team were soldiers marching. The sirens wailed out. On the path Londoners still strolled. The Land Army girl went on spading her garden. Buses and taxis streamed along Park Lane. I slowed down my pace, suddenly aware I was the only one in the street walking fast. Wardens stood here and there in doorways, alert and watchful. Two soldiers came out from an American canteen with cartons of cigarettes under their arms. They squinted up at the sky and set off down the street.

"A nice walk, Madam?" inquired the porter from the doorway. Then in the hearty paternal tone of the shelter warden, he added: "It won't be anything this time. No guns. We'll soon hear the all-clear."

Above stairs the pianist was still at her scales. L—called to me from the kitchen, "Back so soon?"

"I thought I'd better come in," I said.

"Oh, the alert? That's so, I did think I heard something, but I wasn't sure."

Under my window the brick and tile of Mayfair glowed sootily in the sun like ■ fire of Cardiff coal. The barrage balloons were flying high. Winged mammoths no longer—they looked like tiny silver fish up there, nibbling the clouds.

In the Wind

THE KU KLUX KLAN in the highly industrialized state of Florida is circulating a leaflet of quotations from Rickenbacker's speech. After the quotations the leaflet adds, "Are You on the Job? The Ku Klux Klan is Watching!"

THE OPENING of the movie "Mission to Moscow" on April 29 was preceded by an unusually large advance guard of rumors. First it was said that the movie would be postponed because of the hostile tone of pre-release press comment, and that Warner Brothers' top publicity man was in New York "buttering up" the reviewers; a current rumor is that the film was shown to the diplomatic corps in Washington and cut so as not to offend any country—fascist, communist, or democratic.

RIGORS OF WAR: Recent advertisements in the New York Times offer an ashtray for $14 and ■ ring-and-pin set, "the pin ■ buttercup of gold holding in its gold cage center a treasure of aquamarines. On them, as if attracted by their blue beauty and brilliance, a baby butterfly of rubies and a diamond. The pin, $235; the matching ring, $320."

IN HATTIESBURG, MISSISSIPPI, the federal government is trying five men on lynching charges. A committee of prominent citizens has been formed to raise a defense fund. Contributions may be sent to two bankers or to the mayor of one of the communities in the area.

FESTUNG EUROPA: In July, 1940, there were 484,000 radios in Norway. There are now 7,100, all owned by Quisling party members and Nazi officials. . . . Because he refused to surrender his seat on ■ street car to a Nazi officer, ■ Norwegian worker has been sentenced to two years in prison; fourteen passengers who testified that the officer had behaved in ■ brutal and offensive manner were each sentenced to one month in prison. . . . In 1939 and 1940 Germany's birth rate was 20.4 per thousand; in 1941 it was 18.8, and in 1942 it dropped to 15.2. . . . A large number of German workers in Halle have been jailed for mingling with French workers in the same factory. Two women who introduced French workers to their friends have been sentenced to six years at hard labor.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Europe Against Hitler

I. HOW STRONG IS THE UNDERGROUND?

BY JOHN W. GERBER AND ALFRED KANTOROWICZ

A GREAT historical irony is overtaking Hitler. He planned to rule Europe by dividing it, by playing age-old antagonisms one against the other, by creating new ones as he went along. He planned, ultimately, to create a world of subservient peoples, united under a black cross of terror. He has succeeded in creating a different kind of unity—a unity of the peoples against himself, a unity of resistance to Nazi domination.

But as days pass and the United Nations open no campaign in Western Europe, that resistance grows weaker. Men who might have led an anti-Nazi uprising have been imprisoned or killed. The masses are now so ill-fed that they scarcely have the strength to participate in uprisings. At least four million of the ablest members of Europe's potential army of resistance have been deported to Germany for forced labor, in addition to the three million prisoners of war. And Dr. Goebbels's propaganda machine never rests; it is continually hammering in the fact that nothing can be expected from the United Nations.

Nazi methods of suppression, however, have still not touched the core of opposition. It is our purpose to appraise the people's capacity to resist in each country of Europe and to determine, roughly, the amount of aid the United Nations can expect when they launch their attack upon Hitler's Fortress. But the attack must come quickly—or our conclusions will have been invalidated.

The two chief forms that resistance now takes are underground work and guerrilla warfare. The experienced underground leader is most useful when teaching factory workers to wreck valuable machines by throwing sand or salt into their bearings or to produce shells that won't go off, or when showing peasants the best ways of hiding their food from the Nazis, or when influencing officials to sabotage Nazi orders or teachers to indoctrinate children with the ideal of liberty and the determination to achieve it. Haphazard assassinations and bombings have little place in efficient underground work. They lead to too costly reprisals.

Guerrilla warfare—another thing entirely—is one kind of open war. It is effective in countries where forests are thick, communications bad, and mountains impenetrable—countries such as Slovakia, Yugoslavia, parts of Poland and Russia. It is carried on by small groups of men with such good liaison that a force of 50 or 60, or even of 500 or 600, can be brought together at short notice. The task of such a force is to infiltrate to the rear of the Nazis and perform some act—like blowing up a railway junction or highway bridge—which will make the local occupation commander feel so insecure that he will disperse his forces to guard against a similar attack somewhere else. The guerrillas can then deal with the separate troop units individually. A guerrilla force never makes a frontal assault; it avoids a pitched battle; and when the Nazis make things too hot, it evaporates into the little groups out of which it grew. When the invasion comes, the guerrillas will mobilize their maximum strength to aid the armies of liberation. For the present, they try to inflict as much damage as possible while conserving their manpower for the decisive battle.

The countries in which resistance is expressed by underground work are in the main those subject to Western, that is Anglo-American, influence—Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, and Greece. The countries where guerrilla warfare is waged are generally those under Eastern, or Russian, influence, an influence not due to a political philosophy but rather to geography and common Slavic characteristics. A third group, the Germans and their willing and unwilling satellites, must be considered separately.

When the Nazis occupied the Western countries they tried in every case to establish a Quisling government which would give the decrees of the conquerors the appearance of legality and to win the inhabitants to the Nazi cause by persuasion. They failed in this purpose partly because of the strong democratic ideals and national pride of the peoples, partly because the requirements of the ever-expanding Nazi war machine imposed hardships which aroused discontent and hatred.

The first requirement was food, for the army and for the German people. It was made clear by General Göring that whatever the consequences to the occupied countries the Germans would be the last to feel the pinch. Dr. Ley, the German Labor Minister, put it another way: "A lower race needs less room, less clothing, less food, and less culture than a higher race." Since no country in Europe was completely self-sufficient—although France came close to it—shortages made themselves felt almost immediately. The most acute was in meat and fats, lack of which is well-nigh disastrous during a cold winter. The Germans instituted rigid rationing, but more often than not even the slim official rations have not been available. The food crisis has been aggravated by widespread black markets, from which the Germans are usually the biggest profiteers. On the Belgian black market, for instance, butter costs $6 a pound, flour ("practically white"), $1.70 a pound, a bar of soap $2.

There can be no doubt that the resulting physical deterioration has weakened both the will and the ability to resist. Prince Karl of Sweden, head of the Swedish Red Cross, recently reported an alarming increase of sickness and epidemics in Norway, and other sources tell of the prevalence of intestinal and skin diseases. In France, Belgium, and Holland the ration's caloric content is as much as 60 per cent below the minimum-subsistence standard of 2,500 calories a day established by the League of Nations. In Greece the official ration is one-tenth of the minimum-subsistence standard.

The workers sent to Germany for slave labor are invariably those who are physically most fit, and their deportation has weakened the forces of resistance; the more so since in many cases they are members of trade unions, around which underground work is organized. The Belgians, Dutch, and French have been hit particularly hard in this way. Three hundred thousand of Belgium's million and a half industrial workers have been deported.

No country has escaped German reprisal killings. Scarcely a day goes by that the Nazis themselves do not announce the execution of one or more "saboteurs," "Communists," or "Jews." More terrible is the killing of hostages. During the last three months of 1941, 250 French hostages were executed. Since staunch anti-Nazis die in every mass execution, organized resistance is continually losing its leading spirits.

Such, in brief, are the factors everywhere militating against resistance. In addition, conditions peculiar to the various countries make the efforts of the underground worker more productive in some than in others.

France is the only great power under complete Nazi domination, and except for the unique Danish experiment it is the only occupied country whose pre-war government has not gone into exile. Although the French people are actually ruled by the Nazis, the Pétain government was put into power by the Nazis, a smoothly executed maneuver that the majority of the people were persuaded they were ruled by their own legally constituted govern-

Inside Hitler's Fortress

Drawing by Hoffmeister

ment. The Germans did everything possible to encourage that belief, and the treacherous propaganda put out by the Pétain government increased the general confusion of mind. To a great extent the French people now appear to be disillusioned with the Vichy government, particularly with Pierre Laval, but the fact of its existence and the divided loyalties it has created add greatly to the difficulties of the underground worker. His activities must be considered revolutionary, since in seeking to overthrow the Nazis he is undermining Vichy.

If the contest for power between De Gaulle and Giraud has not increased further the confusion in France, it is not the fault of Vichy and German propaganda. André Philip, the French Socialist leader, claims that five-sixths of the population back General de Gaulle.

Belgium was demoralized by the completeness of the German victory and the surrender of King Leopold, who has been portrayed by German propaganda as giving at least tacit approval to the occupation. According to all reports, conditions are more difficult here than anywhere else in Western Europe, and there is little hope that Belgians will have the strength to mobilize any considerable assistance for the United Nations.

The Netherlands undoubtedly has closer liaison with London than any other country. The tortuous Dutch coastline is impossible to patrol, and the British regularly receive information about activities in Holland. The story has been told that when the Nazis were building a submarine in a Dutch port, the R. A. F. made several raids on the shipyard but never scored a hit on the submarine. On the day it was completed, however, the R. A. F. appeared and demolished it.

Norway appears to be tightly united against the invader. Before the war a large proportion of the population belonged to trade unions, employer associations, consumer cooperatives, and sport clubs. The Nazis at first tried to woo those organizations with gentleness. When they failed they obtained control of them by trickery and force, but they found then they had the façade but not the membership. The Norwegians still appear to have the chief requisite of effective resistance—organization. This advantage, however, is to some extent offset by the Nazi grip on food distribution and communications. In the country, where there is still adequate food, houses are so far apart that coordinated action is next to impossible. In the cities, where men might act in concert, there is insufficient food to sustain their energies.

There are at least two guerrilla groups fighting in Norway. The Moscow radio frequently reports the activities of a unit in the Far North headed by a man named Larson and said to consist of four or five hundred men. The Germans have recently expressed alarm about another group, said to number more than a thousand, on the Hardangar Vidda plateau.

The Nazis have always pointed to Denmark as the example of a democratic country which, because it "cooperated," was able to live in peace, without interference in its internal affairs from Germany. But although the Danes are still relatively well fed and well treated by the Nazis, there are indications that the honeymoon is ending. Using what freedom they have left, Danish workers have organized one strike after another in factories working for the Nazi war machine. When such tactics are ineffective, they turn to underground work. Major General Hermann von Hanneken, commander of the occupation forces, recently threatened to institute death penalties, round-ups of hostages, and communal fines unless sabotage and patriotic demonstrations ceased.

The spirit of Greece has not been broken by hunger, though a great part of the Greek nation will starve to death unless help arrives soon. After the military defeat by a tenfold superior enemy, the people developed a tremendous pride in their army's heroic resistance and a deep consciousness of what a small nation can achieve through sheer determination. Much of the terrain of Greece is adapted to guerrilla warfare, and a number of guerrilla groups are active. A Turkish paper recently compared—doubtless over-optimistically—the achievements of a group led by a certain General Mantakas with those of General Mihailovich.

Only in France have the Nazis been able to bring to heel any considerable number of intellectuals. Nowhere have they been able to get teachers to include a serious study of National Socialism in their curriculums, though hundreds of teachers in every country have been sent to concentration camps. Because the Nazis pretend to be the defenders of Christian culture, it is more difficult for them to take open measures against clergymen, but they have not shrunk from arresting some of the less prominent. In the Netherlands, particularly, the church is becoming a rallying-point for anti-Nazis, and the fight of Norway's Bishop Bergaav is well known.

Passive resistance among the workers and peasants cannot, of course, be so easily detected. But the fact that, according to all reports, country districts are better fed than cities indicates that the peasants are becoming increasingly skilful at withholding food from the Nazis. And from British sources comes word that the slow-down campaign in factories has reached such proportions that in Belgium, for instance, industrial production has fallen off 30 per cent despite longer working hours.

Scattered news items reveal the general temper of the people of occupied Europe. A Nazi officer is shot in Rouen. A freight train bound for Germany is blown up at Albert. A clothing factory in Schaerbeek, Belgium, is damaged at night by three unidentified men. Four Nazi guards are wounded in the bombing of several German garages. In Denmark seventeen strikes have been reported since January 1. In Greece two German guards are killed when an ammunition storehouse in Salonika is blown up. Four Dutch Quislings are shot in one week.

When we engage the occupation forces on the European continent the people will want to help us, and certainly they will try. But they are too unorganized and too undernourished to be of any great assistance. We may count on small groups to take an airfield or a headquarters behind the enemy lines while we make a frontal assault, but we cannot expect much else from them.

[This is the first of a series of three articles. The second, to appear next week, will deal with guerrilla resistance in Central Europe.]

Wallace in Chile

BY MANUEL SEOANE

Santiago, Chile, April 10

THE Vice-President's visit was a great event for Chileans—not only for the well-informed minority which is familiar with the personality of Henry Wallace but for the millions who saw in him the second highest official of the richest and most powerful country on earth. They were pleasantly surprised to see him alight from his plane, simply dressed, his hair in disorder, smiling, and announcing that he wanted to visit the houses of workers and to find out about the life of the poorest peasants on Chilean farms.

For the first time a prominent North American was among them, speaking a language of humanity and sincerity. His words were in strange contrast to the florid eloquence of Latin Americans. During his whole stay in Chile he delivered seven speeches, totaling 882 words. But he made every word count. Before the Parliament of Chile he said, in Spanish:

The people continue their thousand-year march, a revolutionary march in the purest sense, whose aim is to affirm, here on earth, the dignity of the human spirit. This march must go on until mankind is free from the oppression of hunger.

A few days later, speaking before hundreds of workers in the coal-mining district of Lota, he said:

Therefore, and even if some people go on talking about the American Century, I insist that we are entering the Century of the Common Man. And I say that there is no place in that century for any nation which, under any pretext, considers itself rightfully able to dominate or exploit any other nation. The old nations, the stronger nations, may have the privilege of helping the youngest ones to develop their economic resources, but not under the shadow of economic or military imperialism.

Some people knew that Wallace had already expressed those ideas in his own country. But it was different to hear them directly from him. Looking at him, the miners

Drawing by Romero

Courtesy of Mundo Libre

did not feel that they were listening to an expression of diplomacy or politics. Those straightforward words came from the heart, from strong inner convictions.

I know whereof I speak when I say that the sympathetic personality of Wallace, his conception of the world of tomorrow, his evident hatred of injustice have done more to strengthen Chilean friendship for the United States than the hundreds of phrases disseminated in Latin America through the channels of official propaganda. There is in Chile, as in many other parts of Latin America, a great skepticism about the foreign policy of the United States. Henry Wallace has cleared the atmosphere of bitter memories, of distrust and resentment.

The fact that Mr. Wallace did not visit all the republics of South America has not been overlooked. He did not go to Argentina, where the reactionary dictator Castillo fights against the powerful democratic feeling of a traditionally democratic nation. He did not go to Brazil, whose government, though at war with the Axis, is a dictatorial regime. But before he returns to the United States he will cross countries where democracy is a mask worn by unscrupulous dictators seeking money and international prestige and ready to simulate support of the democratic cause of the United Nations in order to escape the difficulties of the hour.

One may hope that Mr. Wallace's good judgment will enable him to avoid the dangers inherent in such a heterogeneous tour. The most important thing for him to do is to convey to the government and the people of the United States, as he undoubtedly will, the sentiments of the men and women of Latin America—that they view this war as a death struggle against fascism, that they pray that the United Nations may remain loyal to their promises to the peoples of the earth.

Henry Wallace has renewed our faith in the progressive policy of President Roosevelt and of the men who surround him. He has awakened enormous hope—and thereby incurred a great responsibility. If that hope is extinguished, nothing will restore the mutual confidence upon which real inter-American cooperation in war and in peace must be based.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE Stockholm Aftonbladet is pro-Nazi, and so is its Berlin correspondent, Gunnar Müllern. Nevertheless, Mr. Müllern wrote in the Aftonbladet of May 7, "There is general unrest in Germany, caused chiefly by the 'total mobilization.'" He added that the wave of disorders had recently resulted in some arrests, "among them that of former Chancellor Luther, whose Nazi sympathies are well known."

We do not know why Dr. Luther was apprehended, but the source of the unrest which has been brought to a head by the total mobilization is perfectly clear. It is the threatened extinction of the middle class, with all the social changes that would imply. The fate of the middle class is at present the dominant—and the most agitating—theme in Germany, the focal point of the wave of unrest. Since this column first referred to the matter two weeks ago, the explanations, reassurances, warnings, and polemics on the subject have become more and more numerous and vehement—proof enough that the bitterness of the millions affected has mounted rather than subsided.

The official line remains the same: the stores and businesses and handicraft shops that have now been closed will be reopened after the war. We are no Bolsheviks, say the Nazi chiefs, wanting to liquidate a class, least of all the middle class. On the contrary, National Socialism always has been and always will be the best friend and protector of the middle class. And therefore, declared Gauleiter Rainer of Carinthia, "I demand of business men that they be more reasonable and farsighted. I demand that they maintain discipline."

But on April 8 the Schwarze Korps published a brutal outbreak which ran astonishingly athwart the official line. This paper is the organ of the S. S. and the mighty Himmler and therefore is not subject to the directions of a little man named Goebbels. It breathes the very spirit of that cold, fanatical troop whose members have severed all social relationships. The Schwarze Korps asserted that people must stop speaking up for the middle class. The middle class, it said, is a fossil—"a mere catchword left over from democratic days"—and belongs in a museum. "After the war we must completely reconstruct our economic life. The ghost of the middle class must be packed away in mothballs. The middle class is dead, and the German nation, for that reason, is all the more alive."

As you see, even in a dictatorship there is not 100 per cent uniformity. Indeed, the recklessness with which Himmler's department went counter to Goebbels's in this matter is sensational. Serious conflicts must lie behind this public difference of opinion on a question which is agitating the whole nation.

The leading Bavarian newspaper, the Münchener Neueste Nachrichten, carried this paragraph on March 20:

Who does not know that omniscient man with the sorrowful expression on his face who possesses innumerable first-class sources of information and is always looking for an audience, which he finds only too often. If he is right once, then of course his associates consider him infallible. . . . In this serious hour we beg our people to do things differently from in 1918 and not to listen to the sly treacherous whisperings, the evil bleatings, of political charlatans, traitors, and scoundrels. These creatures always act the worried patriot, hiding their envy and hatred of the leading personalities of the state and party behind the mask of "experience and reading" and a lot of other intellectual trash. . . . Punish them mercilessly! When they repeat a rumor, ask them which enemy radio they got it from, and report them to the police.

The North German Hannoversche Zeitung of March 26 discussed the same topic.

At all times enemy propaganda has been favored by the fact that nothing seems to be too impossible or too stupid to be believed, at least in part, by some people. The prohibition against listening to foreign broadcasts is a quarantine against moral bacteria which have been let loose by the enemy. But through some stupidity smaller foci occasionally develop within the country. They too must be watched.

And Gauleiter Rainer of Carinthia spoke as follows on April 4:

There are some scoundrels among us who whisper, "If Adolf Hitler had not come to power, there would be no war today." I say, neither would there be a German Reich and people, but only a Jewish colony where the hate instincts of subhuman beings would rage. We shall not hasten the end of the war by being disloyal to our Führer. . . . The enemy tries to undermine the German people's firmness, seeking for some inner weakness, some way of separating us from the Führer. The enemy calculates on finding representatives of the old parties still among us. He is mistaken.

No comment.

According to the Stockholm Veckojournalen, the latest popular joke in Berlin is in question-and-answer form: "What is the briefest German joke? We shall win the war."

BOOKS and the ARTS

In Distrust of Merits

Strengthened to live, strengthened to die for medals and positioned victories?

They're fighting, fighting, fighting the blind man who thinks he sees,— who cannot see that the enslaver is enslaved; the hater, harmed. O shining O firm star, O tumultuous ocean lashed till small things go

■ they will, the mountainous wave makes us who look, know depth. Lost at sea before they fought! O star of David, star of Bethlehem,

O black imperial lion of the Lord—emblem

of a risen world—be joined at last, be joined. There is hate's crown beneath which all is death; there's love's without which none is king; the blessed deeds bless the halo. As contagion of sickness makes sickness, contagion of trust can make trust. They're fighting in deserts and caves, one by one, in battalions and squadrons;

they're fighting that I may yet recover from the disease, My Self; some have it lightly, some will die. "Man's wolf to man? And we devour ourselves? The enemy could not have made a greater breach in our defenses. One piloting ■ blind man can escape him, but

Job disheartened by false comfort knew, that nothing is so defeating as a blind man who can see. O alive who are dead, who are proud not to see, O small dust of the earth that walks so arrogantly, trust begets power and faith is an affectionate thing. We vow, we make this promise to the fighting—it's a promise—"We'll never hate black, white, red, yellow, Jew,

Gentile, Untouchable." We are not competent to make our vows. With set jaw they are fighting, fighting, fighting,—some we love whom we know, some we love but know not—that hearts may feel and not be numb.

It cures me; or am I what

I can't believe in? Some in snow, some on crags, some in quicksands, little by little, much by much, they are fighting fighting fighting that where there was death there may be life. "When a man is prey to anger,

he is moved by outside things; when he holds his ground in patience patience patience, that is action or beauty," the soldier's defense and hardest armor for the fight. The world's an orphans' home. Shall we never have peace without sorrow?

without pleas of the dying for help that won't come? O quiet form upon the dust, I cannot look and yet I must. If these great patient dyings—all these agonies and woundbearings and blood shed—can teach us how to live, these dyings were not wasted.

Hate-hardened heart, O heart of iron, iron is iron till it is rust.

There never was a war that was not inward; I must fight till I have conquered in myself what causes war, but I would not believe it.

I inwardly did nothing.

O Iscariotlike crime!

Beauty is everlasting and dust is for a time.

MARIANNE MOORE

Study in Cynicism

THE MACHIAVELLIANS: DEFENDERS OF FREEDOM.

By James Burnham. The John Day Company. $2.50.

THERE is a kind of historical inevitability about James Burnham's new book. Both his own history and the history of our age demanded that it be written. He had to write it because he had previously produced "The Managerial Revolution" and in analyzing the rise of a new technical oligarchy had betrayed a degree of political cynicism which required further elaboration. The history of our age demanded it because our whole bourgeois era, now drawing to a tragic close, has been so filled with political and moral sentimentality that a realistic reaction was inevitable; it was probably just as inevitable that the realistic movement should overstep the mark and fall into the abyss of cynicism.

Mr. Burnham is a very able man, and he explores the abyss into which he has fallen with great skill; but he cannot finally hide the fact that it is an abyss. The sentimentality against which Mr. Burnham protests is the uncritical acceptance of the professed goals of politics and aims of politicians as the real ones. A proper realism would know how to discount the element of pretension in man's political life, as indeed in his whole life, and how to discriminate between truth and pretense. Cynicism becomes so obsessed with the dishonesty of human behavior, particularly the dishonesty of political leaders, that it proceeds to disavow all normative principles of political life. This is what Mr. Burnham calls scientific politics. He hails Machiavelli as the founder of this school of science and presents Mosca, Michels, Sorel, and Pareto as its most noted exemplars and himself as its contemporary exponent.

Let us be quite clear what is at stake in the issue which Mr. Burnham raises. It is the question whether men are totally depraved. Mr. Burnham thinks they are. Sometimes he allows slight qualifications and declares that "the primary subject matter of political science is the struggle for social power" and that "the primary object of every élite or ruling class is to maintain its own power and privilege." But the actual argument of the book rests upon the assumption that the primary object is the only one. At least no word suggests that men might have a significant mixture of motives and that the disinterested motives may play a real role in life and not be mere pretension.

Mr. Burnham begins with a comparison between Dante and Machiavelli. In this comparison he assumes that Dante's "De Monarchia" is in reality nothing but a Ghibelline propaganda tract and that Dante's ostensible interest in a universal political order is nothing but eyewash. Naturally he finds Machiavelli's brutally honest analysis of political motives much more acceptable by comparison. Mr. Burnham is quite right in insisting that Machiavelli's bad reputation in Western history is not altogether to his discredit but to ours; for men do not like to be reminded of their dishonesties and pretensions. But he does not realize that the normative principles of universal justice which Dante seeks to elaborate are something more than eyewash; even though Dante, in common with most moralists, whether religious or secular, fails to realize the degree to which historical circumstance and egoistic interest color the statement of these ideals.

Mr. Burnham is convinced that what Marxists call "ideology" and what in the jargon of Pareto is known as "derivation"—that is, the pretended ideal reason which we (particularly, however, the rulers) give for our interested action—is nothing but a lie. This is his doctrine of total depravity. One may question whether a cynical reaction to the moral sentimentality of our culture is much more mature than the sentimentality.

Though Mr. Burnham believes that a genuinely "scientific" political science must reject normative principles and merely describe what is and what works, he does have, in common with some though not all of his Machiavellians, an interest in justice. He believes that justice is best served if rulers are resisted. He wants to make his realism available to the people as well as the rulers in order that tyranny may be avoided. But if his account of human nature is correct, it is difficult to understand how anyone below the level of the élite can profit from this science. Nor is it plausible to call upon the élite to be more farsighted, for rational foresight implies a freedom from the immediate operation of the power impulse which his theory denies. Furthermore, the conclusions of the political scientist should be as suspect as the pretensions of the ruler. If his account of human nature is correct, why should we not discount anything he has to say about the operation of political forces, on the ground that his conclusions are nothing else than dishonest pretensions which hide the power impulses of the social scientist? To be sure, Mr. Burnham ostensibly confines his study to human nature as it expresses itself in political life, and disavows the study of human nature in general. But his affirmations about political man rest upon inferences and conclusions about man himself. If political rulers are as void of a mixture of disinterested and interested motives as he thinks, there is no reason to believe that political scientists are any more capable of a disinterested devotion to the truth.

The depth of the abyss into which Mr. Burnham has fallen is well illustrated by his speculation upon whether "rulers" can be "scientific." Rulers must deceive, he argues, but they must not be deceived by their own lies or "believe in their own myths. When this happens they are no longer scientific. Sincerity is bought at the price of truth." The man who tells a lie knowingly is truthful, in other words, but the self-deceived man is not. This is Nietzsche's creed of the honest lie. (For some reason Mr. Burnham has left Nietzsche out of his galaxy of Machiavellians, though Nietzsche knew a great deal about the self-deceptions of the bourgeois world.) The difficulty with this theory of the honest lie is apparent in our contemporary history. The democracies are not as devoted to the cause of justice as they say they are. National self-interest is a more powerful motive than the democracies admit. About that Mr. Burnham is quite right. But the Nazi propaganda proves the futility of escape from these partly unconscious and partly conscious dishonesties by making the lie more conscious and explicit. By disavowing the standard of honesty to which a decent man is partly loyal, though not as loyal as he pretends or believes, nothing is gained but a new standard of dishonesty.

His hope of making the ruling class more farsighted and willing to "open its ranks to able and ambitious newcomers from below" means that he thinks political "science" can be used not merely to direct the power impulse of the rulers but to check it in the interest of long-range objectives. But why should a selfish oligarch restrict his power impulse, or imperil the interest of his family by taking in ambitious newcomers from below? He could do it only if the dominance of the power impulse is interpreted in collective rather than individual terms. The primary concern of the ruler would have to be not his rule but the rule of his class. But if it is the collective power impulse which is dominant, why may not the collective egotism of the community rather than that of the oligarchy be the dominant force? In that case a ruler might be persuaded to invigorate the oligarchy not primarily in order to maintain it but because he regards the reinvigoration from below as good for the community. But if such considerations ever enter the minds of the rulers, the absolute distinction between the ruler and the community is lost. Why may not Mr. Churchill have proved to be a better ruler than the "Munich men" precisely because his primary interest was the preservation of the British Empire and not the preservation of a class? One might go farther and assume that in

UNITE FOR VICTORY

Labor Rally

Sunday May 2nd

Yankee Stadium

TICKETS:
55c
Spec. Section
$1.70

LABOR FOR UNITY
and
VICTORY COMMITTEE

50 WEST 11 STREET
NEW YORK 1, N.Y.

SPEAKERS

MAYOR LA GUARDIA
SEN. CLAUDE PEPPER
WEI TAO-MING
Ambassador from China
JOHN GREEN
Vice President, C. I. O.
Rev. A. Clayton Powell
Johannes Steel
For the U. S. Treasury
Genevieve Tabouis
Margaret Bondfield
and MANY OTHERS

GALA ENTERTAINMENT

★ PAUL ROBESON ★ ★ STAGE & SCREEN STARS ★ ★ BANDS ★ MUSIC ★ CHORUS ★
And Added Surprises

Tickets: 55c Special Section $1.70

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME

ADDRESS

5-1-48

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new
address.

the future they will be the best leaders of a nation whose primary interest is not the pride of a nation but the mutual security of all nations. Such farsightedness may serve the nation best. But it is possible only if there is more transcendence over the narrow power impulse than Mr. Burnham suggests. If it does not exist, our whole civilization is doomed in any event.

Mr. Burnham understands that even democracies have oligarchies. But here again he is led astray by the depth of his cynicism. He assumes an absolute distinction between the élite and the people even in a democracy. But he does not recognize that in a democracy, despite its imperfections, there is such a constant shift in the oligarchy, both in the political and economic sphere, through pressure from below that the oligarchy is kept fluid. It is kept so fluid in fact that his concept of élite does not really apply. Furthermore, such justice as a democracy has is achieved not only by pressure from below but by tension between various oligarchies. We actually possess—despite the pretension and hypocrisy of bourgeois democracy—much more of what Mr. Burnham desires than could be achieved by his cynicism. The idea that the people rule is actually a normative principle in our life and not a mere pretension. If cynicism reduces it to a mere pretension it will lose its normative force.

Even Mr. Burnham's cynicism in regard to the ignorance of the masses is too extravagant. It is quite true that the masses lack the knowledge to survey all the intricacies of government. But the wearer of a shoe always knows better than the most expert cobbler whether or not the shoe pinches. That is a form of wisdom which Mr. Burnham has left out of account in his reckoning.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Hollywood View

TUNIS EXPEDITION. By Colonel Darryl F. Zanuck.

Random House. $2.

COLONEL ZANUCK supervised the taking of motion pictures of the Tunisian campaign and got right into the thick of things. With sure Hollywood instinct he sensed immediately that this war was one of the most superb scenarios ever produced. When he landed at the African airfield, he looked about him and saw R. A. F. pilots, French aviators, exhausted American soldiers, dazed Nazi prisoners, and he exclaimed, "What a cast!" The next night he saw a column of doughboys advancing in the moonlight, and they looked for all the world, he says, like "that great scene from 'The Big Parade.'" He describes a British major as looking "like a younger version of George Arliss." He particularly admired General Giraud, who "stands out among the others like a twenty-four sheet."

Although Colonel Zanuck was very busy "contacting" people, he found time also for psychological observations. He noticed that when the bombs were dropping he had a tendency to flatten out behind some obstruction, any obstruction, and he explained the phenomenon this way: "But the fact that you run for cover and duck and hold your breath and hug the dirt and say a quick silent prayer at the very moment of acute danger has nothing whatever to do with fear." Aside from the bombs, there were other hardships. At one point he records that his "foot goes to sleep painfully." And he is constantly plagued by the lack of cigars. "I am now down to cigarettes," he notes, "and anybody can tell you that for a cigar smoker that is next to the kiss of death."

Damon Runyon, in his introduction, says Colonel Zanuck should have been a newspaperman himself, because he combines the features of Richard Harding Davis and Floyd Gibbons. Mr. Runyon does not say whether he means the best features. The Zanuck work is indispensable for anyone who feels the need of a Hollywood view of the war.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Russian Journey

ROUND TRIP TO RUSSIA. By Walter Graebner. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

WALTER GRAEBNER has done something almost unprecedented; he was in Russia for only four months and he has produced a first-class book about it. He makes more sense than many who spent years in the country. His success is due to his absence of pretension and the simplicity and objectivity of his approach.

Graebner made up for not knowing Russian by trying at every opportunity to talk to Russians through interpreters, or in the case of the better-educated, in German or English. In the midst of the Battle of Stalingrad, when sentiments in Russia were tense, when Muscovites pointed to the five first rows at the ballet nightly filled with foreigners with sarcastic remarks like "Is that the second front?" Graebner went through the Moscow Park of Culture and Rest and stopped people at random, talked with them, asked them what they thought of their regime, of the war, of their allies.

Several profound but often-missed truths about the Russian people Graebner discovered in this way, and he expounds them simply and clearly: (1) Though the Soviet people believe in their system, they have no intention of forcing it on others. Their attention is concentrated mainly on the development of their own vast, immeasurably rich country. (2) Russians are not preoccupied with making money. Their standard of living, though low in relation to that in the United States, is secure. (3) While pressure and discipline are used to make the Russians fight, "the government could not force men to be brave . . . [nor could it] sustain the spirit of a people if the people were spiritually opposed to it. There seems every likelihood, therefore, that the Russians are working and fighting so magnificently more because they love their country, have faith in their system and in their leaders, than because they have been forced to accept the ruthless dictates of the Kremlin." (4) "Russians seem to get along with one another better under socialism than Americans do under capitalism." This is due largely to the absence of competitive spirit.

The author's travels in Russia took him up through Iran, across the Caspian to Baku, up the Volga past Stalingrad on the eve of its siege, and on to Moscow; back to Iran by plane. While traveling and while working in Moscow in the Metro-pole Hotel, Graebner kept his eyes and ears open and tells what he saw and heard like the good reporter he is. His book lacks the heroics of Caldwell, the flippancies of Alice Moats,

ON FURLOUGH? 20% DISCOUNT TO ALL MEN IN THE ARMED FORCES

HONEYMOON HAVEN

OPEN MAY 15
FREE GOLF
To June 27

*In the Heart of
The Adirondacks*
SCAROON is a
FAIRYLAND in JUNE
The Ideal Vacation Time
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball Courts

Facilities for a limited number of families with children

N. Y. OFFICE:
5 E. 45th St.
RU 2-4083
BA 7-1970

SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL • 1771 SCAROON LAKE, N.Y.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

ANNOUNCING . . . Volume I, Number 1.

New THRESHOLD

A Journal of Student Opinion

NEW THRESHOLD brings to you the unequivocal demand of young people that this war be fought to establish a just and durable and, above all, a democratic peace.

IN THE MAY ISSUE!

SHADOW-BOXING WITH THE FUTURE—

The politicians persistently duck the issues and confuse the voters. A provocative appeal for clear thinking and straight talking.

MOSCOW WINTER—Two heart-warming cables from Soviet students.

POST GRADUATE, USNR—From the fighting front comes a moving statement of the faith men carry into battle.

SAGA OF CHINESE STUDENTS—A first-hand account from a refugee university far in the interior.

(Plus other student articles, fiction and verse)

Subscribe Now! 50c A Year (5 Issues)

NEW THRESHOLD, 8 West 40th St., New York City

- ☐ Enclosed is 50c for a year's subscription.
☐ Please bill me for a year's subscription.

Name.....

Address.....

the mature rumination of Russian-born Alexander Werth. But it surpasses all other books about war-time Russia in clear thinking and good reporting, with the possible exception of "We're in This War with Russia" by Wallace Carroll.

In one important respect I believe Graebner missed the truth. He overstates the position of the bureaucracy in the Soviet Union. Possibly one reason was that he did not stay long enough, or know enough bureaucrats to find out how precarious their position is, how hard they work, and how high is the mortality among them. In one place he implies that educational opportunities for the children of bureaucrats are greater than for the ordinary citizen. This is not so. Admission into all educational institutions in Russia is granted on the basis of competitive examinations, plus physical prerequisites in the case of aviation or other special schools, and party membership for entry into party schools, which train functionaries for the country's all-powerful Communist Party. The bureaucracy in Russia is powerful, but it is very fluid, and so far there are no indications that it has moved in the direction of its self-perpetuation unto the second generation.

Graebner's remarks on religion in Russia are sound. It may be that "as the Soviet Union grows older it is taking a less stern attitude toward religion. . . . Many, however, feel that the changed attitude is more a war-time expedient than the real thing." Graebner himself believes that the Kremlin is probably just as anti-religious as it ever was. I would agree with him if religion were defined in terms of the Moslem, Orthodox, Roman, or other leading churches. I would add, however, that a new religion of a sort is growing up rapidly in Russia. Certain philosophical and sociological ideas are believed instead of studied. They are ossifying into a credo which people do not thoroughly understand but in which they have faith. In a decade, or two or three, this will, I believe, crystallize into a new religion which will replace the old Orthodox Church in Russia, and in the hearts and souls of Russians, just as at many times in history new religions have arisen and replaced older ones which no longer satisfied the needs of the people.

A small number of minor errors have crept into the book. For example, half the people in Russia do not speak German; far more than one oil well in ten in Baku is in operation. The forty-nine photographs are well chosen and give a very good glimpse of war-time Russia. The book reads well and makes sense, and is to be highly recommended.

JOHN SCOTT

New Physics and Old Philosophy

PHYSICS AND PHILOSOPHY. By Sir James Jeans. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

IT IS fortunate that clear ideas as to the nature and import of the method of science are not a prerequisite for using it successfully. Those who engage in scientific research develop habits of good workmanship through the force of example and tradition; they are usually too busy to acquire those disciplined habits of mind indispensable for a just estimate of the logic of their procedure. In consequence, even eminent scientists can make unholy spectacles of themselves when they don the mantle of philosophy and attempt to discuss the broad implications of their specialized labors. They then frequently adopt, with a show of argument, the interpretations of science and nature sanctioned by the uncriticized heritage of their local culture. But like a chaplain's prayer at the end of a political convention, the philosophies ceremonially professed by most men of science are largely irrelevant to the accredited body of scientific knowledge.

Sir James Jeans's latest book offers fresh evidence for these observations. In it he aims to determine the bearing of recent developments in physics upon certain large questions of knowledge and reality. Although he now offers his conclusions with an air of hesitation, neither his conclusions nor his arguments are essentially different from those contained in his earlier "The Mysterious Universe." Jeans continues to find the universe around him mysterious. For according to him, physics can at best discover only the pattern of events; since our minds cannot step outside their prison-house of the body, we can never hope to understand the "real nature of things." Theoretical physics is construed as describing only "our observations on nature" and not nature itself. The moral of the fable seems to be that the more physics succeeds in disentangling the structure of events the less we really "know" what the world is like.

However, consistency is not one of the failings of Jeans's philosophy, and such a solipsistic skepticism is not his final word. He dissents vigorously from views such as those of Eddington, according to which the laws of nature can be deduced from the constitution of the human mind. He maintains, surely to his reader's surprise, that if we wish to dis-

AMUSEMENTS

Theatre Guild's New Musical <h2 style="text-align: center;">OKLAHOMA!</h2> ST. JAMES THEATRE 44th Street West of Broadway EVES. 8:30 ■ MATS. Thurs. & Sat.	Musical by RICHARD RODGERS Book by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2d Lyrics by ROBERT MAMOULIAN Music by AGNES DE MILLE Betty Garde, Alfred Drake, Joseph Baird, Joan Roberts, Lee Dixon, Howard da Silva, Celeste Holm
--	---

On the Screen <h2 style="text-align: center;">CHINA</h2> Starring LORETTA YOUNG ALAN LADD A Paramount Picture	Times Square "... knowing direction... stout acting... moments of melodramatic power."—Herald Tribune Stage Show Harry Marx & Orch. Golden Gate Quartet
---	---

LECTURES

<h2 style="text-align: center;">RUSSIA</h2> Fri., April 30, 8 p.m. — Sat., May 1, 2 p.m. BERTRAND RUSSELL, ALGERNON LEE, ALEXANDER KERENSKY, SIDNEY HOOK, RAPHAEL ABRAMOWITZ, and others Tks for both sessions—50c for single session RAND SCHOOL 7 East 15th St., ALgonquin 4-3094	and the Post-War World
--	--

<h2 style="text-align: center;">DON'T LET YOUR VACATION PLANS CHANGE TO VACATION BLUES</h2> Ask The Nation's Resort Information Department about the many excellent resort establishments furnishing data for the convenience of our readers. Just telephone ALgonquin 4-3811 or write The NATION 65 FIFTH AVENUE ■ NEW YORK CITY cover the truth about nature, "the only sound method is to go out into the world and question nature directly." To be sure, the events in our daily life are rigorously determined in an "inaccessible substratum of nature," a substratum whose existence is said to be implied by the formulas of mathematical physics. On the other hand, although inaccessible, the processes which go on in it are at bottom only our "mental constructions." In the end, therefore, "reality" can be better described as mental rather than as material. The mystery of the universe, at least for Jeans, is thus simply the impenetrable mystery of his own mind.
--

This unusually incoherent philosophy, though claiming the support of modern physics, in fact rests upon a systematic use of dubious figures of speech and bad puns. Some illustrations will make this evident. Jeans's conviction that the real nature of things must forever elude our grasp is based on the image of human minds locked behind the opaque walls of their bodies. But such a picture of the mind makes nonsense of everything he reports about the progress of science, and when he is off his guard it is rejected by Jeans himself. When he asserts that nature consists of our "perceptions," he is surely playing upon the double meaning of the word, which may denote the objects of our sensory apprehensions as well as our apprehensions of objects. In any case, it is the planet Venus which revolves around the sun, and not our perceptions of Venus around our perceptions of the sun. Similarly, when Jeans declares that the relativity theory deals with the measures of things and not with things themselves, he is taking advantage of the ambiguity of the term "measure," which may signify a relational property of a thing as well as the process or record of estimating that property. Only in the first sense of the term is the relativity theory concerned with the measures of things; but only by substituting the second sense for the first can Jeans find support for his "mentalistic" interpretation of nature. Again, when Jeans maintains that as a consequence of the atomicity of radiation a precise knowledge of the outer world becomes impossible, he is misleading his readers. For the highly specialized sense in which "precision" is excluded by quantum mechanics does not imply, as Jeans declares, that the notion of causal determination must be abandoned for the familiar world of daily affairs. As for his final conclusion that the "material universe" is little else than our "mental construct," he himself recognizes the worth of such a transsubstantiation when he remarks: "Being hit by a golf ball hurts just as much now that we know that it is little more than empty space."

The present book can therefore be taken only as a model of what popular science should not be. Its accounts of technical matters, although intended for the layman, are so perversely obscure that several professional physicists have found parts of the exposition unintelligible; and its statements of views which have been held in the history of philosophic thought distort those views almost beyond recognition. Neither colorful pictorial representations of the conclusions of physics nor irresponsible philosophical speculations concerning them are a substitute for a sober description of the way modern theories of physics function and of what they achieve. The world seems full enough of bewilderment and genuine puzzles without the confusions introduced by inadequate popularizations of science.

ERNEST NAGEL

Now Playing

The greatest one-man mission since
Paul Revere's ride!

JOSEPH E. DAVIES

MISSION TO MOKROW

Presented by WARNER BROS.

CAST: GUYTON, BOB, MARION, ALICE, THOMAS, CHARLES, EDWARD, JAMES, LUCAS, ROBERT, DAVID, EDWARD, MICHAEL, CURTIS

HOLLYWOOD THEATRE
BROADWAY AT 5th STREET • CONTINUOUS • POPULAR PRICES

DRAMA

TOMORROW THE WORLD*

(Ethel Barrymore Theater) is a tract for the times. It poses the question whether the children of Nazi Germany can be reeducated and how. The writing is earnest, obvious, and on the whole pedestrian. The situation, however—that of a Nazi boy of twelve set down in a Middle Western American household—is dramatic and provocative. And the acting of every member of the cast is so very good, the direction so expert, that the play in performance takes on an emotional force and subtlety which the lines lack—and often indeed interfere with.

A great deal of the emotional charge, interestingly enough, is contributed by the spectators, who become so personally involved in the situation on the stage that when the easygoing, lovable professor (Ralph Bellamy) is roused to such fury by the behavior of the Nazi brat (Skippy Homeier) that he tries to strangle him, the sense of pleasurable participation on the part of the audience becomes positively frightening. (In one of the few subtle lines of the piece the point is made—and alarmingly demonstrated by the audience—that the Nazi boy brings out the worst in everyone with whom he comes in contact.) At that point the play becomes more than a play. One has the feeling that a public attitude is being set up—and one sighs with relief when in the dénouement the scales tip to the decent, human conclusion that the Nazi brat, in spite of everything, including his attempt to kill Nancy Nugent, can be reclaimed. Then one is grateful for the earnestness and good-will of the authors of what might so easily have been a hymn of hate and extermination.

Only after the curtain goes down does one realize that it is a child actor, Skippy Homeier, who has created—and saved—a highly explosive situation. Certainly he has excellent support, but he is nevertheless the crucial figure in this contemporary morality play. And what a tense, skinny little figure he is. With the unwitting cooperation of the audience he makes real what is today perhaps the most tragic character in the world—the German child who has been corrupted by Goebbels, who is capable of being “saved” but whose salvation depends on the rest of us and the degree to which we resist a still incipient but basically similar corruption.

MARGARET MARSHALL

FILMS

DESERT VICTORY” is the first completely admirable combat film, and if only film makers and their bosses can learn the simple lessons it so vigorously teaches, its service to the immediate future and to history will be incalculably great. The most heartening thing about it is that its lessons are learnable. It takes something approaching great talent to learn from great talent, but the men who made this film are not men of great talent. They are simply men of intelligence, courage, and aesthetic honor who have been given a chance to use their abilities in the recording of a worthy theme. That they were given the apparently unhindered chance is as important as the fact that they knew how to use it; on both counts, the makers of American films have virtually everything to learn.

It is so good, and so simply good, that it is hard to do more than urge that you see it. In the camera work, the cutting, the music and sound, the commentary, it is a clean, simple demonstration that creative imagination is the only possible substitute for the plainest sort of good sense—and is, after all, merely an intensification of good sense to the point of incandescence. There is hardly one moment in the collaboration of cameras that implies a truly creative eye, that makes a subject be itself with the intensity of a diamond; but on the other hand there is hardly a shot which by any sort of dramatizing, prearrangement, or sentimentalization gets in the way of the high honest average chance for magnificence which any face or machine or light or terrain possesses, left to its own devices. The captured German film hits a similar level.

The cutting—here I include the broad scenario—is a shade or two more perceptive, though again it gets along, proudly and well, with plain sense and sensitiveness instead of brilliance. It is distinguished from most cutting simply in being the work of men who have thought, felt, and cared a great deal about the power and honesty of given film images, in themselves simply, in juxtaposition and careful series, in rhythm, and in a rhythmic and spatial whole. The results of this sort of thought and feeling, carved out without compromise, are inevitable. Whereas the average non-fiction film, even if the material is well photographed—which it seldom is—moves in great blotches of ill-punctuated gabble, filled with uh’s, ah’s, and as-I-say-sayings, this moves at worst in clean, resonant sentences, which construct irreducible paragraphs, and develops, at discreet intervals, the small fine poems of which honesty without inspiration is capable. Very notable, I think, is the fact that here, for the first time in a strictly record film, record has been used without abuse to create an organized whole rather than a gifted, spotty sprawl. (The camera work in “June 13th,” for instance, is more sophisticated, but overall, “June 13th” is diffuse and a little posterish, without anything like the solidity and internal rhyming of the British film.)

Sound and music commentary follow, here, the same pattern: that is, they are used when and as they should be. The music goes a little vulgar at the end, but there are two movements—the industrial build-up and the build-up of the barrage—which almost for the first time are made in intelligent relations to natural sound, and which spike rather than water the screen’s images. The commentary is especially worth American study. The normal native commentary, well measuring our loss of cinematic instinct, heckles and humiliates the screen image, and pounds it, like the nagging of a

OPENING ... for
THE SUMMER SEASON
 COMMENCING ...
DECORATION DAY
 PLAN YOUR SUMMER VACATION NOW!
 FREE TO MEMBERS OF ALL UNIONS
 Write for Illustrated
 Booklet
 N. Y. OFFICE
 37 WEST 16th ST.
 WALKERS 9-6868

UNITY HOUSE FOREST PARK
 PENNSYLVANIA
 Owned and Operated by
I. L. G. W. U. ON NON-PROFIT BASIS
 ALFRED A. TAYLOR, Manager
MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW!
BUY WAR BONDS

OTHER
 RESORT ADVERTISING

on page 639 and Inside Back Cover

shrew, a salesman, a preacher, a demagogue, a pimp, or all five combined; we use films to illustrate the rotten words we worship. Here, for once, the words really illuminate when they are used at all; and here, for once, the voice is right which speaks them. The natural sound rises, in one scene, to a solid attempt to annihilate the audience which a friend of mine has properly compared with Beethoven. The second time I heard it, it was muted into a defeat of this intention. I urge that by every means possible you require that it be given full blast. It is the first serious attempt to make an audience participate in the war. No audience should be spared it.

These men have taken painful care with every foot of this film. The attitude of the average American film maker—and his boss—will, of course, be conditioned by the fact that neither knows much about moving pictures, about care and honesty, or about the great potential sensitiveness of the general audience, toward which they have been acting like house-broken Nazis for the past twenty years. But that even they must suspect that the general audience is capable of receiving better than they know how to give is suggested by the mere rumor that Darryl Zanuck has refused to see this film, and that its release was delayed in favor of his own shorn lamb.

"Desert Victory" is a stunning textbook on how to make a non-fiction war film. "Hangmen Also Die," "This Land Is Mine," and "The Moon Is Down" open the question whether serious fiction films on the subject had better be made at all. I would believe that plain melodramas, through their innate artificiality and unpretentiousness, have a good right to exist and may even, within their special formalism, give a remote but decent echo of the truth. I can even respectfully conceive of the attempt at a head-on-embodiment of the truth. But that would be a much more difficult and serious job than the makers of these three films realize. It would require a sensitiveness which they totally lack to the speed with which the noblest reported actions and principles can become the most vulgar sentiment, especially as served to civilians at a comfortable remove. It would require an ingenuity which they seem never to have conceived of in finding and developing kinds of acting, setting, and lighting which might render an audience incapable of feeling, first, that all they are seeing is, after all, only a picture, and second—and still worse—that the occupied nations are filled, not with the terrific human and historical chemistry which is in fact at work in them, but with a pack of posturing Donlevys and Laughtons and Traverses spouting inhuman lines like "You cannot keel de speerit off a free pipples." Seriously, I think such shows can create a dulness of heart, a schizophrasia, from which we might never recover. Whether I am right or wrong about that, I find this sort of stodgy heroism, about such subjects, incredibly indecent.

Of the three films, Lang and Bert Brecht's "Hangmen" is the most interesting. They have chosen to use brutality, American gangster idiom, and Middle High German cinematic style to get it across, and it is rich with clever melodrama, over-maestoso directional touches, and the sort of Querschnitt sophistication for detail which Lang always has. It is most interesting as a memory album. There's a heroine straight out of the Berlin of the middle twenties, and the Nazis are also archaic, nicely presented types: the swaggering homosexual, the cannonball-headed plainclothesman, the tittering, torturing androgyne who, one can imagine, is a revenge on some boyhood misery of Lang's in a Teutonic school. They are all conceivable, as Nazis; but they are all old-fashioned. The New Order has produced men of a new kind, and it would be more to the point to show some of them.

"This Land Is Mine" eschews physical terror in favor of mental, and tries to give an exposition of the obligations of free men under those circumstances. That is a courageous but foredoomed idea. I doubt, first, whether physical and mental terror and obligation can in this context be separated. You cannot afford to dislocate or internationalize your occupied country; or to try to sell it to Americans by making your citizens as well-fed, well-dressed, and comfortably idiomatic as Americans; or to treat the show to the corrupted virtuosity of studio lighting and heavy-ballet composition. This film, like Lang's, is filled with bitter, anachronistic, interesting talent under pressures, but it is a question where the pressure begins and the self-deception ends.

"The Moon Is Down" is a stale quarrel by now which I see no point in reheating. I respect Steinbeck's insistence that both the Nazis and their enemies are human beings, but too many things get in the way of any proof of the fact. Colonel Lanser, as written and played, is very intelligent, but poorly representative. The sort of Nazi Steinbeck must have intended is post-humanistic and unprecedented, as Walter Slezak brilliantly suggests, with far less to use, in "This Land Is Mine." Irony, I am told, comes from eironeia, which could be translated as false naivete. Steinbeck's "little people" use it so much that they become false and naive out of all conscious proportions. So the irony itself becomes unpalatable, and the people become dehumanized victims of a well-intended, unconscious patronage. Worse still, they become stagey—in the worst recent (Group Theater) tradition—with their bursts of song during executions and their scornful smiles, which so falsely dismay Nazi soldiers. To state frankly your deep fear of torture or death ought to be an advance over the traditional false-heroics. Instead, it becomes its own kind of vulgar boast and takes its place in that growing, already over-ripe vocabulary of democratic claptrap which all but destroys our realization that modest heroism is possible, constant, and implicit in this war.

I have inadequate room left to regret an ill-directed nastiness, in my review of "The Human Comedy," which should have been more accurately directed. I think of Clarence Brown, who directed it, in the most praiseworthy and respectful terms, as the man who piloted Garbo's best films and who, before that, made the excellent and bold films "Smoldering Fires" and "The Signal Tower." I have still to insist that he has become a dope, and to offer the negligences in "The Human Comedy" as proof. But he is a sympathetic and likable casualty rather than the sort of born star-spangled Judas I directed that review against.

JAMES AGEE

ART

EXHIBITION OF COLLAGE. At Art of This Century, 30 West Fifty-seventh Street, until May 15.

This is a very amusing exhibition, but except for Laurence Vail's lovely screen and the works of Max Ernst it is rather papiers collés than collages, that is, bits of paper stuck on paintings instead of entire pictures made of cut-out shapes. The nice thing about collages is that they make you feel you could have done them yourself; the trouble with papiers collés is that you have to be Picasso. There are some fine examples by him here, and also some nice ones by Bazziotes, Pollack, and Reinhard, but where are Braque and Gypsy Rose Lee?

EVSA MODEL. At the Pinacotheca, 20 West Fifty-seventh Street, until May 1.

Evsa Model is a gay uninteresting painter bearing very little relation to Chirico in spite of the blurb in the catalogue.

JULIO DE DIEGO. At the Nierendorf Gallery, 53 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 1.

Paintings called Desastres del Alma which live up to their name.

SALVADOR DALI. At M. Knoedler and Company, 14 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 15.

Dali paints with the most exquisite delicacy the most vulgar subjects. It is a pity; he is so much better than the audience he paints down to. The tiny portrait of his wife is beautiful. His technique is both breathtaking and comfortably familiar, reminding one of those smooth Italian paintings hung always in the dining-rooms of grand English country houses. It is a fascinating question how he can be so good without being great.

JEAN CONNOLLY

MUSIC

THE New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, which began its season with one extraordinary event, the performances of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" conducted by Toscanini, ended it with another, the performances of Bach's St. Matthew Passion conducted by Bruno Walter. At those performances of "Romeo and Juliet" I was left shaken and inarticulate by the first experience of this extraordinary work, and by the manifestation, in what I was hearing, of great human powers—the powers of the composer who had originally created the work in his mind and written down the blueprint for its recreation in living sound, and the powers of the conductor who from this blueprint was producing the living work as I now heard it. I felt the same impact recently again at Toscanini's broadcast performance of Debussy's "La Mer" with the N. B. C. Symphony: the impact of the renewed impression of the unique form and unique effect which the work has as Toscanini conducts it, and the impact of the human powers that had originally imagined the work, the human powers that had now created this living sound of it (and that had moved the orchestra itself to burst into applause at the end of the final rehearsal). At the performance of the St. Matthew Passion, on the other hand, I heard music which was familiar—some of it wonderfully moving, some of it quite dull; and a colourless, characterless performance which had none of the revelatory force of Toscanini's 1934 performances of the Kyrie of the B minor Mass and the closing chorus of the St. Matthew Passion. "I knew the Kyrie," I wrote on that occasion, "only as urged along by Mr. Stoessel, possibly with the thought of four hours to go at the back of his mind. The effect of Toscanini's slow tempo was first shock, then revelation: I was hearing the sounds for the first time in their proper relations of time. And for the first time, also, in proper relations of volume: in place of unrelieved mass there was sensitive moulding of beautiful tone. But also there was this revelation: by the time Bach was saying what he had to say for the seventh or whatever time it was, I knew it was six too many. And I had the same feeling about the closing chorus of the St. Matthew Passion."

I am sure that Tudor's "Dark Elegies" to the music of Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," which I saw again a couple of years, has some idea behind it; but that idea doesn't come through the choreography to make sense of what appears to be nonsense—at moments painfully embarrassing nonsense. The work tells no story; it is a formal construction which, according to the note in the program, "mirror[s] the ideas of the songs in the movements of the dancers." But the movements that are effective in relation to situations and actions like those of "Lilac Garden" and "Pillar of Fire" turn out to be inadequate and even absurd in purely formal relations, and very often intrude into the formal construction the connotations they had in those other ballets; and I have yet to see movements and patterns as unrelated to the music's meaning and quality as the ones in "Dark Elegies."

On the other hand I wonder that Tudor is himself not embarrassed by "Gala Performance" to the point of withdrawing it. Ballerinas are vain, jealous creatures; but what should be ridiculed is the truth—that is, the real ways in which they show their vanity and jealousy; and what Tudor ridicules is as false as the lecherous long-haired artists whom the cartoons in Soviet Russian newspapers pictured as opposing the 1936 anti-abortion laws.

I have spoken of Nora Kaye's superb performance in "Pillar of Fire," but not of her beautiful work in classical style, which I have seen in "Giselle" and "Pas de Quatre." In "Les Sylphides" there has been beautiful work also by Rosella Hightower. And Annabelle Lyon is charming both in a classical ballet like "Pas de Quatre" and in things like "Three Virgins and a Devil."

At a performance of "Aida" at the Metropolitan in 1936-37 I had as my guest a lady newly arrived from Europe; and I spent the evening writhing in embarrassment over the singing of the thrown-together odds and ends of a cast, the conducting of a Papi thrown in at the last minute, the shabby rags of palaces and temples that rippled in the Metropolitan's back-stage breezes, the confusion of costumes, the absurdities of stage-management. "All my life," said my guest, "I have waited to hear an opera at the world-famous Metropolitan; at last the day arrives; and I hear a performance which one would not hear even in Paretola"—this being a little place outside Florence, and apparently the archetype of the Italian provincial town.

A few weeks ago I attended a post-season performance of "Aida" at the Metropolitan. In the intervening years the Metropolitan's standards of performance had risen: great works had been carefully prepared, intelligently staged, well sung, conducted by distinguished men. But in "Aida" there were still the rags of palaces and temples rippling in the breezes, the confusion of costumes, the absurdities of stage-management; there were, in the cast, two first-rate singing actors, Pinza and Thorborg, but also Baum, Warren, Roman: Baum, singing well, but rocking on his feet a couple of times as he assumed an attitude of benevolent interest in the goings-on about him, and funnier when he expressed agitation with a few quick staggers and a clutch at the heart; Warren, driving his fine voice and lunging about the stage darkly; Roman—her arms and dumpy figure in a constant state of awkward motion—singing with recently acquired freedom and steadiness, with beauty and fullness of tone, but without much concern for beginning a phrase at the same time as the orchestra, and with outspreading arms calling on the galleries to witness how her voice opened up on high C in the middle of a phrase and held it—while Pelletier held the orchestra until she let go.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

And This, Too, Is a Part of the Record

Dear Sirs: When men who have been fighting on your side for years attack you as one of the "enemy"—as an enemy of progressive ideas—it is, to say the least, rather startling.

Seven years ago I wrote the first nationally syndicated series of newspaper articles on the plight of the Southern share-cropper. Since that time I have contributed to The Nation and written a book on Jackson's amazing and thrilling war against the Bank of the United States ("Democracy in the Making"), a book that had the emphatic indorsement of such enemies of "progressive ideas" as Herbert Agar, Claude Bowers, Charles A. Beard, and the New Republic. And yet in the face of my long record of championship of the lowly, the humble, the dispossessed and disinherited of the earth, I. F. Stone in The Nation of April 17 quotes Senator Guffey as saying he would have the students in our schools know of Jackson's magnificent fight on the powerful Bank of the United States, and then adds: "That is all to the good, but isn't it the very kind of social history attacked by Hugh Russell Fraser and the New York Times?" (my italics).

In other words, it would be possible for me to write a book revealing new and startling material on the tremendous odds Jackson faced in his fight on the corrupt and arrogant Biddle monopoly and yet, for some obscure reason, not want the students in our schools to get this kind of story!

This question of American history-teaching is not what it appears to be on the surface. Max Lerner in PM takes a look at it and says the Committee on American History does not appear to be interested in the "battle of the people." Nonsense. The Sons of the American Revolution take a look at it and say, "Ah, communism in the schools! We must stop that!" Both are wrong. Neither have the slightest conception of what is being taught in the bulk of our schools.

Communism, via American history, is not being taught in our schools, nor is socialism—nor, now get this, is the philosophy of the National Association of Manufacturers. Until this one elementary principle can be grasped, it is utterly impossible to approach the situation intelligently. The truth is that very little—and in some schools nothing—is being taught about American history. Half our high-school students do not get an organized course in American history at all.

This is due to the fact that (1) according to Emory Foster, statistician for the United States Office of Education, about 30 per cent of those graduating from senior or junior high schools do not have a course in American history at all, and (2) about half drop out before finishing. Now that statement does not begin to reveal the shocking nature of the problem. The real significance of it lies in the fact that those who do get a course in American history get, too often, a mere course in contemporary problems, plus a generalized discussion of social forces, plus a discussion of a few arbitrarily selected topics in American history. And all this passes for "American history."

Do you suppose that students in such courses get any concept of Jackson's magnificent fight on Nicholas Biddle's monopoly? They do not. The matter generally is not even mentioned. The story of such a thrilling fight smacks too much of mere "facts," and facts are not what Teachers College of Columbia University wants. I put the question about Nicholas Biddle in the questionnaire deliberately. And I found that only 6 per cent of the 7,000 students could even tell who Nicholas Biddle was, or had any idea about him. Yet 71 per cent knew who John D. Rockefeller was. Teachers College has given its indorsement to instruction in current events. And as for Walt Whitman, is it surprising that hundreds of students thought he was Paul Whiteman?

It is the method of teaching American history that I am complaining about. And the method of instruction is one adopted by the educational psychologists at Teachers College in the early 20's. It is sometimes referred to as "teaching history backward." That is, you start in the present and work backward. But in some of the pet schools of the experimentalists the method has degenerated into starting in the present and staying in the present, with only an occasional glance backward.

You cannot teach history that way and learn anything about the revolutionary philosophy of Jefferson or the bourbon viewpoint of Alexander Hamilton; nor can you learn anything about the robber barons of the 1870's, or about John Tyler or Abraham Lincoln or Andrew Johnson or even James Madison—and the reason is that when the Social Studies extremists finish with discussing current events they have no time for the events and the individual philosophies of the men who made America. No wonder, therefore, that not one out of four students could identify two contributions to the nation of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln.

There were a few questions for which, if the test was being given again, Dr. Nevins and myself would want to substitute others, but I can assure you one of them would not be the year of the passage of the Homestead Act (1862) or the minimum price of the public lands ($1.25).

For thirty years prior to the passage of the Homestead Act the whole question was the subject of bitter controversy in the United States. And in the last ten years of the fight millions of people looked forward to the year when Congress would give them a stake in the public lands. The passage of the act was really a tremendous event, and if the Civil War had not overshadowed it, the climax of the great battle in Congress would have been celebrated in succeeding years. And likewise it would be impossible for anyone to know anything about the causes of the great depression of 1837 and the frenzied speculation in the public lands without knowing also the minimum price of the public lands, namely, $1.25 an acre. Indeed, it was the cheapness of the lands that made it possible for bootblacks and coachmen and all sorts of people to speculate in them.

Now I ask you in all fairness: is it too much to say that anyone who knows the nature of the public-land question would know these two simple facts?

And finally we come to Mr. Stone's amazing statement that "Fraser's resignation shows that those who run the Times survey are not interested in providing more education." This is, of course, nonsense. I am for more education, and so is Dr. Nevins, and I would

I lay a thousand dollars to one that so also is the New York Times. But the thing we are all opposed to is mis-education, and this is a very serious matter. The opposition would like to draw a red herring across the trail and say: "Oh, yes, Fraser is right. We are not teaching American history adequately, but this is due to the low pay of teachers. Bring on the federal Aid-to-Education bill!" Now I am for this bill, but it does not constitute the answer to the present defective methods of teaching American history. And as for "progressive methods of teaching," if it is "progressive" to teach American history with only the most casual mention of Thomas Jefferson or Andrew Jackson (only 12 per cent knew who Jackson was), then I am the damndest reactionary you ever saw. For I have known the inspiration of Jackson's courage and devotion to the cause of the people!

HUGH RUSSELL FRASER, Chairman
Committee on American History
Washington, April 16

"Grossly Unfair"

Dear Sirs: The article by Mr. Davenport entitled Sikorski's Opposition in your issue of January 30 was grossly unfair and libelous, and I therefore think it would be only fair that you give publicity in the columns of The Nation to the following important facts:

1. The Amerikai Magyar Nepszava is a responsible Hungarian-language publication which has been published continuously for over forty years.

2. In domestic affairs this newspaper has supported consistently the Roosevelt New Deal since 1932.

3. In foreign policy this newspaper has steadfastly opposed Hitlerism and fascism in every form, ever since the menace reared its ugly head. We fought against isolationism even before December 7 and before June 22, 1941. On the Danubian question we have advocated the defeat of Hitler, to be followed by a Democratic Federation, with borders of the individual states based upon the democratic principle of self-determination.

4. The hue and cry against this publication was raised and carried on chiefly by three elements: (a) the Communists, with whom we differed before June 22, because we favored an all-out war against Hitler, whereas they insisted that it was an "imperialist" war; (b) certain Czech propagandists, who prefer to see the reconstruction of the Danubian area on pre-war lines with the restoration of the Little Entente and power politics; (c) a small group of Hungarian Nazis, who disapproved of our vigorous fight against Hitlerism and Hungarian collaboration with the Axis.

I know how difficult it is for you, who cannot read the Hungarian language, to be fully acquainted with the situation affecting the general problem and this newspaper, but in the name of fairness and freedom of the press, I do think no responsible publication, certainly not The Nation, has a right to give space to such unfounded accusations as Mr. Davenport levels against the Amerikai Magyar Nepszava, which enjoys the respect of a large public and which never transgressed either the laws or the spirit of our great country.

M. KAUFMAN, Publisher
Amerikai Magyar Nepszava
New York, March 11

Mr. Davenport Replies

Dear Sirs: The Amerikai Magyar Nepszava may have "supported consistently the Roosevelt New Deal since 1932." This still does not prove that the paper advocated a democratic solution of the Central European problem. I happen to have a concept of democracy in Central Europe which imperatively excludes revisionist programs (which are the essence of the causes of this war) and any whitewashing of Horthy's regime (which is an ally of Hitler's Germany).

I could write pages on this issue, but it would not serve any good purpose. Instead, let me merely call attention to the following typical passages from the Nepszava:

1. "It is undeniable that Bethlen was always anti-Nazi, hated the totalitarian systems, and it is unquestionable that Bethlen's dream was always to bring Hungary into a close friendship with the Anglo-Saxon democracies" (February 1, 1943). May I remind the reader that it was Bethlen who made the pact with Mussolini and who lectured in Hitler's Germany? I wonder whether this was bringing Hungary "into close friendship with the Anglo-Saxon democracies."

2. In an article, Is There any Difference? (March 18, 1943), an attempt is made to exculpate the Hungarian government for its anti-Jewish laws. "It isn't exactly the same whether one's relatives are taken to Lublin or only deprived of their livelihood" . . . "Between the Nürnberg laws and the Hungarian anti-Semitic laws the difference is precisely that between unemployment and Hitler's gas chamber." Need I mention the 25,000 Jews who, according to official reports, were sent from Hungary to Poland?

PETER DAVENPORT

[Accepting the Nepszava's contention that it is not pro-Nazi, we wish to recognize responsibility, and to express regret, for a typographical error in Mr. Davenport's article as a result of which it might have been implied that the Nepszava was an ally of Nazi Germany. Such an accusation was not intended.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

From a Prisoner of War

[This interesting communication, recently received, was written on a card beaded Poste Italiane, Carlolina Postale, per prigionieri de guerra. We assume that books sent to the address given by Mr. Williams will be delivered.]

Dear Sirs: May I impose upon your generosity and that of your readers on behalf of our library? Books on social and political affairs of the last twenty years are sadly lacking, also United States writers of the caliber of Steinbeck and Hemingway, and if you could send me such books they would be welcome indeed. Such books would be a balance between the very light stuff and the technical books we are receiving.

IVOR WILLIAMS,
Italy
Bombardier 861060
Campo P. G. 78, Posta Militare 3300

Where Are the Champions?

Dear Sirs: According to the Washington Merry-Go-Round of April 10, 1943, "Postmaster General Walker's censorship hearings to bar magazines from second-class privileges are absolutely secret. The press cannot attend. For years all hearings of this kind have been open to the public. . . ."

Here is an excellent opportunity for those members of the American press who have been hysterical about the threats to the free press to demonstrate their sincerity. There are many who suspect that this hysteria is a bit of artificial camouflage to conceal their special economic interests. It has been successful for years in protecting them from child-labor legislation. It was used as a weapon against the organization of their reporters. It is now dragged out to preserve their monopoly control of news services.

If the Patterson-McCormick-Hearst-Gannett-Howard press fails to scream to high heaven about this flagrant violation of the principle of the free press, many more will suspect their sincerity. This will be tragic. This suspicion may well breed cynicism not only about the press but about the ideal itself. If ever America should lose its free press, American newspaper publishers can thank themselves and their own cynical exploitation of the ideal to their special interests.

GEORGE E. AXTELL

Washington, D. C., April 10

In New York, Too

Dear Sirs: I was immensely interested in Mr. Stone's article on the difficulty of taking a Negro—no matter how distinguished—to dinner in Washington. I admired him very much for resigning from his club. It is a great pity that the mores of the South should so completely prevail in our national capital.

But here in New York we are not without culpability. A few nights ago a superb testimonial dinner was given to a great Negro preacher on his retirement from his church and his acceptance of the presidency of a Southern college for Negroes. I tried to get an adequate account of it into two of our most-read papers. I was sent in each case the inch and a half of space which had been dedicated to it, and the refusal to print my letter. I retorted that so far as I could see there was plenty of space in these papers for Negro crimes, but when an occasion arose to do honor to a Negro, the papers were singularly reticent.

The white president of the Union Theological Seminary called the Reverend Lloyd Imes one of the most brilliant scholars who had ever graduated from the seminary; he also reported that the white alumni had elected Dr. Imes president of their Alumni Association. There were many warm tributes given eloquently and sincerely by both white and black speakers. In the audience were Negroes who had risen to eminence in many fields. At my small table there were two Negro judges, a Negro editor, a Negro woman lawyer, and a Negro social worker. The only white people were myself and my guest, a Czechoslovakian editor—a woman.

I count on you to print this. Unfortunately, however, your readers are too liberal to learn anything from it. Such facts need to appear in precisely the places where they never do!

ANNIE NATHAN MEYER

New York, April 10

Why Be Precise?

Dear Sirs: Your heading, "Is It an Error?" over the letter of John W. Follette of New Paltz, New York (April 3), would indicate some editorial doubt as to the correctness of Mr. Follette's criticism of Frank Jones for saying "Liben feels badly" instead of "feels bad." My own reaction is that Mr. Follette is correct and that he has stated the rule with precision.

But after all, why be precise? Language may have been invented to conceal our thoughts, but we use it very largely to communicate them; and in the given case we knew that Mr. Jones was not referring to mutilated fingertips but to that general sense of the body we call feeling. So there was no misunderstanding of what Mr. Jones meant, even if he used an adjective as an adverb.

CHARLES Q. DE FRANCE

Lincoln, Neb., April 4

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS WALINSKY teaches economics in a New York City high school, and is president of the New York City Association of Teachers of Economics. EDWARD SARD was formerly an economics teacher, but is now on leave and working for the government.

ALFRED KANTOROWICZ, before Hitler came to power, was a foreign correspondent for the Vossische Zeitung. JOHN W. GERBER runs the short-wave listening station of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

MANUEL SEOANE, former leader of the Aprista Party in Peru, is now living in exile in Chile.

MARIANNE MOORE is one of the most distinguished American poets. Her books include "What Are Years," "Observations," and "The Pangolin and Other Verse."

JOHN SCOTT is the author of "Behind the Urals: An American Worker in Russia's City of Steel," which is based on his experiences as a welder in Magnitogorsk.

ERNEST NAGEL is associate professor of philosophy at Columbia University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

National readers are invited to Annual Luncheon, L. I. D.

ON

FREEDOM FROM WANT

HOTEL McALPIN
New York City

Saturday, MAY 8, 12:45

Speakers:

EVELINE M. BURNS

Director, Security, Work and Relief Policies
Report, National Resources Planning Board

CARTER GOODRICH

Chairman, Governing Body, C. I. O.

R. J. THOMAS

President,
United Automobile Workers, C. I. O.

ROBERT J. WATT

International Representative,
A. F. of L.

BJARNE BRAATØY

President, L. I. D., Chairman

Brief comments by

MARK STARR, JOHN L. CHILDS, HERMAN A. GRAY and others

Panel Discussion at McAlpin
10 A. M. to 12:30

WITH

I. S. FALK E. J. COIL

NORMAN THOMAS

F. ERNEST JOHNSON

EPHRAIM FRISCH

NATHANIEL MINKOFF

ABRAHAM MILLER

OSCAR LANGE

R. A. ABRAMOVITCH

CHARLES C. BERKLEY

MICHAEL M. DAVIS

among the many participants

Write for Details to

Harry W. Laidler

League for Industrial Democracy
112 East 19 St. New York City

LUNCHEON TICKETS: $2.00
PANEL FEE: 50c

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 11

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Warship of the first rank in the days of sail (four words, 4, 2, 3 and 4)
 10 Girl eager for Chinese cloth
 11 Might one call his place of business a site for sore eyes?
 12 State of the feather-headed ones?
 13 Serve white wines, but not red, at this temperature (two words, 3 and 4)
 14 This would be the horse for our money if it were ever a starter
 15 A Scottish shire set this European composer going 16 A sick pet is hard to convince 20 There's something decidedly Irish in this prominent German
 23 Goes out after tea in light fabrics
 24 Give the simpleton a milk pudding for some Swiss cheese
 25 Italian statesman of World War I
 26 They are more advanced than other men — or should be 27 This biblical formula for vengeance would not have worried Argus overmuch (five words, 2, 3, 3, 2 and 3)

DOWN

- 2 Low fellow with a sneaking look
 3 Foolish people perhaps, but it cannot be said today that we want no part of them
 4 Irish secret society owing its origin apparently to a Scot in a low district of England

- 5 Wendell Willkie, for example
 6 Sure all these go to the winner
 7 Town of East Africa, complete with black magic 8 Sambo describes how he reclined in illness
 9 Device known to hunters and politicians — beheaded it's a conversational animal (hyphen, 8 and 5)
 17 A Congressional lame duck? (hyphen, 2 and 5)
 18 Form of absenteeism of which most of us were guilty in our younger days
 19 Like a worn-out glove, maybe (hyphen, 4 and 3)
 20 William Tell bumped him off in the Rossini opera
 21 Don't try to this a quarrel, said Sheridan; you only spoil it
 22 Figures of speech and such like rhetorical decoration

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 10

ACROSS — 1 RUOYANT; 2 WHATNOT; 3 TENDRIL; 10 SPORRAN; 11 OVENS; 12 ELOPEMENT; 14 LIES; 15 TANGENT; 18 AGO; 20 NIS; 21 SHINGLE; 23 FIRM; 28 EXTRIPATE; 29 EMILY; 29 SEESAW; 30 STIFFEN; 31 ROTATES; 32 WANGLES.
 DOWN — 1 BUTTON; 2 OUNCES; 3 ARRESTING; 4 TELLERS; 5 WASHOUT; 6 AROSE; 7 NORSEMAN; 8 TINY TOTS; 13 UGH; 16 NORWEGIAN; 17 NIP; 18 ASSASSOR; 19 OINTMENT; 22 ELAPSES; 23 PIETSAW; 24 FITFUL; 25 HYENAS; 27 RIAN.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Through Hell to Dunkirk.* By Henry de la Palaise. Military Service Publishing Company. $2.50.
Travels in Afghanistan, 1937-1938. By Ernest F. Fox. Macmillan. $4.
The Fighting South. By John Temple Graves. Putnam's. $2.75.
Liberty Through Power. A Study of the United Nations. By Eduard Heimann. Union for Democratic Action Educational Fund. 10 cents.
The Hero in History. A Study in Limitation and Possibility. By Sidney Hook. John Day. $2.50.
The Latin American Collection of the Museum of Modern Art. By Lincoln Kirstein. Museum of Modern Art. $2.
Africa: Facts and Forecasts. By Albert Q. Maisel. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.
The Freedom to Be Free. By James Marshall. John Day. $2.50.
This Was New York. The Nation's Capital in 1789. By Frank Monaghan and Marvin Lowenthal. Doubleday, Doran. $2.75.
Economic Freedom: A Democratic Program. By Charles E. Noyes. Harper. $2.50.
American Reasons. By Bonaro W. Overstreet. Macmillan. $1.
Free Men of America. By Ezequiel Padilla. Ziff-Davis. $2.50.
Rembrandt: Selected Paintings. The Phaidon Press. Oxford. $4.50.
Gerard Manley Hopkins: Priest and Poet. By John Pick. Oxford. $2.75.
Now Is the Moment. By Harold Rugg. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.
Thomas Jefferson. By Hendrik Willem Loon. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
Britain and the British People. By Ernest Barker. Oxford. $1.25.
A Mingled Chime. An Autobiography by Sir Thomas Beecham. Putnam's. $3.50.
Is Germany Incurable? By Richard M. Brickner, M.D. Lippincott. $3.
Our Jewish Farmers and the Story of the Jewish Agricultural Society. By Gabriel Davidson. Fischer. $2.50.
In Peace Japan Breeds War. By Gustav Eckstein. Harper. $2.50.
John Bach McMaster, American Historian. By Eric F. Goldman. Pennsylvania.
Alabama Folk Plays. By Kate Porter Lewis. Edited with an Introduction by Frederick H. Koch. North Carolina. $2.50.
Brothers Under the Skin. By Carey McWilliams. Little, Brown. $3.
A Short View of Elizabethan Drama. By Thomas Marc Parrott and Robert Hamilton Ball. Scribner's. $1.80.
The Tennessee Valley Authority. A Study in Public Administration. By C. Herman Pritchett. North Carolina. $3.50.
Chile: A Geographic Extravaganza. By Benjamin Subercaseaux. Macmillan. $3.
Trees and Test Tubes: The Story of Rubber. By Charles Morrow Wilson. Holt. $3.50.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 8, 1943

NUMBER 19

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

650

EDITORIALS

The Russo-Polish Wound

653

Prices, Wages, and Taxes

654

Actual and Possible

654

ARTICLES

Fiasco at Willow Run by William H. Jordy

655

Myths Can Wreck the Peace by Maxwell S. Stewart

658

75 Years Ago in The Nation

661

The FCC Holds Fast by I. F. Stone

662

North African Triangle by Claude McKay

663

In the Wind

665

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

Europe Against Hitler. II. The Guerrilla Fighters

666

by John W. Gerber and Alfred Kantorowicz

666

Oil for Franco by Selden C. Menefee

669

Goebbels in Katyn

670

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

New Guinea by Karl J. Shapiro

671

I Am the Lord High Executioner by Eliot Janeway

671

Africa, Past and Future by C. Hartley Grattan

673

When the Armistice Comes by M. W. Fodor

674

Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling

675

In Brief

677

Music by B. H. Haggin

677

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

679

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 12 by Jack Barrett

682

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1943, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 56 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

We Render an Accounting

THIS week it is my pleasant duty to report the results of the campaign for funds initiated in February in a letter addressed by me to our regular full-term subscribers. That letter described The Nation's current financial difficulties arising from war-time increases in production costs. It urged subscribers to help create a sustaining fund by becoming members of The Nation Associates, the various classes of membership calling for contributions of from $10 to $100 or more. The letter went to some 12,000 persons. Although the subscription list totals more than 25,000, the remainder is made up of short-term subscribers, libraries, organizations, newspapers, college classes, and other groups to whom it seemed unsuitable to appeal.

The response was so prompt and so generous that within a few weeks it became clear that the $25,000 necessary to clear off the deficit and insure The Nation's existence would undoubtedly come in. And so in the issue of March 27 I reported that reassuring fact. Along with the contributions came a flood of letters expressing the warmth of feeling with which its readers regard The Nation and their determination not to allow this organ of democratic opinion to become a casualty of the war for democratic survival. The letters seemed to us almost as good an insurance for The Nation's future as the money itself.

But not even the encouraging early returns prepared us for the present total count. And the final results are not in yet. Every day brings a few additional checks, so that a further report will be necessary later on. Of the 12,637 subscribers who received letters, more than 26 per cent answered and more than 22 per cent contributed to the fund. The grand total reached by the last day of April was $36,351.19. The expense of the campaign, for typing, postage, mailing, and clerical help, has amounted to $3,489.70.

So The Nation's sustaining fund, contributed by some 2,867 subscribers, stands today at $32,861.49. I believe this result represents something like a record for mail campaigns to raise money.

This figure includes, however, only contributions made as a direct response to the letter to subscribers. Other gifts have come in, some spontaneously from friends who knew of our need for funds, some as the result of special requests to individuals. Such contributions amount to $2,145 more and bring the net total up to $35,006.49.

The editors of The Nation are deeply grateful to the subscribers and other friends who contributed to this formidable result. Our readers have saved the life of their journal and set it on solid ground. We give our particular thanks to the many who contributed more than they could easily afford, believing The Nation more important than their own comforts. We hope they will feel an even closer sense of identification with the journal they have helped through the crisis that threatened its existence.

Now for the future. It is only because of our newly-won security in the present that we are able to plan for a better Nation in the months and years to come. They offer this fighting journal its greatest challenge. The struggle against reaction in domestic and foreign affairs is The Nation's particular job. It is essential that we wage that fight with all the ability we can command and on the widest possible front.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

The Shape of Things

BEFORE THE TWO WEEKS' COAL TRUCE ENDS an agreement is likely to be negotiated which will give John L. Lewis enough of his demands to enable him to claim a victory. Once again the miners' leader has outlasted and outsmarted the government and he has been able to do so primarily because the members of his union were solidly behind him. Believing as we do that Mr. Lewis is an evil influence in the labor movement, we deplore the fact that he should have been allowed to triumph but we recognize that the alternative, at this late date, was a disastrous stoppage of work and a strong probability of bloodshed in the coalfields. Newspapers such as the New York Times are disappointed by the armistice which Mr. Ickes has arranged. The interests they represent were anxious for a showdown, no matter what the cost, and so too it appears were some left-wingers in the Administration. But a fight to a finish would have permanently weakened both the New Deal and the unions and we believe that Mr. Ickes made a wise decision when he sought a basis for a compromise.

✱

THE SETTLEMENT IS LIKELY TO FOLLOW THE lines of the annual wage proposal put forward by Dr. John Steelman during the negotiations between the U. M. W. and the operators. There will be no increase in hourly rates but the miners will be guaranteed a six-day week throughout the coming year with one day paid at overtime rates. According to the operators 90 to 95 per cent of the miners are already working six days a week regularly and, if this is true, the additional cash paid out as the result of a guaranteed annual wage will not be a very formidable sum. Moreover, the owners have already been granted an extra payment on every ton of coal mined to enable them to meet the increased cost of a six-day week. The New York Times, however, in an exaggerated attack on the annual wage proposals points out that the average pre-war working year was 182 days so that 312 days of guaranteed work or wages would increase annual mine wages by about 70 per cent without allowing for the effect of overtime rates. But the other side of the medal is that the system of part-time labor, which the operators maintained so as to take off their shoulders the burden of fluctuating demand, means that a far greater labor force than was really needed was kept under-employed. If the wartime demand for coal is insufficient to keep all the miners fully employed it is intolerable that a surplus should be maintained in the mining villages while elsewhere manpower is at a premium. Thus an annual wage should serve to increase total productive capacity as well as to satisfy the miners.

✱

ADMIRAL ROBERT—NOW IT CAN BE TOLD—does not love us. He has been trying to convey that fact in every possible way for two and a half years, but the American State Department until last week appears to have gone on the assumption that he was just being coy. After the fall of France the little tyrant of Martinique, designated by Vichy as High Commissioner of all French possessions in the Americas, rounded up Allied sympathizers, ruthlessly suppressed De Gaulle activity of any sort, and by short wave unloosed a barrage of pro-Axis propaganda, including warm congratulations to the Japanese on their accomplishments at Pearl Harbor. While the Admiral was so engaged the State Department undertook and continued a series of endless conversations with him, affecting to treat him as a sovereign ruler despite the fact that he openly relayed all American proposals to Vichy for the approval of Pierre Laval. When we moved into North Africa, Robert called on the people of his domains to obey Marshal Pétain and denounced Darlan for "exceeding his powers." All this we forgave. But now the Admiral has gone too far. He chides us for the unkind treatment we have meted out to Frenchmen who came over to our side in the past and makes his own switch to the United Nations dependent on a kind of De Gaulle-Giraud union which appeals to De Gaulle more than it does to Giraud. This is no doubt an uncharitable view of last week's break with Robert and the cancellation of the hard-won agreements. Actually the State Department's belated discovery of the Admiral's subservience to Vichy is a hopeful augury. Any week now we may have official word that General Franco is a Fascist.

SWEDISH AND GERMAN RELATIONS, LONG decidedly frigid, have recently been reduced to a still lower temperature by Nazi violations of Swedish neutrality. The most serious incident has been the attack made by the armed German merchant ship Altkirch on the Swedish submarine Draken while both were in Swedish territorial waters. In the course of investigations it was discovered that German mines had been sown inside the three-mile limit and it is suspected that these may have been responsible for the unexplained disappearance of another Swedish submarine, the Ulven. A sharp note was dispatched from Stockholm on April 19 protesting against these German actions and asking for immediate steps to prevent their repetition. The German reply admitted that the Altkirch had fired on the Draken but asserted that the incident had occurred outside Swedish waters. Disclaiming all responsibility, the Nazi note declared that the Draken should not have been operating submerged and requested the Swedish government to give instructions to its submarines so as to prevent any similar occurrence. Terming this answer unsatisfactory, Stockholm retorted with a second note which included a warning that Swedish warships had been instructed to take action against any foreign ship committing belligerent acts in territorial waters. In the Swedish press there has been severe condemnation of the insolent tone of the German reply, which seems well calculated to increase the dislike of the Swedes for their government's policy of giving transit rights to Nazi soldiers on furlough from Norway. Recently several meetings of the small Swedish Nazi party have been violently disrupted. Such breaches of the well-known political decorum of the Swedes suggest that democratic patience is wearing thin.

✱

MEETING IN ANNUAL SESSION, WITH AN impressive show of strength, the All-India Moslem League has come close to justifying England's wartime policy in India. The British have contended primarily that full self-government now would result in civil war, which, with Japan at the gates, is hardly to be encouraged. The stock answer of the Congress Party has been that the Moslems, with their demands for a separate nation, are merely jockeying for a good bargaining position and that, given freedom, Congress and Moslem League would quickly iron out their differences within the framework of a united country. Short of firing in the streets, the Moslems who met at New Delhi last week under the leadership of Mohammed Ali Jinnah went as far as they could go to repudiate that comfortable interpretation. Six thousand of them, including 1,200 delegates, four provincial premiers, and two members of the Viceroy's Council, listened to Jinnah heap insults on Mohandas K. Gandhi, whom he described as the worst enemy of Indian freedom. "I'm not holding any brief for this wretched British government," he told them, "but it serves no purpose to say that the British prevent an agreement." On the contrary, the real issue, according to Jinnah, is the prospective attempt by the British to force Moslems and Hindus into a common federation. Should that happen, the delegates unanimously resolved, the move "will be resisted by Moslem India with all its might, which will inevitably result in strife, bloodshed, and misery." With due allowance for the oratorical flourishes appropriate to such occasions, it is difficult to take issue with the modest conclusion of Herbert L. Matthews, reporting the session for the New York Times. The resolution, writes Mr. Matthews, "immensely strengthens the British contention that the peoples of India cannot seem to get together."

✱

WHITEWASH, WE ARE CONVINCED, MAKES A poor cement for the United Nations; it positively invites the throwing of mud. And that we fear may be the effect of the film version of ex-Ambassador Joseph Davies's "Mission to Moscow," which, with the aid of a technically brilliant production, undertakes a complete exculpation of Soviet policies in the years just preceding the war. On the purges, the Russo-German Pact, and the first Finnish war it offers the straight party line. This may prove good propaganda for unsophisticated audiences but we suspect that it will stir up old controversies in a way that can only damage our relations with Russia. While we are allied with the Soviets in a joint struggle against aggression it is but good sense to stress the interests which bind us together rather than the ideas that divide us. But friendship can only be strained by asking Americans to give a blanket indorsement to all Soviet actions past and present. In the matter of the "purges" The Nation has always held that the evidence on which the alleged Trotskyist conspirators were convicted was unconvincing and the film version of the trials does nothing to change this opinion. Moreover, we note that the film takes some extraordinary liberties with recorded fact. For example, the "Radek trial" of January, 1936, and the "Bukharin trial" of March, 1936, are telescoped into one and Marshal Tukhachevsky, who actually was not arrested and shot until June of that year, is made to appear as one of the accused. Still worse, he is given lines to speak which, properly, according to Mr. Davies's own book, belong to Muralov. This casual manipulation of history in what is, a priori, a documentary film does not inspire confidence.

✱

THAT IT IS MUCH TOO EARLY TO BEGIN TO talk of resuming non-essential civilian production was the main burden of the address made to the United States Chamber of Commerce last week by Lieutenant General Brehon B. Somervell, chief of the Army Service Forces.

The same view was put forward at a press conference in Washington several days earlier by Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson. These two authoritative statements fully confirm the misgivings expressed in our Washington letter of two weeks ago, Relaxing Too Soon. General Somervell revealed that we do not always have enough essential cargo for our shipping and decried rumors that we have vast stocks of arms and ammunition: "The enemy could implant no more subtle propaganda in the minds of our people." The propaganda in this case is coming from circles anxious to resume "business as usual" at the expense of the war effort. "Any notion," Under Secretary Patterson said, "that the work of equipping the armed forces is nearly done, and that we can resume normal peacetime production of goods for general use, instead of equipment for the Army and Navy, shows that the people who believe that just don't understand war."

✱

THE RUBBER PATENTS OFFERED ROYALTY free by Standard Oil of New Jersey were taken over by the Alien Property Custodian in March of 1942 as the enemy-owned property of I. G. Farben. The A. P. C. has neither approved nor been consulted about the current offer, and there are signs that both the Custodian and the Department of Justice are examining this gift horse. To obtain the patents, an inventor must show his own to Rubber Reserve Company, which has been Standard Oil's ally in the past. If Rubber Reserve thinks his ideas worth while, he will be allowed to take a license under Standard's patents and in return to give Standard free licenses on his own. Since Standard claims that the old I. G. Farben patents it is now offering are the basic patents of the Buna synthetic rubber field, the man who takes a license under them will be acknowledging their validity, which has yet to be tested in the courts. Once having accepted the basic patents, a rubber company will need the improvements on them and these after the war will be obtainable only on Standard's terms. Under this setup, the Buna S synthetic tire industry would become a non-competitive pool dominated by Standard Oil. Standard is not offering licenses, royalty free or otherwise, on its patents for butadiene, the raw material of buna rubber. Nor is it offering patents on butyl, a cheaper synthetic rubber which Standard is holding back as its own private ace-in-the-hole.

✱

THIS SUSPICIOUSLY MAGNANIMOUS OFFER by a company never before conspicuous for generosity to business rivals calls for investigation. We hope the Truman or the Kilgore committee will look into it. An inquiry is made especially important by indications that Standard would like to resume its old cartel relationship with I. G. Farben after the war. Standard management has tried to dissuade a minority stockholder group headed by William Floyd II and Amos S. Basel from offering an anti-cartel resolution in the proxy statements being sent out this year to shareholders in preparation for the annual election in June. The management has already put out "feelers" to the Justice Department for some method whereby cartels could be reestablished legally after the war is over. So far these have met with the cold shoulder they deserve. If the present "free royalty" offer is successful and later the cartel is resumed, I. G. would again dominate the American synthetic rubber industry. Under the Hague agreement of 1939, I. G. would resume a majority in the Buna patents should they be returned by the Alien Property Custodian either to I. G. or Standard. Fortunately President Roosevelt has given his word that this time we will not let patents of this kind slip back under alien influence. We look to the Alien Property Custodian to stop the current offer and honor that pledge. The A. P. C. holds title to these patents and can make them part of the public domain.

✱

GRADE LABELING OF ALL PRODUCTS FOR which quality standards can be established is essential for the full protection of consumers in peacetime. In wartime it is doubly important for price ceilings cannot possibly be effective so long as they can be evaded by tampering with quality. Nevertheless after weeks of wobbling on this subject Price Administrator Prentiss Brown has ordered the elimination from OPA Order MPR-306 of a requirement that certain canned foods packed in 1943 be labeled A, B, or C according to quality. Instead, suppliers of these goods are ordered to state the grade on invoices to retailers who will then be able to pass on the information to inquisitive consumers. This move is announced as a "compromise," which is itself a fine example of misleading labeling. It gives the vested interests who have been fighting honest grading all they want but it will not and should not be accepted by the consumer organizations. Inside the OPA the fight against grade labeling was led by Dan Gerber and Norman Sorenson—both closely associated with canning companies. They have now resigned their official positions but they passed the torch to Lou B. Maxon, a Detroit advertising man brought into the OPA by Mr. Brown. His agency handles the H. J. Heinz account. Mr. Maxon has gone on record as saying that grade labeling is "a reform that should not be attempted in wartime." The best comment on this statement has been made in the official publication of the canning industry which is by no means unanimously opposed to honest labeling. "That this is a reform measure," says an editorial in the Canning Trade, "is absolutely true, a reform for the betterment of the whole industry and particularly for the canners."

The Russo-Polish Wound

STALIN'S May Day declaration with its stern insistence on unconditional surrender of the Axis and its friendly references to the American and British forces should serve to dampen Nazi hopes of enlarging the breach in the United Nations opened by the quarrel between Russia and the Polish government-in-exile. Furthermore it should encourage the American and British governments to persevere in their efforts to liquidate this deplorable affair. But we should not deceive ourselves into believing that this end can be accomplished by polite diplomatic formulas, for it is a very ancient wound that Goebbels has inflamed with his propagandist poison.

If we were to attempt to outline the pathological history of this case, we would have to go back at least as far as the eighteenth century. But a rapid review of the last twenty-five years is sufficient to suggest the difficulty of any permanent cure. When Poland was resurrected in 1918 it discarded none of the illusions of grandeur which had helped to sustain it through long years of alien rule. Encouraged by western diplomacy, which sought to build up barriers against both Russia and Germany, it attempted to play the role of a great power although it had not the material equipment for the part. This led to numerous aggressive ventures such as the seizure of Vilna from Lithuania.

At home, during these years, Poland sought to graft a modern industrial economy onto a feudal base with results fatal to any growth of democracy. Behind a constitutional facade the country was ruled by a practical dictatorship in the interests of an oligarchy. And this fact helped to keep the old Polish-Russian wound open for in the eastern provinces the great landlords were mainly Polish while the peasants were Ukrainian. There was constant friction between these two elements and, at times, savage suppression of Ukrainian institutions and organizations.

It is the future of these eastern provinces which is the basic cause of the present impasse. The original border settlement between reborn Poland and the U. S. S. R. gave most of them to the latter. But Poland regained these disputed lands, with their largely non-Polish population, after defeating Russia with the aid of France in 1921. When the Russians marched into Poland in September, 1939, and negotiated a partition agreement with Hitler they proceeded to incorporate Polish Ukraine and White Russia within the Soviet Union. With its two gigantic enemies digesting its territories in apparent amity, Poland once again ceased to exist except as a cadre of officials and a small army.

The invasion of Russia by the Nazis in June, 1941, seemed to make possible a rapprochement between Poland and its old enemy. General Sikorski, head of the government-in-exile, was statesman enough to seize the opportunity. He quickly negotiated an agreement with the Soviet government which apparently left the difficult frontier question in abeyance until after the war. Meanwhile Polish prisoners in Russia were released and a Polish army organized on Russian soil with the announced purpose of helping to repel the invaders. Unhappily General Sikorski's efforts were not fully backed by his colleagues. The signing of the treaty led to a crisis in the government-in-exile and the resignation of three of its members. Thereafter reactionary elements among the émigrés—and for the most part it was the reactionaries, landlords, army officers and diplomats who had been able to escape—began an increasingly bitter propaganda campaign against Russia. General Sikorski, as Professor Oscar Lange, formerly of the University of Cracow, has pointed out in a letter to the New York Herald Tribune, tried to meet this situation by appeasement. He has succeeded only in inflaming the "nationalist hysteria" of the anti-Soviet agitators.

Relations between the Poles and Russians have also been embittered by certain concrete acts on the part of both governments. For instance, the Polish Army in Russia was transferred at the request of the Polish government to the Near East. The Russian government let it go but it clearly considered that it might have been better employed helping the Red Army repel the invader. Another cause of friction was the plan formulated by the Poles for a Central European Federation which, in view of the record and interests of its authors, was regarded in Moscow as an effort to construct an anti-Soviet bloc. The interest displayed in some American quarters in the idea of a cordon sanitaire served both to encourage the Poles and to heighten Russian suspicion.

The Kremlin, for its part, enraged the Poles by indicating plainly that it regarded the disputed eastern provinces as definitely part of the U. S. S. R. and by issuing passports to all the inhabitants of this territory exiled in Russia. Finally it committed an appalling blunder by executing Alter and Ehrlich, thus throwing Polish labor elements into the arms of the reactionaries and alienating western liberals. By this time the wound was fully ready for Goebbels's skilled attention.

In the letter already mentioned, Professor Lange makes it clear that the situation demands a new and different government-in-exile. It must be a government prepared to find a basis for good-neighborly relations with Russia, for Poland cannot hope to survive while it remains on bad terms with the two powerful nations which border it. The landlords and militarists who dominate the present government are no more capable of the mental adjustment necessary to implement such a policy than they are of giving effect to the radical political and economic program which has been formulated by the Polish underground movement. While they remain in control there can be little hope for Poland.

Prices, Wages, and Taxes

UNLIKE John L. Lewis's United Mine Workers, organized labor as a whole has accepted the principle of President Roosevelt's hold-the-line anti-inflation order. But while accepting the necessity for over-all control, both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. are up in arms against certain features of the present controls which they hold to be inequitable. Resentment is particularly strong against the fact that under the order wages are frozen to the level of September 15, 1942, while prices have been allowed to rise well beyond that level. The situation is made even worse by the inability of the War Labor Board, under the prevailing interpretation of the order, to correct "inequities" in prevailing wage rates in face of wide variation of wages for similar work.

To meet the problem several of the C. I. O. unions have launched a campaign urging that prices be rolled back to the level of September 15, 1942, and that the War Labor Board's power to correct inequities be restored. The justice of these demands cannot be denied. Of all the groups in the population, the wage and salary workers have undoubtedly borne the heaviest burden in the national economic stabilization program. Workers are concerned primarily by the fact that their wages seem to be frozen completely, while the cost of living continues to mount despite the so-called price ceilings. If the freezing of wages is essential as an anti-inflation measure, then, labor argues, the least that the government can do is to roll back prices to the same level.

From a realistic point of view, however, the wisdom of the demand for a roll back in prices is open to serious question. There is an abundance of evidence to show that the OPA more than has its hands full trying to enforce present ceilings. The growth in black markets is not due primarily, as many people seem to believe, to any slackness in OPA enforcement. With its limited powers and staff, it has done a man-sized job, but experience with price restrictions the world over has shown that if prices are pegged too low supplies either are withheld or flow into a black market. Some of the price rises recently authorized by the OPA have been forced upon it by the threat of black market operation. A roll back in prices such as the C. I. O. suggests might be accomplished successfully with some goods, but with others it would inevitably encourage the black market with all of its attendant evils. Politically, it would be extremely difficult to achieve even in those commodities where no black market threat exists.

If prices cannot be rolled back, something must obviously be done about wages. There are various ways in which this can be done without impairing the President's hold-the-line order. Perhaps the most satisfactory approach would be through a system of guaranteed annual wages as discussed in a recent issue of The Nation. Another possibility is the equalization of wage rates for similar work in various sections of the country. Equal pay for equal work is a principle that cannot be violated without causing endless trouble. There is also an unassailable case for making the Little Steel formula flexible enough to cover past and future changes in the cost of living. Canada has met this problem successfully by providing for an automatic increase in wages whenever the cost-of-living index rises by 5 per cent.

The chief objection to such an orderly method of wage and price adjustment is, of course, that it leaves a loophole for inflation. As long as any element in the price-wage structure is permitted to rise, a constant upward trend is to be expected. This trend cannot, however, be checked by wage and price restrictions alone. While additional purchasing power is being created by credit expansion and war production and the supply of goods is limited by WPB restrictions, either prices will rise or goods will be driven into the black markets. In the final analysis, the only effective way of dealing with this inflationary pressure is by increased taxes and forced savings. If, as there seems every reason to believe, organized labor is really serious in its desire to get behind the President's anti-inflation program, it should throw its mass support behind a drive to force Congress to adopt the Administration's tax recommendations. A good stiff tax program, based on the principle of capacity to pay, would do more than anything else to eliminate the nightmare of rising prices and static wages.

Actual and Possible

THE National Resources Development Report for 1943 throws a good deal of light on the course of war production during the past year and on its possibilities this year. Its most interesting revelation is that, while the war production program has been scaled downward, its cost has gone up. "War expenditures," the report says, "were forecast in 1943 budget as 55 billion dollars for the fiscal year ending June, 1943. Because of speeding up of contracts and subsequent increases in cost, actual expenditures in fiscal 1943 will approximate 76 billion dollars." A much greater inflation in costs than appears at first glance is indicated by these figures. The 1942 budget estimates were based on the President's Victory Program of January, 1942. One of the largest items in that program, the total for Army supply, as revealed by our Washington editor in The Nation two weeks ago, was cut in half between January and November of 1942. All other programs except shipbuilding have also been reduced. Obviously armament costs have been tremendously swollen. The average increase, moderately estimated, must be at least 75 per cent.

The increase in prices for armament and munitions, the report indicates, was far greater than for civilian goods. "Of the total expenditures of $82 billion," the report says of civilian purchases, "$10 billion was represented by payments due to higher prices." The difference in the magnitude of price increases on civilian goods, as compared with war goods, may be attributable to the fact that the OPA has had no authority whatever over arms and many of the components of arms. Included in the category of war goods on which the sky has been the limit are such crucial items as aviation gas and synthetic rubber components. Obviously a great deal of profiteering is going on and there is no indication that renegotiation of contracts is doing more than skimming the surface of the cream.

The report shows that we are still some distance from an all-out effort. The consumption of goods and services by civilians continued to rise during 1942 and did not begin to show a decline until the last quarter. We spent a third of our income on war during 1942, but in the last quarter the rate had risen to 44 per cent. Expenditures, however, as the report points out, are no real index of war production since many payments were payments in advance and prices were rising sharply. In 1942, as in 1941, we enjoyed guns and butter. We cannot hope to do so much longer.

The report finds that under conditions of equal distribution of foods and essential civilian goods, we could produce two and a half times as much this year as last and 42 per cent more than the highest forecast for this year. An effort of this kind would insure victory and shorten the war but is possible only under strict rationing, wise allocation of basic materials, and efficient utilization of plant and labor. These possibilities are a challenge to the capacity of business, government, and labor. Can we realize them?

Fiasco at Willow Run

BY WILLIAM H. JORDY

SO EXCITING are the blueprints for Bomber City, the war-housing development planned for Henry Ford's Willow Run bomber plant, that the restrained editors of Architectural Forum have described it as "the most workable and most human guide to the integrated community produced to date." But Bomber City exists only on paper. It will never be built.

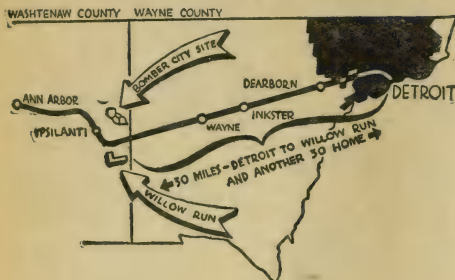

There were early indications that things were not going well—surveyors' stakes pulled up and Ford's lawyers threatening to fight Bomber City "with every legal means"—but the excuse of military secrecy was invoked to avoid answering questions. Persistent rumors of a labor shortage at Willow Run have been met by persistent company claims that "the condition of labor has improved." OWI charges that no bombers were leaving the assembly line brought the retort, "Bomber output on schedule." In February the Truman committee visited Willow Run—its second trip—and there was hope that some information would be forthcoming. Newspaper reports of the visit were vague, but they did show that bomber output was far behind schedule, that the principal reason for the lag was a serious labor shortage, and that Edsel Ford, with magnificent effrontery, had implored the committee to speak to the War Manpower Commission. Another reason advanced for the small output was the necessity for changes in design. Senators were said to have gone away much impressed with the "activity" they had witnessed.

It is now more than two months since the Truman committee left Willow Run, and the Detroit Free Press still publishes the reasons workers give for quitting Ford's employ. On many days the Ford Company loses more labor than it hires. In addition, the absentee rate tops 7 per cent, as compared with an average of 2 to 4 per cent for all industries, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Today 35,000 are employed at Willow Run; 88,000 are needed. The secretary of the United Automobile Workers in a report to the Truman committee characterized employment of 88,000 as a "fantastic impossibility." The reason? An extreme shortage in housing and transportation facilities which the abortive Bomber City project was designed to correct.

To realize why Willow Run can obtain so little labor it is necessary to understand the plant's location. Willow Run is about four miles from Ypsilanti, a university town of 12,000 people. Ann Arbor, twelve miles away, has fewer than 30,000. Willow Run is therefore thirty miles from the nearest good-sized source of labor, namely, Detroit. Last summer, U. A. W. statistics showed that 70 per cent of Willow Run's labor commuted more than thirty miles each way every day. Or, as the Detroit worker reckons it, he loses two hours' pay daily in commuting, with the choice of driving his own car along crowded Michigan Avenue or squeezing into a painfully over-crowded bus or train and paying daily fares in excess of a dollar. With every edition of the Detroit papers carrying six to eight pages of help-wanted pleas, he can do better elsewhere.

Willow Run is situated (see diagram) just within Washtenaw County, its eastern end not more than twenty-five feet from the Wayne County boundary. Ford explains this careful tailoring as an effort to simplify his tax structure and protective services; of course these benefits, plus added accessibility to labor, could have been obtained by locating the plant entirely within Wayne County. But the Washtenaw site has other advantages. In the first place, he has been steadily acquiring land in Washtenaw County for soy-bean cultivation after the war. It is to his advantage to have amid his bean rows a government-financed factory which can later be converted to the manufacture of plastic planes. Secondly, as the largest landowner in a predominantly rural county, Ford dominates Washtenaw politics and thereby enjoys judicial sanction for his anti-labor practices, which would not be the case in labor-dominated Wayne County. Thirdly, by forcing his workers to travel long distances he makes labor organization extremely difficult.

Willow Run—Close to Conservative Courts and Post-War Soy Beans, but Far from Labor.

The government yielded to Ford's preference as to location, in what was to prove the first in a whole series of appeasements. The choice was made before Pearl Harbor, when few thought about gasoline and tires. After we had entered the war, the War Production Board surveyed the site with misgivings. Having made the initial mistake, the government tried to rectify it by authorizing the Federal Public Housing Authority to erect a town about three miles from the plant to accommodate 32,000 residents who would depend upon the immense factory for their livelihood after the war.

Apparently, the thought of 32,000 potential union members blighting his garden paradise worried Ford, and he proceeded at once to undermine the project. First he attempted to arrange extensive transportation to Willow Run to obviate the necessity for Bomber City, but, because of already insuperable transportation difficulties within the Detroit area, he met with little success. Next he announced that there was no water on the proposed site, but soon afterward the first well was dug. Then occurred the much-publicized stake-pulling where a corner of Bomber City encroached on his land.

In alliance with local political, banking, and real-estate interests, Ford clamored for a Congressional investigation, and all plans were suspended for weeks last summer while the Truman committee held its first hearings. Ford's lawyers introduced the bogey of a "ghost town"—perhaps the Ford Company would abandon Willow Run after the war—though earlier Ford himself had boasted: "When the war is over we are going to retain the building . . . and construct airplanes on a mass-production scale." At the same time Washtenaw's Republican politicians speedily conjured up a population for the potential "ghost town": "the flotsam and jetsam of humanity . . . a source of public attention both as to law enforcement, social work, and public assistance." Finally, the Detroit realtors, piously deploring the needless extension of sewer lines, offered to erect houses on their lots, where public-utilities lines were already at hand. Conveniently ignoring the existing housing shortage in the Detroit area—estimated to reach 12,000 units by next summer—the distance from the plant, and the undesirability of most of the available lots for residential purposes, they bolstered their arguments with the appeal, "Every home sold to a war worker gives him a stake in the America we are fighting to preserve."

Largely as a result of the Truman investigation, plans for Bomber City shrank from 6,000 permanent dwellings to 2,500. This tapering would save critical materials and comply with downward revisions in labor requirements made by the Ford Company. Still dissatisfied, however, and thwarted in its attempts to shelve all plans for Bomber City, the Ford alliance proceeded to agitate for 2,500 temporary houses, to be demolished after the war.

Meanwhile the FPHA continued work on what has justifiably been heralded as America's best town planning to date. As originally designed for 6,000 families, Bomber City would have comprised a town center surrounded by five neighborhood subtowns, each with 1,200 dwellings. The reduced plan called for a town center and three subtowns of 700 dwellings each. Developed according to the ideas of Clarence Perry of the Russell Sage Foundation, each subtown was planned to support a centrally located public school, which would serve for all community purposes during the war. Other community buildings and shops were to be erected later, so that the subtowns would eventually become self-contained units. In contrast both to the inflexibility of a gridiron pattern and to the haphazard ribbon roadways of the usual high-priced suburban development, small lanes within the subtowns were arranged so as to provide informal yet sociable groupings of individual families. These lanes were subordinate to circulating roads which brought the subtowns together and provided direct and safe routes to the town center. The center was to contain a shopping district, municipal buildings, a clinic, a high school, and a bus terminal, all facing a central promenade, with parking areas behind. A mile-wide green belt, surrounding and infiltrating the town, emphasized the spacious conception which inspired all the planning.

Contracts for the subtowns were awarded to three outstanding progressive architectural firms. Eliel Saarinen, the brilliant Finnish modernist, was to plan the town center. The United Automobile Workers, whose housing committee has been one of the most farsighted planning agencies in Detroit, was appointed consultant.

By September, 1942, FPAA engineers had prepared the sites and laid out the roadway system, and architects had designed the subtowns. Everything was ready for erection. Then—word from Washington that there would be no Bomber City after all. The 2,500 permanent units suddenly were to be 2,500 temporary units.

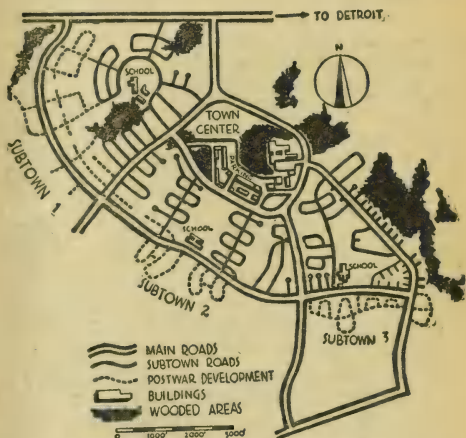

Precisely what happened at this point is known only to those directly involved. But it is certain that the opponents of Bomber City had been gaining influence in Washington, particularly since the National Housing Agency shifted its favor to temporary rather than permanent dwellings in order to halve both the time required for building and the consumption of critical materials. Faced with being labeled "unpatriotic," and fearful that no housing at all would be erected, the U. A. W., which had been the only organized group in Detroit consistently favoring a permanent city at Willow Run, abruptly switched to the official view. In doing so it knocked the last prop from Bomber City, sending thousands of dollars' worth of planning down the skids which private interests had so long been greasing.

Has the shift to temporary housing actually saved time? Despite the fact that standard plans, used for housing projects all over the country, are now to be used at Willow Run, more than six months have elapsed since the decision, and building has only now been started. Has it saved materials? Very little. Because sewer, electric, and telephone lines require large amounts of critical materials, temporary housing erected near already existing facilities does conserve materials; but even temporary housing at Bomber City necessitates an extensive new utility system. Moreover, permanent buildings could have been erected, as is being done in many localities, with the installation of fixtures requiring critical materials postponed until after the war. In any case, the few tons of critical materials that might be gained for bombers by leaving Bomber City unbuilt are far more than offset by the loss of thousands of equally critical workers who refuse to travel to Willow Run.

Today a skeleton of partially completed, muddy roadways remains as Bomber City's only memorial. In one corner of the site are 3,000 crudely furnished temporary dormitory units for single workers, with 2,000 more planned. The 2,500 temporary family units, to be squeezed into one of the subtown sites originally planned for 1,200 units, will not be ready before midsummer. About 2,000 trailers for childless couples—900 now ready, and the rest promised within two months—will complete Bomber City. Meanwhile, realtors are hacking the open land around Ypsilanti, Wayne, and Inkster into tiny plots on which "minimal-standard" houses—the only kind permitted by the WPB—are being erected. Well-planned permanent housing by the government would have been unpatriotic; these substandard permanent houses, which will blight Michigan communities long after the war, presumably represent the apogee of the American Way.

At best this makeshift housing will afford minimal living requirements for the 30,000 people now working at the plant, though both the union and the Army Air Corps predict 88,000 will be needed, and even Ford's estimates are pegged at 58,000. The Manpower Commission expects that one-third of these people will find quarters in nearby towns, but the Detroit housing shortage is already serious, and a survey by the Detroit Free Press unearthed no more than 300 vacancies in Ann Arbor. The town council of Grosse Pointe, a swank Detroit suburb, recently informed a woman that she was violating a local law by renting rooms to war workers, and ordered her to evict them. The council was upheld by most of the residents.

*Bomber City—Designed for Living.
It Will Never Be Built.*

The worst of the story is that even the meager federal projects now being planned will literally be islands in a sea of tarpaper shacks, tents, and trailers, with some families living underground in abandoned foundations covered by temporary roofs. Bomber City's sewer system is fairly adequate, and its water supply is pure, but the federal townsite is encircled by thousands of unapproved privies and shallow wells. Dysentery is rife, and the Washtenaw Board of Health warns against a typhoid epidemic. The forty-bed hospital in Ypsilanti is pitifully inadequate. Schools are so overcrowded that they offer three hours of classes a day in three shifts, and government-built schools and nurseries will not be available before September; as a result delinquency is increasing at an alarming rate. There is no shopping center, no recreational facilities—and gasoline rationing keeps workers tied to their desolate quarters. Small wonder that Ford loses workers as fast as he takes them on; small wonder that Ford agents are desperately inveigling single women workers from points as far away as New York and Texas.

The U. A. W. has suggested to the Truman committee five palliatives: (1) Along with an immediate expansion of the present housing program, the entire area around Willow Run should be commandeered for war workers, and all houses standing vacant for sale should be rented for the duration. (2) Willow Run should subcontract to available plant space in Detroit, Flint, and Pontiac. (3) The Ford Company should abandon its discrimination against hiring Negro women—hundreds being available in the Ypsilanti area. (4) Shuttle train service should be established between Detroit and Willow Run. (5) Perhaps most important, the government should immediately set up a federal agency with uniform control over housing, health, recreation, and education within the area.

This program, far from being a cure, is merely the least salvage operation to which the American people are entitled. The production which has been lost—and is yet to be lost—can be measured only in reference to the battlefield, wherever another bomber would have brought us just that much closer to victory.

Myths Can Wreck the Peace

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

DURING the past two or three years a great deal of work has been done in Washington and elsewhere preparatory to laying the foundations of the post-war world. Some of the results may be seen in both the domestic and the international field, and their significance should not be minimized. Yet despite all this valuable spade work, the American people are clearly not ready for peace. Technically, we have made much progress. Our experts have the knowledge that should enable us to avoid the blunders of 1919. But no scheme worked out by the experts, however sound in theory, can succeed without the backing of American public opinion. And on the basis of such samplings of public opinion as have been made, the conclusion is inescapable that the American people are still unprepared to support any scheme that goes far enough to be likely to bring about lasting peace.

Three prominent, exceptionally well-informed Americans from three widely separated sections of the country were recently asked to tell what the people of their regions thought about post-war reconstruction. Despite sectional differences, their accounts disclosed little disagreement on fundamentals. Apparently most Americans are prepared to have the United States exercise some responsibility in international affairs, and most of them recognize that we must cooperate more effectively for peace than we did before the war. But all three observers testified to the fact, as one stated it, that there is "almost no understanding of the economic implications of an effective international organization." All the evidence indicates a tremendous gap between the plans being worked out by the experts and the views of the man in the street. This gap should be a matter of grave concern. In some respects American public opinion is not even so advanced as it was in 1918. It has no concrete symbol around which it can rally such as it had after the last war. Most of us have forgotten how popular the League idea was at that time. Headed by ex-President William Howard Taft, the League to Enforce Peace succeeded in getting a great deal of support for a league that would prevent war. It enlisted some 350,000 volunteer speakers and persuaded twenty-six state legislatures and hundreds of chambers of commerce to back the idea. Yet America rejected the League of Nations in 1920.

Nor does America today appear willing to make the concessions in national sovereignty that must be made before an international organization can be expected to succeed. This reluctance is not due to any lack of vision or courage on the part of our leaders. Both President Roosevelt and Vice-President Wallace fully understand the need for American initiative in planning for the period that lies ahead. But after the last war we also had a President with courage and understanding. Woodrow Wilson failed, not through lack of imagination or leadership, but because American public opinion was not really behind him.

Many more people are giving thought to post-war problems now than in those years. There is a good deal of recognition of the seriousness of the situation. But there is also confusion, uncertainty, misunderstanding,

This confusion in the mind of the public is due partly to lack of information and partly to persisting pre-war prejudices. There is a dusty jumble of myths and bugaboos that must be cleared away before our statesmen can make a frontal attack on post-war problems.

One of the most stubborn misconceptions is that Uncle Sam is a benevolent simpleton in a world of smooth shysters plotting to take advantage of him at every turn. Perhaps some historical basis for this view exists; before the war of 1812 the young republic of the United States had substantial difficulty in making the European powers respect its rights. But it is hard to recall any occasion in the last century on which the United States was outsmarted by a foreign country. On the other hand, many instances could be cited of our being led through fear of the "wily foreigner" to adopt policies which hurt us more than anyone else.

Far more dangerous than this vague distrust of foreigners, which has its counterpart in every nation, are the prejudices that have developed regarding our three great allies—Great Britain, China, and Russia. Suspicion of "perfidious Albion" is deep-seated in this country. To some extent it is semi-rational in that it is nourished by our large population of Irish descent. But a great deal of it apparently rests on nothing better than the biased treatment of the Revolutionary War in many of our school textbooks.

Strangely enough, we seem to feel more friendly toward China at the moment than toward either England or Russia. But underneath this superficial friendliness the myth of the "yellow peril" persists and is applied to the Chinese as well as to the Japanese. Not only are the Chinese subject to the same humiliating restrictions with regard to immigration as the Japanese, but before the war they actually faced greater obstacles in seeking entry to this country. Recent efforts to have the immigration laws eased as a gesture of United Nations solidarity have run up against a stone wall of opposition in Congress.

Suspicion of Russia is of course extremely widespread. It stands as the most serious obstacle to the creation of an all-out United Nations war strategy and to the immediate formulation of post-war plans for the world. The sources of this feeling are complex. Undoubtedly it is in part the outgrowth of a systematic campaign of misrepresentation long carried on by people who regarded communism as a threat to their status in life. But the Soviet government itself contributed to this suspicion by making it difficult for newspapermen and scholars to obtain undoctored and complete information on many aspects of Soviet life. For a long period after the revolution few newspapers maintained regular correspondents in the Soviet Union itself. The men who were supposed to cover Russia were stationed in Riga and Warsaw, and these cities became regular rumor factories, turning out a never-ending succession of stories of starvation, revolts, and massacres—stories that were usually either gross exaggerations or sheer fabrications. These tales have left a mark on American thinking that makes post-war cooperation difficult.

With a view to dividing the Allies, the Nazis have sought to perpetuate old misunderstandings and to create new ones. We have all heard whispers to the effect that the British were holding back; that China was ready to make a deal with Japan; that Russia was either too weak to hold out against Hitler and would end by making peace with the Axis, or that it was getting too strong and might overrun Europe. If stories of this sort can circulate when our very lives depend on the strength and unity of the United Nations, what can we expect after the struggle has been won and the danger removed?

Some of the myths which have influenced our thinking are not truly myths at all; they are lies that have been consciously perpetrated for political purposes. But they are really no more dangerous than the outworn economic ideas which most of us carry around as excess baggage. These ideas are not the result of foreign machinations. They are good old American ideas which many of us have had all of our lives. The grandfather of them all is the assumption that our prosperity as a nation depends on gold. This seems like a harmless enough idea, but because we allowed it to dominate our thinking in the 1920's we have nearly three-fourths of the world's gold supply stored away today at Fort Knox and elsewhere. The fact that this gold is completely useless to us unless we wish to exchange it for goods—which we don't—is immaterial. What really matters is that our lust for gold forced every nation in the world off the gold standard and contributed materially to the spread of economic nationalism that culminated in Nazi aggression and World War II.

A companion belief to faith in the mystic properties of gold is the widespread conviction that our national well-being depends on selling more than we buy abroad. This was true as long as the United States was a debtor country. But after World War I this country ceased to be a debtor and became one of the world's two great creditor nations. The inevitable result of our refusal to buy increased amounts of the goods and services of other countries was the collapse of their ability to pay their debts and to buy American goods.

Secretary Hull endeavored to break the log jam of trade restrictions by his reciprocal-trade program. But his efforts uncovered another queer kink in our thinking that may give us no end of trouble when we tackle the problems of reconstruction after the war. We seem to have the notion that trade concessions to other countries are a sign of weakness and that we have somehow scored a victory when we force other countries to make greater concessions than we are willing to grant ourselves. This idea is probably an outgrowth of the belief that all foreign nations are constantly trying to put something over on Uncle Sam. Also many Americans like to think of trade negotiations as a game in which the object is to pile up a score against the opponent. Anyone who tries to point out that the real purpose of negotiation is to increase trade is spoiling the fun. He risks the kind of abuse that would be heaped on a Brooklyn umpire who called a game in the last of the ninth, with the home team up, the bases full, none out, and the Dodgers trailing by one run. This misplaced sporting concept affects more than just trade negotiations. It crops up whenever the terms of an international agreement are announced. The latest example may be found in the press commentary on the relative merits of the Keynes and the American plan for currency stabilization.

Another, somewhat more subtle, form of this same idea is the assumption that we shall be the losers if we advance large sums of money for reconstruction in Europe and Africa without demanding full repayment. This seems so obvious to most people that few even stop to give it a second thought. Yet economists have repeatedly pointed out that it was the demand for repayment of money owed us rather than the money advanced that brought on the great depression of 1929. It is an interesting paradox that the three periods in which the United States has prospered most, 1915-19, 1924-29, and 1939-42, were in each instance periods in which we were shipping abroad vast quantities of goods for which payment was never and will never be received. The key to that paradox lies in the fact that a large part of our industry and agriculture is geared to export trade. During the 20's our exports were supported by large-scale foreign investments. More recently they have been supported by the government—which means the taxpayers. But the country as a whole is better off, regardless of ultimate repayment, because millions of jobs have been created. There is a limit, of course, to the amount of supplies that we can ship abroad without sacrifice by our own population. That limit has been reached during war, but it has never been reached in peace time. We have never succeeded in even approaching full employment without a large export trade.

Nearly all the foregoing kinks are present in our thinking because our minds are still largely conditioned by the world as it existed before the last war. Sociologists have pointed out that it usually takes the better part of a generation for ideas to catch up with a sudden change in circumstances, and they regard this "cultural lag" as inevitable. Unfortunately, the cultural lag in this case seems unduly prolonged. A new generation has grown up since 1918, and its thinking, generally speaking, is not much better adjusted to the responsibilities of American leadership than that of the older generation. Moreover, it is doubtful whether the American people were ever more hardened against some forms of international cooperation than they are today. As individuals Americans respond favorably to the idea of international collaboration, either in the political or the economic sphere, but there has always been powerful group opposition to specific proposals for furthering that cooperation. The soil in which such opposition flourishes has been prepared by our press, a large portion of which, including daily newspapers and weekly magazines, has deliberately sought through the years to confuse public opinion on essentials of our foreign policy.

There is no necessity for designating the papers and magazines that have consistently distorted news and resorted to shameless flag-waving in order to influence public opinion on vital international issues. At least four of the country's largest newspaper chains have indulged in such practices, together with at least two weeklies of huge circulation. Although this highly organized press has thrice failed to swing a Presidential election, its ability to befog popular thinking on relatively technical matters is beyond dispute. And it seems to be still powerful, despite Pearl Harbor and despite repeated disclosures of the deadly parallel between the war-time editorial policies of some of these papers and the Nazi propaganda line as revealed in the short-wave broadcasts from Berlin.

No one can say exactly what obligations the United States will have to assume after this war. But it is clear that they will be much heavier than any we were willing to assume in 1919. If World War III is to be prevented, some form of international organization will have to be set up. If it is to succeed, the United States must not only join but assume a position of leadership proportionate to its financial, military, and commercial strength. The heads of both parties are prepared to accept the responsibility. But they risk the same repudiation that the leadership of Wilson and Taft met with a quarter of a century ago unless the pre-1914 cobwebs in American thinking can be cleared away.

[This is the first of a number of articles planned to explore the fundamental problems of the peace. In coming issues Mr. Stewart will develop his ideas on international reconstruction, and Stuart Chase will examine the economic problems that lie in wait for us.]

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

MR. BROWNING'S letter to a London evening journal, informing it that Mrs. Browning's father was not a "retired merchant," but, on the contrary, was a "private gentleman," has called out among us some comments not wholly favorable to the writer. . . . We may well enough concede that our fine clay is clay. . . . But it is to be thought of, too, that everything relative to Mrs. Browning is matter of literary history. . . . A mistake of fact was to be corrected. —May 7, 1868.

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE . . . upholds extreme Radical opinions with logic, decency, moderation, and thoughtfulness, and proves that yelling, hallooing, extravagance, and vituperation are not necessary either to pecuniary success or great influence. —May 14, 1868.

GOOD NEWS for the boys: "Ragged Dick; or, Street Life in New York with the Bootblacks," by Horatio Alger, Jr., is for sale this morning. . . . Price $1.25. (Advt.)—May 14, 1868.

ABOUT THE ONLY THING accomplished by Congress in the past week has been the passage by the House of the joint resolution restoring [to statehood] North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, . . . after one day's debate, by 108 to 35. —May 21, 1868.

THE IMPEACHMENT [of President Andrew Johnson] ended—we presume it is safe to say so—on Saturday, in the defeat of the eleventh article by a vote of 19 to 35. The eleventh article was considered the strongest, and was therefore submitted first as a test. . . . This vote is generally considered as settling the fate of impeachment, although the court has only adjourned until the 26th . . . and the other articles are still pending. —May 21, 1868.

THE MAJORITY of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs have reported in favor of the appropriation to pay for Alaska. . . . The minority of the committee have also reported, alleging that . . . Alaska is a worthless and troublesome acquisition. —May 21, 1868.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION has met, and the nomination of Grant seems, at this writing, a foregone conclusion. —May 21, 1868.

ISSUED THIS DAY, the June number of Lippincott's Magazine. . . . This number contains a new poem, of 324 lines, by Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Advt.)—May 21, 1868.

THE NEWS from Germany indicates increasing uneasiness in the relations between Prussia and France. . . . Bismarck begins to be suspected . . . of desiring to goad France into taking the initiative in hostilities by marked manifestations of affection for Italy. —May 28, 1868.

The FCC Holds Fast

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 30

THE Federal Communications Commission, though by the narrow margin of four votes to three, has decided to defy the Kerr committee. It is important that the basis of the commission's action be thoroughly understood. Under Section 9-a of the Hatch Act, the commission, like all federal agencies, is forbidden to employ persons holding "membership in any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States." The appropriation acts of 1942 and 1943 reinforce this by barring from public office "any person who advocates, or is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the government of the United States by force or violence." Under the law, however, the responsibility for enforcing these statutes and for finally determining the qualifications of employees rests with the commission, as with other federal agencies.

The Kerr committee, a special subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, was set up to check the findings of the Dies committee. The first three cases on which the Kerr committee passed were those of FCC employees. On one, though negatively and as though reluctantly, it returned a verdict of acquittal. In the case of Frederick L. Schuman it found there was not sufficient evidence "to support a recommendation of unfitness to service in the employment of the government at this time." In the case of Goodwin Watson and William E. Dodd, Jr., the finding was "unfit for the present to continue in government service." But this is not the standard set by the law. "Nowhere," the Federal Communications Commissions points out, "does the subcommittee report charge that these employees 'have membership in any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government,' . . . nor does the subcommittee report find that any of them 'advocates, or . . . is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the government of the United States by force or violence.' Nor does the subcommittee report set forth any other reason in law, in fairness, or arising out of the exigencies of the present war for the dismissal of these employees at this time."

The Kerr committee did, indeed, lay down its own law, centering around its own definitions of "subversive activity." "Subversive activity in this country," it said, "derives from conduct intentionally destructive of or inimical to the government of the United States—that which seeks to undermine its institutions, or to distort its functions, or to impede its projects, or to lessen its efforts, the ultimate end being to overturn it all. Such activity may be open and direct as by effort to overthrow, or subtle and indirect as by sabotage." But the Kerr committee fails to meet its own comfortably broad standard. "The general comments contained in the subcommittee's report," the commission's ruling states, "fail to specify wherein Watson and Dodd have run afoul of this definition, or wherein Schuman has avoided its bans. Was Watson's and Dodd's conduct 'destructive . . . or was it on the other hand inimical to the government. . . ' ? Did they 'seek to undermine its institutions'? Or did they seek to 'distort its functions'? Was their activity 'open and direct. . . ' ? Or was it on the contrary 'subtle and indirect. . . ' ? No answer to these questions is afforded by the subcommittee."

The most specific finding made by the Kerr committee was that Watson had "for several years past . . . associated himself on many and frequent occasions with men . . . whose aims and purposes were subversive to this government, and has associated with men who advocated the overthrow of this government." But the commission complains that "these men are nowhere named, nor is his relation to them stated." The Kerr committee seems to have gone several steps farther than the Dies committee in the direction of star-chamber procedure. "We have been unable," the FCC reports, "to determine with any precision the grounds for the subcommittee's findings. Our general counsel was directed to attend the hearings before the subcommittee as an observer for the commission; but permission to attend was refused him by the subcommittee."

Watson, Schuman, and Dodd are employed in the commission's Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service. Their reports, as the commission points out, "come under the daily scrutiny . . . of responsible officials of Military Intelligence, Naval Intelligence, Office of Strategic Services, State Department, OWI, Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, BEW, Lend-Lease, Department of Justice, etc. It is inconceivable that any bias, distortion or subversion could escape the attention of these agencies." The FCC, on the contrary, brings forward letters of commendation from Military Intelligence, Nelson Rockefeller, the OSS, and the War Shipping Administration, which testify to the good work of these men.

That this is so is not surprising, for all three are men of ability, strongly anti-fascist, and genuinely devoted. The anti-fascism which makes them suspect to political cretins and unpopular with proto-fascists is of course one source of their usefulness. "All three," as the commission points out, "by reason of their close contact and exhaustive study of world affairs, perceived earlier than many of their countrymen the rising menace of the Nazis, Fascists, and Japanese. Spurred on by this insight, they sought by speech, by writing, and by cooperation with others working toward similar ends to awaken their countrymen to the peril which became manifest to all Americans at Pearl Harbor." Their only crime is that they were "farsighted and aggressive in opposing Nazism and Fascism."

For some time, perhaps more out of fear of a rabid minority than out of conviction, Congress has been carrying on this kind of war against anti-fascists. The result, by inverse selection, has been to cull from government those who feel most deeply about the basic issues of the war and are therefore prepared to work hardest for it. The policy of retreat before these attacks has only encouraged reaction. Last year, when the office of Facts and Figures let Malcolm Cowley resign, it strengthened Dies. The effect of Vice-President Wallace's vigorous attack upon the Dies committee last April was spoiled when Milo Perkins forced the resignations of C. Hartley Grattan and Maurice Parmelee, thus by implication admitting charges the Vice-President had refuted. Men of decency and good-will could have been mobilized at that time in Congress; they would have defended the BEW if the BEW had defended itself. They can be appealed to again. The FCC by standing up courageously to reaction has provided a strong point around which the wavering can be rallied. A victory for the FCC would help clear the air of the capital, which has become noxious and unhealthy. Progressive officials have grown afraid, and try to hire men without political pasts, which often means without political convictions. These do not make the most militant anti-fascists. The fight to back the FCC is a fight to invigorate the war effort.

North African Triangle

BY CLAUDE MCKAY

AS SOON as you reach North Africa, if your eyes and perceptions are good, you are aware of the struggle for a living among three clearly defined groups—Christian, Jew, Moslem. But you also observe that the struggle has reached a certain balance, with each group held within its limits.

The Moslem natives form the largest group, but in the modern social and political set-up in North Africa they have been pushed down to the bottom. They are in the position of a subject people, with no voice in the affairs of state. The Europeans declare that the Moslems are naturally medieval-minded and backward, that they are in their present position because they refused to accept the French civil code, and that the real reason for their refusal was their polygamy. But to accept the French civil code a Moslem would have to abjure not only polygamy but the main tenets of his religion. Moreover, about three-fourths of the North African native population consists of peasants, shepherds, and hired workers so poverty-stricken that a man can barely afford one wife. Even the new middle class of native functionaries created by the French, who have been educated in the Franco-Arab schools, cannot maintain more than one wife decently. The Moslem wife is an expensive luxury. She can do no outside work to help her husband as the Christian and Jewish women can, and when the Moslem marries he must pay a good sum, the amount dependent on his means, to the parents of the bride. Only the very wealthy—pashas, caids, cadis, and other notables—can indulge in polygamy.

It is not polygamy that hinders the North African native from adopting the French civil code but his whole way of life, which is an integral, perhaps the most important, part of his religion. In a Moslem country you are born a Moslem and remain one all your life even if you never enter a mosque. Your birth and marriage, divorce and death are recorded under Koranic law. Your property is regulated according to the laws of the Koran. (Moslems think that their own code is superior to the French in some respects: for example, when a Moslem woman marries, she retains control over her own property, as the Frenchwoman does not.)

The Moslems have remained imprisoned behind the ancient social-economic-religious system of Islam. And though they groan and complain of oppression in their medieval prison, they seem to prefer it to the modern way of life. Banking is the mainstay of modern society, but no true Moslem can operate a bank and charge interest. He will, however, place his money in a Christian or Jewish bank and accept the interest paid on it. In North Africa the French have built new towns of striking neo-Moorish architecture. But Moslems do not live in them, although some of the wealthy ones own houses in the new towns. It is not merely that houses in the inaccessible and mysterious native quarters are cheaper; custom also holds the Moslems in their antique setting. Because the Moslem wife, except on special occasions, cannot go outdoors, she practically lives on the roof top. There in the daytime she lolls unveiled and visits with other women across the roofs. During those hours no man may go up to the roof or even look up from the street.

All Jews in North Africa have the status of Europeans. Under the French regime they have been so rapidly Europeanized—the Cremieux decrees conferred French citizenship on all Algerian Jews as far back as 1870—that their way of life is closer to the European pattern than is that of many Spanish and Portuguese immigrants. Jews throughout North Africa wear only European clothes. Their schooling is so thoroughly European that many of the younger generation do not know the Arabic language. No casual observer can tell them from the Spanish and French.

The French writer Henry de Montherlant said some years ago that Jews were the torch-bearers of European civilization in North Africa. Certainly they are the modern ferment in North African life. As a group they appear to be more in harmony with their environment than other Europeans. No one knows how many Jews there are in Algeria since they have not been counted as such for many generations, but it is known that they outnumber the French and other Europeans, as they do in Tunisia and Morocco.

In competition with Europeans, the Jews have pushed steadily ahead. They have in their favor a close-knit community life and a knowledge of Arabic. Also they have an understanding of the character of the Moslems, which the French apparently lack. And because the Jews know the needs of the Moslems and are familiar with their way of trading, the Moslems prefer to trade with the Jews. The Jews are the middlemen, par excellence, of North Africa. With the desperate crisis of French finance at the beginning of the nineteen thirties, the competition between Frenchmen and Jews became acute.

Since North African production is in the hands of big business using cheap native labor, it undersold on the French market the production of the French peasantry. Governments rose and fell in Paris, but all agreed that Frenchmen must be protected from the threat of cheap African importations. A cartel plan was set up for the French colonies, and North Africa was required to supply commodities to France on the quota system. Goods piled up in the warehouses of Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco—wheat and barley corn and wine.

In their predicament the North African French vented their wrath on the left parties in the French parliament and on the Jews. Many openly declared that the mass naturalization of Jews in Algeria had been a capital mistake and that a quota system should be applied to Jews in the professions,

In North Africa the French mentality is conservative to the point of reaction. A visitor to the colonies gets the impression that it is there that the powerful rightist tendency in the French nation is most securely entrenched. The spirit of free criticism which used to exert its influence over the press, the theater, and all intellectual life in France has been absent. In extenuation of the French colonists it should be said that as rulers and large-scale exploiters they must constantly consider the native population, whose dominant class has a feudal outlook on life and holds ideas incomprehensible to the modern mind.

During the economic crisis of the nineteen thirties the native North Africans were stirred for the first time by agitation for social reform. This was not an independence movement, but an attempt to get the natives a better deal within the framework of the French administration. Its leaders were mainly young North Africans who had been educated in France. They were aided by their co-religionists in France, thousands of whom had settled there after the First World War. These Moslems in France had joined the Radical Socialist or the Socialist Party. Hence the efforts of the French civil and military authorities in North Africa to suppress the movement were nullified by the support given to it by the leftists in France. Though they possessed no organized power in North Africa, the left parties could bring pressure on the French government to compel the North African administrations to permit legal propaganda and a free native press. Simultaneously a movement was started for closer relations between Jewish and Moslem youth; Jewish opinion was always moderate or leftist, because the privileges the Jews had acquired in North Africa were won with the help of liberal elements in France. This faint portent of a political understanding between Moslems and Jews infuriated the French colonists even more than the growing native movement, which the French press was inclined to treat with amused condescension.

Strangely enough, just at this time a wave of unfortunate incidents between Moslems and Jews spread all over North Africa. Arab hoodlums attacked Jews on the street, usually singling out wealthy and prominent men. The attacks were generally attributed to Nazi propaganda, but the Moslem leaders denied this and said they were instigated by members of the Croix de Feu and the Camelots du Roy. In fact, the native press published the sensational news that in some instances French officers were actually discovered inciting the Moslem rabble to riot against the Jews.

In Spanish North Africa, where the Jews and Moslems have remarkably cordial relations, the peace was not disturbed. When news of the violence between Moslems and Jews in French North Africa reached the Spanish Republican administration in Tetuan, it issued a proclamation calling upon both peoples to remember their long association and to respect each other's rights and customs. This proclamation was read in the mosques and synagogues, prominently affixed to walls, and published in the Spanish newspapers. But it was not reported in any French newspaper. It was printed only by the radical native newspaper l'Action Marocaine.

Even the reactionary Spanish monarchy was more liberal toward the subject natives than the French Republic. The Spanish regime permitted nationalist publications from Egypt and Syria to enter the country; the French barred them. It allowed the natives some semblance of freedom of speech, which was denied in the French zone. The Spanish permitted circulation of the native Hassani silver money; the French compelled the use of paper money which was often in a state of fluctuation. Even the Spanish Catholic church enjoys more prestige than the French Catholic church among the Moslems. Out of the wisdom of long experience or perhaps because of their Spanish national pride, Spanish priests show no desire to proselytize Moslems.

The French clergy has been accused by the Moslems of exercising religious influence through the administration. Whether this is true or not, the most serious crisis in French-Moslem relations occurred in the nineteen thirties when the French Moroccan administration promulgated the Dahir Berbère. For some reason which remains obscure to the neutral observer, the French desired to bring the Berbers living in the Souss and beyond the Atlas Mountains under the French civil code and eventually to make citizens of them. The Berbers are monogamists, their women go unveiled, and their local councils are not strictly based on Koranic law. So the French sought to detach the Berbers from the Arabs by forbidding Moslem teachers and preachers to penetrate into the interior. Not only North Africa but the entire Moslem world protested against the French decree. To demonstrate solidarity with the rude Berbers the young agitators discarded the red fez and silk burnoose for the coarse woolen burnoose and turban of the Berbers. Their organs carried on an incessant campaign against the new law, and they were supported by the publications of their leftist friends in France. The Spaniards too rallied to the side of the Moslems and declared that Morocco possessed a spiritual unity which the nations should respect.

As relations between the conservative North African administrations and the native leaders drifted from bad to worse, France itself turned more sharply to the left. When Spain installed a republican government, the natives rejoiced, but the French colonists were cold to the new turn of events. By the time the Popular Front government came to power in France, military and colonial opinion in North Africa was belligerently opposed to it. The North African militarists not only threatened to march to the aid of General Franco; they ordered the Popular Front government to cease its support of the native propagandists and consent to the dissolution of their organizations in North Africa. Finally, just before the government fell, it yielded. The native organizations were proscribed and their leaders arrested and jailed. Thus the native movements and their leaders were the first casualties of the reinforced French fascists.

In the Wind

SENATOR C. WAYLAND BROOKS of Illinois spoke as a fellow-sufferer when he addressed a recent Chicago mass-meeting to protest Nazi atrocities against the Jews. He proclaimed himself a defender of minorities because he was himself a member of a minority. The treatment of Republicans under the New Deal, he said, is comparable to that of Jews under Hitler.

THE CHARLESTON News and Courier finds President Roosevelt socially acceptable. "Mr. Roosevelt," it says, "is a pleasant gentleman, well born and well to do, and we would welcome another visit from him. With regard to helping along the war, the News and Courier does not believe the President's personal tours do any appreciable amount of good, but he apparently enjoys them hugely, and they give the crowds something to shout about."

TECHNOCRACY, INC., announces in its current literature that it welcomes the participation of "all types of people," but "aliens, Asiatics, and politicians are barred."

IT SEEMS there has been some misunderstanding about the treatment of anti-fascist prisoners in Spain. The Brooklyn Tablet clears it up. "No citizen of Russia," it reports, "is allowed to enjoy what prisoners in Spain enjoy."

THE NEVER AGAIN ASSOCIATION, in England, has worked out a post-war program for Germany. Among other things, Germany would be broken up into "its component parts," and England would expel all Axis nationals "and all refugees with very few exceptions."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A Czech waitress forty-one years old has been sentenced to two years in prison for inefficient service to a group of Nazi soldiers. . . . Crime is increasing in Norway too: before Germany took over, the average number of criminal prosecutions was 120 to 150 per year; in 1942 it was 1,800, and this year it is already more than 500. . . . At a Norwegian factory some 250 men were herded into a large room to listen to a Quisling orator. In the middle of his speech their interest increased visibly. A large placard reading "Long Live the King" had been raised through an opening in the floor behind the speaker. The perpetrator of the disturbance could not be found.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Europe Against Hitler

II. THE GUERRILLA FIGHTERS

BY JOHN W. GERBER AND ALFRED KANTOROWICZ

THE peoples of the occupied Slavic countries—Poland, Yugoslavia, Czecho-Slovakia—have suffered such inconceivable miseries and hardships that they look forward to an Allied invasion even more eagerly than the peoples of Western Europe. The Nazis were indifferent to Quislings in these regions, and with the exception of Slovakia and Croatia, which were set up as "independent" puppet states, the Slavic countries were directly incorporated, territorially and economically, into the German "living space."

Nazi oppression here has been particularly cruel. "Summary courts" have power to sentence suspects without even the pretense of a trial. Heydrich's summary courts executed 394 Czech citizens in the course of a few weeks and ordered 1,300 others handed over to the Gestapo. In Yugoslavia the shooting of 50 or more citizens for the death of one German soldier was at one time almost a daily occurrence. The Belgrade paper Oras says that up to November, 1941, 2,100 persons were executed in Shabac, 2,540 in Kraljevo, and 4,576 in Kragujevac. The massacres in Poland are beyond belief. At least two million Polish Jews have been murdered, and an indeterminate number have died in concentration camps. In one concentration camp, Oswiecim, to which 85,840 prisoners had been admitted up to the middle of 1942, it is known that at least 57,000 have died. Such oppression has seriously reduced the number of those who can offer opposition, to say nothing of its effect on their spirit. Deportations for slave labor in Germany—1,200,000 Poles, 300,000 Czechs, 135,000 Yugoslavs (the numbers may be higher, but those are the best available estimates)—have further diminished the manpower of resistance.

Severe labor measures have been imposed on all the Slavic peoples by the Nazi conquerors. The work week is from sixty to seventy-two hours, and the wage rates are generally reckoned to be about half those of German workers doing similar jobs. But the wage rate and what is actually left in the pay envelope are very different things, owing to deductions for the many Nazi rackets. The bad working conditions, in addition to the food scarcity, have greatly weakened the population in all this region.

Poland appears to have the most flourishing underground in Europe, perhaps because an underground movement has been in almost continuous operation there for decades, first against czarist Russia and then against fascist regimes in Poland. More than a hundred underground papers are printed regularly.

The two parts of Czecho-Slovakia—Bohemia-Moravia and Slovakia—must be considered separately. Bohemia-Moravia comprises the industrial part of Czecho-Slovakia, which was formerly the fifth-ranking industrial country of Europe. It has been incorporated into the Reich as a "protectorate" and is subject to all the laws in force for Germans. Nowhere else in Europe has industrial sabotage been so efficiently organized. A recent British report said that there are now 30,000 workers in the Skoda arms factory—the 20,000 original workers and 10,000 shipped in to make up for loss of production caused by the slowdown. There are innumerable stories of ingenious Czech workers who ship goods to the wrong address, fill grenades with sawdust, spoil steel for guns by adding foreign matter.

Slovakia is an "independent" state ruled by a puppet government and is officially an ally of Germany in the war against Russia. But whatever enthusiasm the Slovaks had for the war was dampened when 19,000 of 30,000 soldiers sent to the front were reported casualties. (Many of them, it is believed, deserted to the Russians.) Slovakian troops cannot be depended on to fight guerrillas; two battalions sent out for that purpose sold their weapons to the people they were sent to suppress.

Yugoslavia, like Czecho-Slovakia, has been totally dismembered. Bulgaria took the Macedonian part of the country, Hungary the northern provinces, Italy the Dalmatian coast. The rest was split into a so-called "autonomous" Croatia under Italian influence—the Quisling of which is Ante Pavelich, the ex-terrorist—and Serbia, occupied by the Nazis and ruled by them through a puppet government headed by General Milan Nedic.

Yugoslavia's lead, zinc, and copper mines, the largest in Europe, are now producing for the Nazis. The working conditions of the miners, never good, have been made more unbearable by the lengthened hours and increased pressure.

With German domination of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Yugoslavia so complete, it may seem surprising that vigorous resistance still goes on. Very little guerrilla warfare is waged in Poland or the Bohemian Protectorate, but in Yugoslavia and Slovakia it has become a serious problem for Germany and its satellites. The fighting attained such proportions recently that the Nazis launched a full-scale military campaign, the results of which were reported in the German war communiqués.

The guerrillas hold large sections of the country, publish their own newspapers, operate their own radio stations, and have been issuing their own war communiqués since they began operations. A typical one read: "In fights against German, Hungarian, and Ustachi troops in Bosnia seven towns have been captured. When Djibiljin on the Una was taken, important factories and coal mines fell into the patriots' hands. Fourteen hundred officers and men were killed and over a thousand taken prisoner. Nine important railway lines have been blown up, numerous stations completely demolished. The destruction of telephone and telegraph lines has also been very effective. On the road from Banjakula, the new capital designate for Croatia, to Prijedor, for the second time 500 telegraph lines and poles have been carried off."

One should not be too elated over such a communiqué. The fact that the guerrillas have taken seven towns, including factories and coal mines, indicates neither that they will hold them nor that they have any intention of holding them. At the approach of a superior enemy force the guerrillas simply pull out. But neither should one be discouraged by German communiqués on similar actions. After describing the difficulties of the terrain and the cunning of the patriots, they often say that "organized resistance has been broken," which indicates merely that the guerrillas have broken off the fight and dispersed, to gather again when the Nazis divide or withdraw their forces.

Of the two major Yugoslav guerrilla groups, that headed by General Mihailovich has Anglo-American support and the so-called "partisan" group has Soviet support. The Yugoslav government-in-exile recognizes both, but recognizes the "partisans" only to oppose them. There are also small local groups.

It must be borne in mind that the guerrillas are overwhelmingly outnumbered in every area in which they operate. At the moment their usefulness is confined to tying up large contingents of troops which would otherwise be fighting in Russia or Africa, forcing the Nazis to use material badly needed for their major campaigns, and disrupting communications. With insufficient arms and no air power whatever, the guerrillas cannot carry on any decisive action, but when liberating forces approach their zone of operations, it will be another story. Since their effective numbers are determined largely by the available equipment, they will be able to mobilize much larger forces as soon as supplies can be dropped to them by United Nations planes. They will then offer a constant threat to the enemy rear, and if their activities are well-coordinated with ours, they may be an important factor in the struggle.

"I SEE DER BRITISH TALK OF PUTTING ON AN OFFENSIVE"

Germany's satellites, including Italy, are in scarcely any better position than the occupied countries. They receive consideration only in the degree of their willingness to work for a Nazi victory. Finland is willing because of its fear and hatred of the Soviet Union. The leaders of Hungary and Bulgaria are willing because they have gained big slices of territory. Rumania hopes to be compensated, at the cost of Russia, for what it has lost to Hungary. Italy had German backing in its earlier territorial aspirations, but can hardly be looking for further conquests. Although the satellite countries are presumably independent, they are under indirect Nazi domination. The Nazis interfere in their internal administration only as military and economic reasons require, but Gestapo agents and military and economic "counselors" keep careful watch over all activities.

Nazi troops in these countries are not present as occupational forces but as allies of the government, sent to guard strategic frontiers and communications centers. Though they are, of course, available to put down any large-scale rebellions, the suppression of isolated resistance, or potential resistance, is left to the police forces and armies of the nation concerned. They go about it vigorously, for they know that if German troops went into action a German military dictatorship would probably follow. Resistance in the satellite countries, therefore, is revolutionary and not, as in the occupied countries, simply war for national independence. Since local Gestapos can operate with more efficiency, underground work in the satellite countries is infinitely more difficult than in the occupied countries.

Finland and Hungary may be considered as a single problem for several reasons: they have strong racial and language ties, their recent histories are similar, and, most important, the Nazis have assigned them similar roles in their plan for the New Europe. Finland in the North and Hungary in the South are Hitler's two aces in the hole, reserved for the time when he will try to line up Britain and the United States against Russia. Finland and Hungary evoke similar emotional responses in certain circles in Britain and America. Hungary carried on its first "crusade against Bolshevism" in 1919, against Bela Kun. Finland fought the Bolsheviks during the same period, and again more recently. Americans and Britons worked up strong sympathies for both, which makes them ideal gambits in Hitler's game.

Finland had the aid of General von der Goltz and a German expeditionary corps when Marshal Mannerheim and his White Guards seized control from the Russians in 1918, and Germany has ever since maintained its influence in Finnish military circles. The Social Democratic Party that subsequently grew into Finland's leading political party has never been noted for whole-hearted advocacy of democratic action. In 1930, when militant members of the party split away and won twenty-three seats in the Diet, the party leaders applauded the fascist Lapua movement's proposal to jail the militants and suppress their party. What organization remained as a basis for resistance to Finland's current participation in the war—trade-union membership has declined about 45 per cent during the past twenty years—has apparently been further weakened by government propaganda, which stoutly maintains that Finland is fighting only for its "independence and integrity" and has no obligations to any "great power."

Finland's recent elections are not to be confused with democratic processes. Popular participation was suspended, and the electoral college that voted Risto Ryti into power two years ago was simply reconvened to repeat the performance. The "new" government promptly concluded a commercial treaty with Germany that bound the economies of the two countries indissolubly together. If there is any sentiment in the country for joining the United Nations—including Russia—it has not the strength to make itself felt.

Hungary, the first fascist state in Europe, has been the chief beneficiary of the Nazi conquest of Europe. In the dismemberment of Czecho-Slovakia in 1938 Hungary got the southeastern strip of Slovakia and a part of sub-Carpathian Russia. Later it took over the rest of sub-Carpathian Russia, a strip of territory in eastern Slovakia, half of Rumania's Transylvanian provinces, parts of Serbia, and other bits and pieces. Hungary's area and population were thereby approximately doubled. As a natural consequence, anti-fascist propaganda was not viewed favorably by most Hungarians during the days of the German army's invincibility.

With the revisionists in the saddle, delighted to cooperate with Germany, Hungary was controlled with a relatively light hand. Whereas hundreds of thousands of Finnish and Rumanian soldiers were sent to the eastern front, and Bulgaria was overrun with Nazi troops, Hungary contributed only a small force to the war, and the Nazis limited their occupation forces to Gestapo men and "counselors" in key administrative positions.

There have recently been rumors of peace feelers from high places in Hungary. Prime Minister Kallay is said to have been directing inquiries to the Vatican, and Count Bethlen, the prospective Darlan, was reported on a mysterious tour of Europe to line up support. In addition, leaders of Hungary's Social Democratic Party have been making speeches and writing articles increasingly pro-United Nations in tone. It must be remembered, however, that the real democratic forces in Hungary were pretty well crushed when White Guards under Admiral Horthy wiped out the Bela Kun regime in 1919. It is significant that the Social Democratic Party was allowed to live even after the Nazis came in.

The genuine democratic forces of resistance in Hungary still appear to be underground. Early this year Radio Berlin announced the arrest of 664 persons "accused of having tried to overthrow the state by force." Reports of sabotage are becoming more frequent. It is likely that the "peace" talk in Hungary is designed to check the increasing disillusionment of the people with Germany. The Hungarian peasants may not play a big role in winning a United Nations victory, but they will be a big factor in establishing a democratic peace. After hundreds of years of subjection to a variety of oppressors they will be skeptical about any new set of rulers. But they will welcome a government which will take the land from the pro-German aristocracy which controls about three-quarters of it and give it into their hands.

[The concluding article of this series, on the forces of resistance in the other satellite countries and in Germany itself, will appear next week.]

Oil for Franco

BY SELDEN C. MENEFE

THE State Department assumes full responsibility for the latest shipment of American oil to Spain. "A Spanish vessel," runs an official statement, "took as cargo from Philadelphia a shipment of lubricating oil, of a type required for certain essential industrial and transportation purposes and which under present conditions can be obtained only in the United States."

Secretary of the Interior and Petroleum Administrator Ickes "knows nothing about these shipments." Nor, it seems, do the Spanish people, whose favor is so earnestly sought by certain Washington circles. The domestic broadcasts of Franco's Falange, as monitored by the Federal Communications Commission and made available by the Office of War Information, have contained no reference in recent weeks to the arrival of American goods in Spain.

One Señor Riega, lately returned from Spain, offers a possible explanation for Franco's silence. In a broadcast from Venezuela, Radio Caracas quotes Riega as saying: "If the recent observations of the North American ambassador to Madrid were true, it is certain that the North American gasoline in Spain is evaporating. Three months ago, when I left Madrid, the gasoline that had gone to Spain was either delivered to the Axis or stored."

The Nazis applaud our Spanish policy. Early in March a Transocean dispatch to North America with a Madrid date line called attention to the fact that American oil shipments were coming from Venezuela and Aruba in Spanish tankers and therefore were not depriving America of any oil. Another Nazi commentator argued that Germany had helped Spain more than America had. He implied, of course, that further American shipments to Spain would not disturb Germany, that, in fact, if Germany occupied Spain, it would be well pleased to find large stocks of American supplies.

The State Department is complacent: "The purposes to which these oils are to be put in Spain have been carefully examined by United States officials."

In his domestic broadcasts Franco attacks the United Nations with increasing vigor. "The Jewish banks of New York and London," screams the Falange station at Valladolid, "in concert with Bolshevism, unleashed this war. Should it really be their hour, it would pass down as the end of Europe. But like a brilliant ray of hope Hitler's voice has assured us that this fight will not finish as the Jews wish, with the extermination of the Aryan race. It will finish with the destruction of European Jewry." The same station frankly points out that "the Caudillo has never hidden the fact that his sympathies in the present war cannot be with the enemies of the Axis." The Barcelona radio warns that "new sacrifices and new struggles are required. Today a few Spanish volunteers assert on Russian soil the will to final victory. We must be ready for the future, when Spain's imperial routes will unfold under our eyes as a tangible reality, thanks to the blood of those who fell for Spain." The Seville radio says: "In time of peace we must prepare for war. Our armies on their eternal watch in Europe and Africa remain on the alert." "Spain is a nation in readiness for combat," asserts a Barcelona commentator. "We have fully realized that pacifism is the attitude of sheep, and we in our own flesh have more of the fury of wolves and bulls."

This new belligerence might be interpreted as preparation for an attack on our forces in North Africa. A more plausible hypothesis is that Franco, under Nazi direction, has been trying, by the mere threat of attack, to immobilize a considerable Allied force on the border of Spanish Morocco. United States supplies will be useful in carrying out either purpose.

Goebbels in Katyn

[If Hitler fought and won the political Battle of Munich, it was because he was fully aware that the democracies would make no real stand. He knew the strength of the reactionary forces, of the appeasers, of the capitulars in most of the European Cabinets and Foreign Offices. If today Hitler has launched a new political offensive in the international field—whose first result has been the Soviet-Polish break—it is because he sees how the United Nations have been weakened by their lack of a strong, united, genuinely democratic leadership. We are only at the beginning of Hitler's Second Political War. The excerpts given below show how it is carried on by means of the Axis radio.]

BERLIN RADIO: A foreign agency reported last month that the Soviet Union had prohibited Poles from leaving the Soviet Union. In connection with the mass graves of Katyn this news caused much concern among the Poles living in other foreign countries. According to the Basler Nachrichten, the above-mentioned foreign agency's report has been confirmed by competent authorities. The Swiss paper makes the following statement in this connection: "The Polish troops which were evacuated from Soviet Russia to the Near East and to Scotland are greatly perturbed by the news that all Polish citizens who were deported to Soviet Russia or happened to be in that country are now considered citizens of the Soviet Union! There are thousands of women and children and parents of Polish soldiers among the Polish citizens in the Soviet Union. At the time of their departure the Polish soldiers were assured that their families would soon be permitted to follow them. This change of attitude on the part of the Soviet Union reveals remarkable future perspectives. Every Pole recalls the mass graves of Katyn when he thinks about the fate of his relatives in Soviet Russia."

Berlin Radio: The papers in Argentina point out that Moscow's step did not come as a surprise to the Argentine people, for the latter had been currently informed of the developments in the forest of Katyn. [Apparently, President Castillo had his Chief of Cabinet there, spending his spring holiday.] Political circles in Buenos Aires are of the opinion that the British and United States governments will now have to face the alternatives of backing the Bolsheviks, thus morally approving of the crimes committed by Moscow, or of moving away from the Kremlin in a more or less concealed manner.

Rome Radio: We in the Axis countries have never connected the British and the Americans with the horrible practice which the BBC called the Smolensk crime. All we have said in this connection is that we fail to understand how nations which call themselves civilized and wear the trappings of liberty and freedom can stoop to side with the sworn enemies of civilization and freedom.

Tokyo Radio: The severance of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and the Polish émigré government in London is further proof of the lack of unity among the anti-Axis powers. This latest incident should shatter the confidence the smaller nations are placing in the unity of their so-called protectors.

Paris Radio: The reasons given by Molotov for the severance of relations are considered by competent circles in France as a confession that Moscow was guilty of the mass murder in the forest of Katyn. The same circles add that it is in the line of Soviet policy first to exploit its allies as far as possible and then to drop them.

Madrid Radio: Three Spanish physicians were en route to Russia by invitation today to take part in the International Red Cross investigation of the reported slaughter of 10,000 Poles in the Smolensk area. The newspaper ABC published a dispatch by a special correspondent which said the Germans were continuing the work of unearthing bodies from the common grave in Katyn Forest near Smolensk. The dispatch said that some Red Cross delegates already had arrived on the scene, and that additional discoveries of similar mass burials had been reported from other parts of Russia, such as the Odessa area, where the bodies were said to be those of Rumanian civilians. [Previous to this broadcast, the International Red Cross had announced that it would not undertake an investigation without the consent of the Soviet Union.]

Vichy Radio: One of the members of the United Nations who recently visited the scene of the mass murders at Katyn was Dr. Kozlovski, former Prime Minister of Poland. He emphasized that the Polish officers were the victims of barbarism based on Bolshevik terror. After inspecting the documents, incriminating evidence, he said that there was not the least doubt that the Katyn forests were the scene of a mass murder by the GPU.

Behind the Enemy Line, by Argus, was unavoidably omitted from this issue, but will appear next week as usual.

BOOKS and the ARTS

New Guinea

And see thou hurt not the oil and the wine

Geography was violently dead,
Hairline and parallel, Mercator, torn,
Brushed by a finger from the finespun map
As one might desecrate a spider's web;

And now like Moses was our will again
To part the sea and push all distance back
To cross the dry land of your wavy roads
In plotted days exuberantly home;

Witness like him our enemy engulfed,
Churned hideous-eyed in coiling ocean-troughs,
Sucked down and drowned and beaten to the floor,
To justify the praises of our war.

We lived upon this chart, traded and sailed,
Made strong the latitudes with sailor's sail,
Our cables mossy under deafening depths
And words in air. A world lay in your net.

And children learned a land shaped like a bird,
Impenetrable black. Here savages
Made shrunken heads of corpses, poison darts
Pricked sudden death, no man had crossed their hills.

It fell from Asia, severed from the East;
It was the last Unknown. Only the fringe
Was nervous to the touch of voyagers.
Business and boys looked close and would have come.

In war did come, crashing the gifts of iron
Crated on crazy trails where by our blood
The rat-toothed enemy is backward inched,
And forests bulldozed, busted into streets,

Morning I rise and marvel at the laden
Lush-abandoned branch and brush of soaked
Laocoons of trees in throes of ser-
Pent-tightening tendrils and air-clambering roots.

Awake, the largest snowiest butterfly
Floating with eyes of lavender between
The men strung heavily like weighted bats
And finishing, from tree to tree, their rest.

And soon awake the split-wing congeries
Of fliers driving in a line like bees
Shake loose the warming silences and storm
From every sleeper his last easy dream.

Surely, the frontage of the world is up
When on the old cosmography and stars,
Mercator, we inscribe our whirl of wings
To roads instinctive as the climbing god's.

Presume our purpose high as flight, like yours,
Or charity in every gain implied,
Or joy of settlement for reason's sake;
See us confute logistics like a map,

Our space be balanced in the scales of light,
No longer his whose hideous horse he spurs
Into the dream of common man, and prove
World-wide the knowledge heart of peace.

What happens to the dark primordial law
Of those whose home this is, happens to us,
Seeing the preternatural fall of fire
Strike from the sky witchdoctors, villages;

Their desolation see us deeply trust
And never hurt their oil and their wine:
Peace to the science of these fevered woods,
Their attributes, their language and their gods.

KARL J. SHAPIRO

I Am the Lord High Executioner

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A CURMUDGEON. By Harold L. Ickes. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

FOR years everyone has been looking for the polite and expressive word to describe the incumbent Secretary of the Interior. But it has taken Philologist Ickes himself to dig up "curmudgeon" as the right one for "Bluebeard and Danton and Samuel Johnson and Morgan the Pirate and Henry VIII and Billy the Kid"—and himself. Ickes not only informs us he is a curmudgeon: he claims he is a self-made one. His mother, he tells us, had hoped to see him become a Man of God. But, as he says, he would have been foredoomed to failure. "Far better to be a highly successful curmudgeon than an indifferent preacher."

Until this book was published, one assumed that the press could do nothing more to Ickes. But apparently he has been right all along in damning the papers for their diabolical ingenuity. For having failed to get either him or his goat by strong-arm methods, they seem to have worked out a new technique for discrediting him. They are receiving his autobiography as though all the talk about his being a curmudgeon were just a gag, as though old Harold were just another sentimental stuffed shirt. This is the ultimate outrage. Just because the executioner can laugh at himself as well as assassinate others, just because he can write, the press is not justified in remaking him into a Sunday School teacher. No, Ickes, the self-made, hard-working curmudgeon is not a fraud. He is what everybody knows a curmudgeon is; for the good of the country he must keep on being one; and we may be sure that he will answer the press's latest campaign to discredit him with a new declaration of war against it. No soft answer can really turn away a curmudgeon's wrath.

Ickes's predictable reaction to a recent editorial convert was as follows:

I had a lot of fun reading this. I was struck by the good English, too, and the twists and turns to make a point more effective. I understand, of course, as do you, that this represents only a hiatus of probably short duration because I shall never cease to set the newspapers by their ears again when I can. Perhaps I was only putting a fast one over on you. . . . (Signed) HAROLD L. ICKES.

As a bona fide curmudgeon, Ickes wants the press to hate him, not to remake him into a genial old character actor. In self-defense, he may even have to refuse to accept his latest victory—the trade's admission at long last that he really was a newspaperman in the old days!

Harold Ickes is not only Secretary of the Interior and oil czar. He is also one of the most effective leaders of the opposition to the Administration. The reason for this apparent paradox is that he is the only New Dealer of any consequence left in office. The men who are running Washington—above all Harry Hopkins—believe that the New Deal is both unpopular with the country and detrimental to the conduct of the war: one of the few thoroughly efficient jobs ever pulled off by the Hopkins junta has been the burying of the New Deal and the isolation of the New Dealers.

Before the 1940 election, when the New Deal was still alive, Ickes was in the government as well as in the Interior building. As the Republicans now acknowledge, he was one of those most instrumental in persuading the people that the President had to be reelected, and in persuading the President in May, 1940, that he could be reelected. Ickes ended Tom Dewey's candidacy when he said that Dewey had thrown his diaper into the ring. His calling Willkie "the bare-foot Wall Street lawyer," as well as his baiting Willkie into running part of the time against Ickes instead of against the Commander-in-Chief, helped cut Willkie's clear pre-Elwood majority down to the 23,000,000 votes he had left in November. Before Willkie had talked himself out of the lead, Hopkins was saying that Roosevelt would carry forty-six states without making a speech. But Ickes led the group which in the nick of time frightened the President into fighting. Nothing is more characteristic of the workings of this Administration than that Hopkins—who will get more votes for the Republicans in 1944 than any Republican nominee in sight—should be the real power in the White House while Ickes is humored, mocked, and kicked as the court jester. And now that this unnecessary coal crisis has been allowed to explode in the country's face, the thankless job of averting tragedy has been thrust upon Ickes, the clown and scapegoat—and he has saved the situation.

Ickes's war record has been as good as his political record—although since 1940 it has been infinitely more difficult for him to get action or even to see the President. As one chapter of this book relates, his war record goes back to 1933, when most people thought that our regeneration was a purely national problem but when Public Works Administrator Ickes was spending the first $237,000,000 of his unprecedented appropriation for the navy. Since 1940 his war record has been made fighting his better-placed anti-New Deal colleagues and correcting their blunders.

In the spring of 1941, when Ickes became oil czar, the Administration did not realize that the only way the people would enter the war was against Japan. Instead, it was trying to bribe Japan with oil to let this be a one-ocean war. Although Ickes's jurisdiction over oil was purely domestic, he immediately seized on a temporary local shortage to stop a cargo leaving for Japan. No public beating he has taken from his enemies compares with what he then received in private. He came closer to being fired than Jesse Jones ever has. But he took his beating in silence, waited while the congratulatory letters poured in from all over the country, and simply packed them into two trunks which he sent over to the Secretary of State.

Today, if we have enough gasoline to keep our bombers in the air over Germany, if England has enough gasoline in storage to keep the offensive going this year, if all our tankers have not been knocked off like clay pigeons on the Atlantic Coast, if pipe lines have finally been built (Donald Nelson's first use of his authority was to veto them), we can thank Harold Ickes. If we have an aluminum and a magnesium program, if we have begun using our precious Western metals, if some bunglers have been fired out of Washington, and if the public knows about others, we can thank Ickes and what is left of his team. As a matter of fact, we wouldn't have Henry Kaiser or many of our other West Coast miracles if it had not been for the Interior Department's monumental water-power program in the West.

Victories so prodigious never come easily to a curmudgeon. Ickes bought every one of them with his iron fist, thick skin, and poison pen. He bought it with his letters of resignation to the President and with his letters of accusation to his colleagues. Whereas this Congress is crucifying every agency set up to appease it, Ickes is the only man in the government whose word it takes and out of whose way it stays.

This book is the story of how Ickes learned to be a curmudgeon. It does not include the incredible story of how he made the country hate and respect him. Nevertheless, its careful analysis of a generation of Progressive Republican politics, in Illinois and in the nation, sheds a good deal of light on the genesis of the coalition which made the Democratic Party the vehicle for the New Deal in 1932, as well as on the nature of the present coalition which has replaced it.

The book makes grand reading. It is full of unforgettable stories. Item, when Ickes asked Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis to run against Big Bill Thompson, Landis said, "Ickes, I would just as soon have you ask me to clean a back-house." It is spiced with Ickesisms like "Hats off to Frank B. Kellogg who 'outlawed' war in so many words." And it abounds with invective worthy of the classical curmudgeon tradition:

The miserable machinations that went on in that [Republican] convention [of 1920] were stomach-turning. They made me feel as if I had a mouth full of alum. They gripe me still when I think of them. They were poison ivy even to a curmudgeon. Medill McCormick, thumbing his nose at the people, was happily hopping hither and yon as one of the inside group determined upon carrying out the will of the notorious machine which he and I both had fought, sincerely as I thought, and with conviction, in the good old days. Boies Penrose lay as his deathbed in Philadelphia, while his safety-deposit box was bursting with banknotes of large denominations—dying but not yet ready to be shriven before delivering himself up to judgment.

Penrose joined by telephone in the conspiracy that was being brewed in the "small smoke-filled room" where an evil candidate was to emerge from the witch's caldron.

The curmudgeon is not free now to write and speak as he pleases. But when he returns to his journalistic trade and is again free to permit himself the luxury of dealing in personalities, we may be sure that in Volume II of his autobiography—and in his papers—we shall find no such moderation as he forced upon himself in this prologue to the second greatest story of the Roosevelt era.

ELIOT JANEWAY

Africa, Past and Future

AFRICA: FACTS AND FORECASTS. By Albert M. Maisel. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

MR. MAISEL had the excellent idea of compiling a popular politico-economic guide to Africa, the necessary facts to be spiced with a running commentary on their significance. Africa deserves such a handbook. It deserves far more, for it is in many ways one of the world's great problems—and will remain so after the war.

The problems of progress in Africa—human, economic, political—are of a magnitude to stagger the imagination. They parallel, and perhaps exceed in complexity, those of Southeast Asia and Latin America, not entirely because Africa is mostly a colonial continent. For while in all these areas the basic task is to raise the productivity of labor to provide the tax base from which to raise funds for the educational, medical, and scientific services which are indispensable preliminaries to political progress, in Africa the psycho-cultural resistance to change is perhaps more intense than elsewhere. African progress, such as it has been in modern times, has been an incidental by-product of the exploitation of the resources, human and physical, by Europeans for the primary benefit of Europe. Mr. Maisel is so keen—and properly—to emphasize the small sums allotted to the social services in colonial budgets, that he fails to make entirely clear that even these pittances are chiefly derived from taxes on European enterprises. The taxes levied on the natives, correctly described as designed to force them to take employment in white enterprises, would not, if diverted in their entirety, support adequate services. It is for this reason that the British have advanced a scheme for subsidizing colonial development, providing the sums in the United Kingdom budget. To begin to solve the African problem, it would be necessary to redesign the African economy from the ground up.

Mr. Maisel sees this clearly enough, but instead of dwelling on complexities as a realist would, he writes a whole section on Africa and the Atlantic Charter. It is full of goodwill, but it sums up to an extension of New Dealism into Africa, though not with tax funds derived from African sources. It contains an overdose of what James T. Shotwell calls "slogan thinking." It is very loosely reasoned. It is based on the notion that international control of colonial areas is certain to be a post-war policy, an approach already thrown into the discard as far as the British are concerned by Messrs. Winston Churchill and Oliver Stanley. And as Mr. Maisel knows, subsidizing public works, etc., etc., without political

AFTER VICTORY— JOBS FOR ALL?

Special Number of SURVEY GRAPHIC
Edited by STUART CHASE

YOU get a glimpse of abundant postwar years in From War to Work, eighth number in Survey Graphic's popular Calling America Series, published May 1.

For this number shows how, if we dare to shape the future now, we can achieve full employment—and keep it going!

In 100 profusely illustrated pages a score of labor leaders, economists, government officials, industrialists, expert observers including Sidney Hillman, Samuel S. Fels, Mariner Eccles, Maxwell Stewart, Paul G. Hoffman, Frieda S. Miller, Beardsley Ruml answer such pertinent questions as—

Why is full employment mandatory? Can we apply war production techniques to peace-time work? Will a depression cripple our political structure? Where do public works, organized labor, private business fit into postwar employment plans? What part will food, manpower, housing, international cooperation play?

This brief summary will suggest, we hope, why Raymond Gram Swing asserts "A wider reading of Survey Graphic would make for a wiser America."

To introduce Survey Graphic to readers of The Nation, we offer not one copy of this special number at the regular rate of 50 cents but—

SIX MONTHS OF SURVEY GRAPHIC FOR ONLY $1.—ONE-THIRD OFF

Like its predecessor in this series, Color: Unfinished Business of Democracy, this number probably will sell out within a month. While they last, subscriptions will include From War to Work. Get your copy. Subscribe today—on the form below!

SURVEY GRAPHIC, 112 East 19th Street, New York City

I accept your introductory offer. Send me the next six issues of Survey Graphic, including From War to Work for the dollar I enclose.

Name.....

Address.....

control of their use is very risky business, in Africa and elsewhere. Mr. Maisel is on the side of the angels, but like so many angels he pays too little attention to the machinations of the devils of status quo. Even within his limitations he is careless. He says that the funds for his African Development Commission should come "for the most part" from the United States, Britain, Russia, and China. It is to be doubted that Russia will have capital funds for African development. It is certain that China will have none. British publicists have said time and again that the United Kingdom simply cannot afford to bring the African social services up to a reasonably satisfactory level. That leaves the United States to carry the heft of the burden. Will it do so?

Moreover, Mr. Maisel, like all too many writers on the world's depressed areas, is so beguiled by technological possibilities that he fails to place Africa in the context of the world's future markets. To be sure he points out how small a proportion of world trade Africa now claims, but the only way Africa can profit by an increase in its export production, is through an increase in the total volume of that trade. A mere struggle, even though subsidized, to increase its fraction of existing trade will get Africa no place. Africa's future in world trade therefore turns upon the condition of the post-war world market for its produce. Mr. Maisel has nothing to say on the point.

He might profitably have employed some of the space he devotes to the North African military and political campaigns to placing Africa in the world context. In fact, by hewing all too closely to the news, Mr. Maisel makes his whole book far more topical than a handbook should be.

In pages 171 to 304 he really gets down to his job as a compiler. He there reviews the political divisions of Africa seriatim. In general he does a useful job. He tells the reader a great deal about Africa, more or less painlessly. If he had enlarged this section and reduced the topical material, he would really have achieved his general purpose. He sometimes fails to state important matters fully. He is unfair to the Portuguese for example, for he does not make it clear that labor employers are as open to criticism as labor exporters—that the British mining magnates are as much to be censured as the Portuguese colonial administrators; he fails to state the British interest in the railways running to the coast through Mozambique; and his reference to Lourenco Marques is hardly an adequate statement of the significance of that important port. Small errors creep in. Sir Henry Morton Stanley was an Englishman, not an American; the Anglo-Egyptian condominium is not a unique political institution, for the same form is used to control the New Hebrides and Canton Island; and the High Commission Territories pre-date the evolution of the Union of South Africa's native policy into its present depressing shape.

In his bibliography, generally useful, Mr. Maisel omits any references to J. M. Tinley's careful "Native Problem of South Africa" (1942), which is that rare thing, a good book on Africa by an American academician; W. K. Hancock's survey of British African affairs, "Survey of British Commonwealth Affairs, Volume II, Problems of Economic Policy, 1918-39, Part 2" (1942); and the useful compilation "An Economic Survey of the Colonial Empire," published periodically by the Colonial Office, London. Had he consulted the last he might well have worked out a revealing table showing just where British colonial income does go, including the sizable item in every colony devoted to paying pensions to retired civil servants resident in England. But Mr. Maisel does make Africa better known and that is a very useful service.

G. HARTLEY GRATTAN

When the Armistice Comes

THE PEACE WE FIGHT FOR. By Hiram Motherwell.

Harper and Brothers. $3.

THIS review is written in Chicago, the city which, according to her enemies, has only two seasons—winter and August. But as I write these lines, after a long and hard winter, warm spring sunshine peeps through the window. Likewise Hiram Motherwell's new book comes as a refreshing episode after a long, hardly bearable succession of superficial books on reconstruction and post-war problems.

I certainly do not agree altogether with what Motherwell suggests. I don't know whether I agree with 50 per cent of what he writes and proposes. But I know that the book was written by a man who knows Europe, who has an idealistic outlook and a practical mind, and thus is fitted to deal with the complicated problems of a cockeyed post-war world. Hiram Motherwell learned his lesson in the hard way. For ten years he was correspondent in Europe; seven of them he spent, for the Chicago Daily News, in Berlin and Rome.

Once upon a time only persons who thoroughly knew their subject were considered experts. Then suddenly any young man with six months' experience as a radio commentator or as a cub reporter in Berlin was hailed as an expert after writing a book on his fleeting experiences.

Hiram Motherwell belongs to the class of experts who know what they are talking about. The 224 pages of his book which constitute the actual analysis and the concrete proposals of reconstruction are full of facts or of deductions based on clear thinking. The analysis of Europe on "armistice day" is a magnificent piece of work, even if it is unduly depressing. I think Motherwell in this chapter is unduly pessimistic because he does not take sufficiently into account the apathy and tiredness the average European will feel after this war. Still, it is better to be prepared for the worst than to entertain false illusions concerning the shape of things to come. In Motherwell's picture empty shops, reticent farmers, broken-down trains, collapsed currencies complicate the existing political chaos. Wages no longer mean anything in purchasing power. On the other hand, according to Motherwell, there will be plenty of arms for the masses of Europe, including those hidden and now unearthed by people no longer fearing the revenge of the Gestapo.

Pessimistic as Motherwell's description of the post-war period may be, he believes that all these problems can be solved if enough good-will and common sense are used to unravel the tangle. Motherwell has sensible proposals as to the distribution of food in Europe. Also he proposes a "European dollar" currency as a solution for the financial problems of Europe. Since Motherwell wrote his book, England's unorthodox but brilliant John Maynard Keynes has come out with a surprisingly similar proposition.

Motherwell proposes the establishment of an interim super-government of Europe, which will slowly yield power to the various regional federations. This sounds somewhat utopian, but, again, Motherwell has a good argument. If the Anglo-Saxon countries wish European federation, this time such an objective can be achieved, because there will be no armies left in Europe except those of Russia. The writer also warns against too much wishful thinking, and in the chapter on "super-government" he insists that the United Nations will not be able to "impose" democratic governments on all nations but must encourage them to choose governments which best fit their form of life. Those who witnessed the problems of the last post-war period know how realistic Motherwell's observations are. Already at this juncture he points out the need of friendship between Russia and the other United Nations. "If this should be sabotaged," he says, "by factional groups within the United Nations governments or by red-hot revolutionists in the U. S. S. R., then we may as well get ready for World War III."

Sometimes, however, Motherwell becomes too "practical." He advises, for example, that Hjalmar Schacht, who rehabilitated the German mark after the 1923 inflation, be used by the super-government as a financial expert. Motherwell remembers only the Schacht who rehabilitated the mark. But I remember the Schacht who in 1935 tied up the Balkan countries in Germany's service as sources of raw material for Germany's coming war effort.

His chapter on the balance of power is a brilliant analysis. Motherwell, in fact, proposes a new balance of power: England and Russia combining to keep Europe disarmed and peaceful, and the American and English navies cooperating as the necessary counterpoise to this balance. Because in Motherwell's mind Europe cannot offer sufficient markets to American trade, great efforts should be made to keep the "open-door" policy in Asia, but in all Asia, including the British and Dutch possessions.

The author believes that a people's peace has now become feasible because for the first time in the history of the world it is technologically possible to see that all people get enough to eat, as Vice-President Wallace has already pointed out.

Motherwell's book is provoking and disarming. It is the challenge of a practical idealist who knows his subject and whose thinking is crystal-clear.

M. W. FODOR

Fiction in Review

WHILE I have never been of the majority that considers Sinclair Lewis, even the Sinclair Lewis of "Main Street" and "Babbitt," a great novelist, I feel sad to have to report of "Gideon Planish" (Random House, $2.50) that I found it unimportant, sloppy, and even dull. There is something personally endearing about Mr. Lewis as a writer that checks a completely objective estimate of his recent work—a sweetness of temper, perhaps, that comes through everything he writes, or his boyish idealism of which he is so boyishly ashamed. Or perhaps it is merely because his fictional creations seem so clearly to be aspects of his own many-faceted personality that one feels that to turn and attack him is to take unfair advantage of what he has been naive

ON FURLOUGH? 20% DISCOUNT TO ALL MEN IN THE ARMED FORCES

HONEYMOON HAVEN

OPEN MAY 15
FREE GOLF
To June 27

In the Heart of
The Adirondacks
SCAROON is a
FAIRYLAND in JUNE
The Ideal Vacation Time
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball Courts

N. Y. OFFICE:
BA 7-1970

SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL • 4771 SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

Facilities for a limited number of families with children

AMUSEMENTS

Theatre Guild's New Musical

OKLAHOMA!

ST. JAMES THEATRE
44th Street West of Broadway
EVES, 8:30 • MATS, Thurs. & Sat.

Musical by
RICHARD RODGERS
Book and Lyrics by
OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2d
Directed by
ROUBEN MAMOULIAN
Dances by
AENES DE MILLE
Betty Gardo, Alfred Drake, Joseph Buloff, Joan Roberts, Lee Dixon, Howard da Silva, Celeste Holm

PARAMOUNT Times Square

On the Screen

CHINA

Starring
LORETTA YOUNG ALAN LADD
A Paramount Picture

"...knowing direction... about acting... moments of melodramatic power..."—Herald Tribune

Stage Show
Harry James & Orch.
Golden Gate Quartet

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME

ADDRESS

enough to tell us about himself. For obviously Mr. Lewis is all the leading characters in his novels, the admirable and the not so admirable—Carol Kennicott and Babbitt and Martin Arrowsmith and Elmer Gantry and now Gideon Planish; this is certainly part of his fictional energy, this constant bubbling-over of his own potentialities, on the one hand, and on the other hand the incessant desire to show himself up. And when an author is showing himself up, it makes a nice problem to decide how much the reader should spare him the censure or satire he has not spared himself.

And in "Gideon Planish," which is in the satiric, debunking tradition of "Elmer Gantry," Mr. Lewis is showing-up for all he is worth. His hero-villain is a young man who rises from a highly questionable professorship in a small Western college to become the "organizer" of a series of highly questionable philanthropic and educational institutions; almost inevitably the present war finds him associated with a group of plain and fancy fascists operating under the name of the Dynamos of Democratic Direction. Gideon Planish is only a soft, dopy, go-getting do-gooder of easy virtue who is in love with the sound of his own words, but with the encouragement of his wife Peony—whose rosy ruthlessness makes her the most attractive character in the book—he makes a fairly good thing of this country's aptitude for organizations. But significantly, long before Gideon has achieved his dubious destiny, Mr. Lewis has become much more interested in his associations than in Gideon himself: in love with the sound of his own words, Mr. Lewis can no more resist the comic-euphonious possibilities of a racket called the Citizens Conference on Constitutional Crises in the Commonwealth, or the muck-raking possibilities of an organization called the Every Man a Priest Fraternity, than Planish can resist spewing forth his balderdash. I am afraid, in fact, that Mr. Lewis is a little like the drawing-room lady who will sacrifice anyone's character for a good story; he will sacrifice any characterization or situation for some good satiric fun, and consequently "Gideon Planish" is full of abstractions—abstractions of people called Bultitude and Blizzard and even Zeke Bittery and Bonnie Popick, and abstractions of situations between his abstractions of people. When he occasionally remembers that he is writing a novel and that a novel, being concerned with human beings, must be concerned with emotion and that emotion exists in conflict, he sets a conflict on top of a character like an undersized hat ready to be blown off by the first breeze; then he himself supplies a gale.

The result of such methods is that, no more than Elmer Gantry won a place for himself in our mythology as the type of religious racketeer, will Gideon Planish win a place for himself as the folk-type of philanthropic racketeer. The muck-raking of character is no substitute for creating character, and if we say of someone "He's a Babbitt," as we never say of anyone, "He's an Elmer Gantry," and as I suspect we shall never say of anyone, "He's a Gideon Planish," it is because there was once a time when Mr. Lewis himself knew that weakness or even villainy must be shown in its full humanity to do its job as literature and grip the popular imagination.

But at least "Gideon Planish," whatever its faults, is on the side of the material and rational and positivistic, which is something to be grateful for in these days of increasing mysticism and mystification. Lion Feuchtwanger's new novel, "Double, Double, Toil and Trouble" (Viking, $2.75), while it professes to cast the non-rational into the clear revealing light of historical analysis, is itself sufficiently rooted in mysticism to be rather disturbing. It tells the story of one Oscar Lautensack (he had his counterpart in real life), a German practitioner of the dark sciences whose gift for mind-reading and foretelling the future brings him into the service of the Nazis at the time of their rise to power. So long as he is kept in rein, Lautensack is useful to the Nazis not only as an adviser to individual leaders, including Hitler, but as public exemplification of the mystical element in the Nazi philosophy and as a public symbol of the supernal powers of the party. So far, so good for even the crassest materialist. But Mr. Feuchtwanger believes in Lautensack's telepathic gifts and makes a sharp distinction between their proper use and their prostitution to Nazism; he gives what seems to me to be disproportionate, actually dangerous, stature to his mind-reader as a mind-reader; so that, if I understand him correctly, he would appear to be saying that the powers of telepathy should be preserved incorruptible for the service of a good political ideal—a discrimination that worries me considerably for the future of his good political ideal. At any rate there seems to be a fellow-novelist whom Upton Sinclair can count on for company when the next democratic convention adjourns for a seance.

Profoundly antipathetic to historical novels, I still can heartily recommend the historical novels of Howard Fast. The first of his books I read was "The Unvanquished," about George Washington; now Mr. Fast has an excellent new novel called "Citizen Tom Paine" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.75); perhaps the book about Tom Paine is a bit self-conscious and a little flossier than the Washington book, but certainly not enough so to spoil it. And it is very timely, not alone for its subject but for its method. For what I keep recalling, in all the fuss over how badly history is taught in the high schools, is not so much the confusion or lack of facts which distinguished my own history education but the sense with which I grew up of there being no conceivable connection between history and my own present; by the lights of my training—which I hope was special—there was once an eighteenth century, and it had wars and treaties and things, and then a couple of hundred years passed and along came the nineteenth century, and it had wars and treaties and things, and then thousands of years passed and finally it was the twentieth century, but thank heaven we didn't have to worry about that because it wasn't yet past, and therefore wasn't in the books! Between this so distant past and the present there was certainly no human connection. Well, I am obviously not suggesting that Howard Fast's novels will change our subhuman tendency to teach and live as if no one ever taught or lived before or after us, but they may help. At least, Mr. Fast is the only contemporary historical novelist I know who works on the premise that even people who were born two hundred years ago were really people. And if there is still a long way to go between his re-creation, say, of Tom Paine and what a really great novelist might do with so appealing and revolting and compelling a character, nevertheless among historical novelists Mr. Fast is at this moment in a class by himself for taste and talent, DIANA TRILLING

IN BRIEF

TILDA. By Mark Van Doren. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

Against the background of the war as it touches the lives of an ordinary family, Mr. Van Doren has written a warm, simple, tender love story. The characters are completely natural, so natural that they seem capable of walking out of the pages of the book and continuing where their author left off. And the nicest thing about it is the way the reader becomes gradually involved in the unfolding of the plot. His objective interest on the Monday morning when the story opens develops into affectionate congratulation at the close a few days later when Tilda bids goodbye to her soldier at the station. Finally, it is no more than one's duty—considering the season—to mention the especially delightful scene at the ball game between the Giants and the Cards. The Giants win.

OVERCOMING ANTI-SEMITISM.

By Solomon A. Fineberg. Harper and Brothers. $2.

This book may be regarded as an extensive exposition of the maxim: "A soft answer turneth away wrath." The author, who has evidently had a wide experience in directing social relations, illumines his thesis with many concrete examples of the efficacy of meeting anti-Semitic prejudice with dignified and unemotional resistance. The book is primarily intended for Jews. Gentiles might read it with profit to discover what kind of spiritual suffering is caused by various forms of discrimination. The study does not pretend to be a profound analysis of the whole racial issue. It seeks only to deal with the immediate problems of Gentile-Jew relations.

REDISCOVERING SOUTH AMERICA.

ICA. By Harry A. Franck. J. B. Lippincott Company. $5.

CHILE. By Erna Fergusson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Here are two travelers' accounts of South America, both written with engaging directness, and both published with plenty of illustrations. Erna Fergusson has long since shown herself a happy traveling companion in Spanish America. She sees, thinks, and writes with an honest feeling of responsibility, she enjoys herself, and she makes you understand that Chileans are real and worth-while people, pretty much like North Americans. Harry Franck, who has traveled more widely and written more books, reports more informally and with fewer quotation marks. He says plainly that he is interested only in what strikes his fancy, and proceeds without a breath of official pan-Americanism. There is a great deal to be said for such books, which offer us the immediacy of direct experience without the physical pangs of cold, hunger, and exhaustion that go with real travel. They are not far enough removed from the event to be great books, but they are probably more valuable as a foundation for understanding the lands and the people they tell of than are the compendiums of professional reporters who interview Presidents and Cabinet members and draw on the "Encyclopedia Britannica" for statistics.

THIS TIME FOR KEEPS.

By John MacCormac. The Viking Press. $2.

John MacCormac is an astute observer of contemporary history and a wise guide into the future. What he has to say about the problems of the war and the issues of the post-war period is always on the side of the angels. "There are two ways," he declares, "in which we can lose the peace after winning the war. The one is to pretend that this is a soldiers' war in which a military victory is all that matters. The other would be to allow the setting up of reactionary governments in Europe as barriers to bolshevism." His advice in regard to the treatment of the defeated nations is equally prudent. MacCormac is the kind of person who could write a great book on war and peace. But this is not it. Its chapters are too occasional and disjointed, and the book lacks real unity. A part of it is devoted to a very interesting description of "what the army teaches the soldier," drawn from the author's own experience as a teacher in the army orientation courses. The information is somewhat reassuring, though he admits that the "army does not see that this is an ideological war in which some of the most important weapons are intellectual ones."

THE CHILEAN POPULAR FRONT.

By John Reese Stevenson. University of Pennsylvania Press. $1.50.

Here is an able and a much-needed contribution to the political literature of the Americas. Chile is an important country to watch because, like Mexico, it stands somewhat ahead of its neighbors and suggests the way others will go. Because the forces at work there—economic, social, and political—are curiously exposed and clear, the evolution of government in Chile is of great general interest as well. Any student of political history will profit by this demonstration of democracy trying to realize itself. The various roads to dictatorship, the danger of "congressional anarchy," the futility of social reform without a reliable political basis, the kind of class solidarity upon which democracy will function—and the kind which is its negation—such situations are of universal import. Mr. Stevenson's account, though it suffers somewhat from the indecisiveness and didacticism of the thesis, is a serious and honest report. It is not a book to pick up for entertainment, but it affords the basis of knowledge upon which any fruitful contact with the Latin American countries must be founded.

ANGLO-AMERICAN LITERARY RELATIONS.

By George Stuart Gordon. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

The late George Gordon, Merton professor of English literature, president of Magdalen College, and professor of poetry in the University of Oxford, was one of the most popular and stimulating lecturers among English scholars. Since he published little it is fortunate that Dr. R. W. Chapman has made a book out of this material, originally delivered as lectures on the Sulgrave Manor Foundation at University College, London, and later at the Royal Institution. Few writers have spoken with more real appreciation of early American literature, or, among foreigners (one hesitates to use the word, though Gordon was never in this country), with deeper understanding of America's aspirations for a literature of her own growth.

MUSIC

THE Ballet Theater has added to its repertory a work of George Balanchine—his "Apollo," to music by Stravinsky. And no weasel words in the Times will change the fact that it brought Balanchine—for the first time, as far as I know—a triumphant success with the general public; that the huge Sunday night audience packed into the Metropolitan that warmly applauded Tudor's "Romeo and Juliet" later burst into applause at several points during "Apollo," roared its approval at the end, continued to applaud the dancers and then Stravinsky, and did not stop until Balanchine appeared, when it burst into another roar and compelled him to appear again; and that it behaved this way about "Apollo" for the same reason as it had applauded "Romeo," and for the same reason as impelled my guest to exclaim after Balanchine's piece: "That was lovely; that was as pure and refreshing as the pas de deux in 'Billy the Kid.'" The audience, that is, expressed its pleasure over what it had seen: the flow of movement in a classical style altered, extended, enriched into a medium for one of the most exciting of imaginations—an imagination that made of the classical solo variation of the male dancer a touching expression of a young Apollo's delight in his powers, and that conveyed other such implications in the other classical ballet situations. The audience's response was the more gratifying since the quality and implications of the movement were only partly achieved by the performance: the two lesser women's roles were well done by Rosella Hightower and especially by Nora Kaye, whose dancing had brilliance, style, and intensity; but there were no brilliance and style in Zorina's dancing of the chief woman's role; and handsomeness and agility were all that Eglevsky had of the equipment of an Apollo. And Balanchine's achievement is the more remarkable for the aridity of much of the music—though a few passages are quite fine.

The next night, for the first time in a number of years, I saw Massine's "Three-Cornered Hat," which had grown rather dim in my memory. And I was delighted all over again by Picasso's setting and costumes, by Massine's choreographic invention, by his own dancing, and by the dancing of Argentinina.

Victor has replaced Schnabel's old recording of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 with the new one (Set 939, $5.78) that he made with the Chicago Symphony under Stock last summer, at the same time as he made the one of the Concerto No. 4 that Victor issued in December. The year that Schnabel took out for meditation and lecturing and writing has been paid for in the lessened precision of execution that has been evident in his playing since then. His performance of the Concerto No. 5 is more nearly perfect in execution than the one of No. 4—in addition to being as incomparably great in its conception of the work; and it is reproduced with a life-like clarity and distinctness—though I must add that, as in the case of No. 4, the sound of the piano is too bright and clangy. The orchestra is reproduced with impressive richness and spaciousness. And the set is one of the great events of the year.

In another Victor set (927, $3.68) are the arias "With Verdure Clad" and "On Mighty Pens" (with their recitatives) from Haydn's "Creation," and "Rejoice Greatly, O Daughter of Zion!" and "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" from Handel's "Messiah," sung by Eleanor Steber, soprano, with the Victor Symphony under Charles O'Connell. Most of the music is very beautiful; and in some of it—in "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" and "On Mighty Pens"—one hears a fine voice, used with excellent musicianship, but a little harshly metallic as reproduced by the records; while in the rest the voice is clouded by a strong tremolo, and the harshly metallic quality is more pronounced and disturbing. The orchestral accompaniments are rhythmically flabby and sometimes unsteady in pace; and they too are not well recorded, with the sound that is clear and bright at the beginning of some sides getting muffled and dull at the end.

In place of its old records of Stokowski's feverishly and glitteringly sensationalized performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's fine "Russian Easter" Overture with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Victor has issued a set (937, $2.63) containing Stokowski's even more feverishly and glitteringly sensationalized performance of the work with the N.B.C. Symphony, recorded with up-to-the-minute fidelity, brilliance, and spaciousness. Having performed less effectively with wind instruments passages in "Tristan" that Wagner wrote for voices, Stokowski now has a voice sing less effectively a chant-like passage in the Overture that Rimsky-Korsakov wrote for the trombone. I am not unaware of the grim humor in Stokowski's knowing better than Rimsky-Korsakov, who himself acted on his belief that he knew better than Mussorgsky how "Boris Godunov" should have been written.

Debussy's Sonata No. 3 for violin and piano (Set 938, $2.63), a late exercise of Debussy's style in a vacuum, is well played by Mischa Elman and Leopold Mittman; and their performance is more beautifully recorded than the Dubois-Maas performance in the old Columbia set. Weinberger's Czech Rhapsody (11-8297, $1.05), a negligible piece of music, is well performed by Kinder with the National Symphony, and the performance is richly recorded.

B. H. HAGGIN

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Mr. Hugh Dave McWhirri Looks After the $1.00 Investment in the Pilot Newspaper and Contributes Generously of His Time and Thoughts.* With an Introduction by James Boyd, Publisher of the Pilot. The Pilot.
- The Battle for Buenos Aires.* By Sax Bradford. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
- Kendall of the Picanyny.* By Fayette Cope-land. Oklahoma. $3.
- Journey Among Warriors.* By Eve Curie. Doubleday, Doran. $3.50.
- The Feeding of War Workers.* A Selected, Annotated Bibliography. Prepared by Rita B. Friedman. Industrial Relations Section, Princeton. 25 cents.
- The Maine Idea.* Stories and Pictures Arranged by Keith Warren Jennison. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
- Order in the Court.* By John C. Knox. Scribner's. $2.75.
- The Mind and Faith of Justice Holmes.* His Speeches, Essays, Letters and Judicial Opinions. Selected and Edited with an Introduction and Commentary by Max Lerner. Little, Brown. $4.
- Introduction to Modern English and American Literature.* By W. Somerset Maugham. New Home Library. 69 cents.
- The Economics of War.* By Horst Men-derhausen. Revised. Prentice-Hall. $3.55.
- Founded Upon the Seas.* A Narrative of Some English Maritime and Overseas Enterprises During the Period 1550 to 1616. By Wal-ter Oakeshott. Oxford. $3.50.
- George Gascoigne's A Hundreth Sundrie Flowres.* Edited with an Introduction and Notes by C. T. Prouty. Missouri. $1.50.
- The Moonlight Traveler.* Great Tales of Fantasy and Imagination. Selected and with an Introduction by Philip Van Doren Stern. Doubleday, Doran. $3.
- Thomas Wolfe's Letters to His Mother Julia Elizabeth Wolfe.* Edited with an Introduction by John Skally Terry. Scribner's. $3.
- Miracle in Hellas: The Greeks Fight On.* By Betty Wason. Macmillan. $2.75.
- Mind, Medicine, and Man.* By Gregory Zil-boorg, M.D. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
- The Living Thoughts of Clausewitz.* Pre-sented by Colonel Joseph I. Greene. Long-mans, Green. $1.50.
- Popular Free Thought in America, 1825-1850.* By Albert Post. Columbia. $3.
- From Line.* The Official Story of the Civil Defense of Britain. Macmillan. $1.50.
- Constitution Making in a Democracy: Theory and Practice in New York State.* By Ver-non O'Rourke and Douglas W. Campbell. Johns Hopkins. $2.75.
- The Sword Was Their Passport: A History of American P filibustering in the Mexican Revolution.* By Harris Gaylor Warren. Louisiana State University Press. $3.
- An Invitation to Spanish.* By Margarita Madrigal and Ezequias Madrigal. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.
- New York Plans for the Future.* By Cleo-land Rodgers. Harpers. $3.

Letters to the Editors

Russia and the Comintern

Dear Sirs: Dr. Niebuhr, in his criticism of my review of "America, Russia, and the Communist Party in the Post War World," enthusiastically misses the point. I did not chide the authors of that dubious little book for their very reasoned criticism of the policies of the Communist Party. I have myself been a critic of those policies. I did rebuke them for their ridiculous exaggerations and pointed out the dangers inherent in the proposal to make our good relations with the U. S. S. R. depend upon Moscow's repudiation of the Comintern.

Messrs. Childs, Counts, and Niebuhr are anxious to achieve genuine collaboration with Russia in the post-war world, but they should not raise issues which one of them, Dr. Niebuhr, regards as not the real cause of disagreement between the capitalist democracies and the U. S. S. R. That Dr. Niebuhr does know that the Comintern is not the issue is suggested by his statement that the authors "are afraid that the irrelevancies of local Communists will imperil that collaboration by seeming to justify reactionary opposition to partnership with Russia" (my italics). Communist Party activities, that is to say, merely seem to justify capitalist hostility; yet Dr. Niebuhr thinks that those activities wholly justify liberal hatred.

And let it be restated. The tactics of the Comintern have frequently estranged the labor movement, particularly its right wing, from the U. S. S. R. But neither the existence of the Comintern nor its methods have been the cause of the ineradicable hatred felt by the old ruling classes. There was no Comintern in 1917 when intervention against the young Soviet state began. The British Communist Party was not founded until August, 1920, when the British government had been engaged in war and subvention of war against the U. S. S. R. for two years. The Labor Party in those days thoroughly understood that what the British Tories desired in attempting to destroy the Soviets was the destruction of the entire working-class movement of Europe, reformist or revolutionary. The fear of reform and revolution and the fear of the Soviet Union as a collectivist state, not dislike of the Comintern as a separate factor, was at the bottom, middle depth, and surface of Tory hostility. It was so throughout the whole period between wars. Not the 1,400 British Communists nor the 45,000 members of the Spanish Party provided the reason for the policy of non-intervention which destroyed the Spanish Republic. The betrayal of Czecho-Slovakia was in no way the consequence of Mr. Pollitt's manners. The attempt to isolate the Soviet Union at Munich was not a result of Chamberlain's fear of the Comintern but of his fear of the millions who were growing dissatisfied with capitalist society. Experience has shown that the Comintern's practical abandonment of revolutionary policies after 1933 made not the slightest difference to the capitalist opposition. The ruling classes of Europe would have none of the U. S. S. R. This fact supports my belief that the abolition of the Comintern, while it would delight Dr. Niebuhr, would be of little interest to the realistic Tories. And, it must be said again, a Soviet Union that managed to restore itself and grow prosperous, with or without the Communist Party, will be feared by the diehards. Conversely, sound liberals, whether or not the Communist Party continues to exist, will always seek to frustrate the diehards even when those liberals disapprove of Soviet foreign policy, as this writer upon occasion has done.

With a certain lack of tactical sense I added in two lines of my review that I believed a united front desirable. And that gave Dr. Niebuhr a peg upon which to hang an all too characteristic tirade. But the question of the United Front is not really relevant to the discussion of the Modest Proposal. Nevertheless, though I would like to defer lengthy debate on the united front, Dr. Niebuhr is wrong again when he says that I urge the united front in order to bring about unity between the governments of the United Nations. The European united front I think to be necessary in the fight against Hitler and as a means of frustrating, in the post-war world, the Girauds, the Peyroutons, and the Francos who may have been established by governments which, very manifestly, liberals cannot control. Or perhaps Dr. Niebuhr can guarantee to the European masses that American liberals will deal with this problem satisfactorily?

RALPH BATES

New York, April 20

Keep the FSA

Dear Sirs: Recent news items show plainly that the Farm Security Administration has gone to bat for farmers—dairy farmers included. FSA is the only farm agency actually providing the necessary skilled help for farmers, and has already moved into New York more than 200 farmers from Kentucky and West Virginia—with more coming all through the month of April. All receive training at agricultural schools before being hired—as farming in the South is different from that in the North.

This is exactly what farmers are asking for—help that knows how to handle machinery and doesn't have to be followed around every minute. It is what the country desperately needs if there is to be enough food for civilian and military needs. How unfortunate, then, that the so-called "farm-bloc" succeeded in limiting FSA on the common-sense program. Instead, we have palmed off on us a so-called "land army" of school boys and city workers. It is nice to know that city people are ready to cooperate, but too often it will not be worth the effort. You can't put people at work they are unfamiliar with and expect much. In the long run, it is city consumers who will suffer if a lack of skilled farm help decreases food production.

The ball was started rolling when the big-business farm bloc got Congress to pass a law fixing cotton acreage at a minimum of 26,000,000 acres. As a result, cotton acreage was boosted, and the man-power, machinery, and fertilizer problems for the rest of agriculture were balled up. The farm bloc is unwilling to curtail cotton production in spite of the fact that warehouses are said to overflow with a two-year supply of cotton.

An example of the cost to the rest of agriculture, and the consuming public, of not reducing the cotton acreage: More than 2,000,000 people work at harvesting cotton, and 2,000,000 tons of fertilizer are used each year on these cotton fields; release 50 per cent of the labor and fertilizer for increased production of essential war crops and we shall take a long step toward solving food shortages.

President O'Neal of the Farm Bureau has an Alabama plantation and argues that cotton acreage must be kept up because of the oil-bearing cotton seeds! Wouldn't it make more sense to grow more peanuts, soy beans, and other oil-producing products? Since when must we grow cotton just to get oil?

The farm bloc, of which the Farm Bureau is an important part, has stood in the way of FSA too long as it is. If this interference continues, food-production goals will be sacrificed. Give to FSA the leadership it has so well earned in solving the farm labor shortage. Put the money for transportation back into the fund for the land army—let FSA, instead of the Farm Bureau, administer the funds so FSA can carry out its original intention to provide farmers with 3,500,000 skilled farm workers instead of the 3,500,000 school boys and city workers the Farm Bureau is now endeavoring to get together. We are at war—not play. We must produce to win—and each must do the job he knows best if production is to be accomplished and not bungled.

RUTH B. HILL

Jamesville, N. Y., April 15

Dr. Stoecker

Dear Sirs: Recently the metropolitan press briefly noted the death in New York City of Dr. Helene Stoecker, whom it characterized as a German feminist leader. That she was—if the phrase must still be used—but she was more truly a symbol of those, in Germany and throughout the world, whose lives have been devoted to social welfare and to peace.

She was born in 1869 in Elberfeld in the Rhineland. The care she bestowed, as the eldest child, upon her many brothers and sisters was her earliest preparation for the subsequent task of helping mothers and children. Her almost revolutionary decision to attend the University of Berlin led to the Ph.D. degree in 1901 and to the honor of being one of the first women to attain it. Later she studied at the University of Glasgow and the University of Berne.

In 1905 she founded the League for the Protection of Mothers and for Sex Reform and began publication of its periodical, the New Generation. Both the league and the periodical became internationally known. The National Socialists' ascent to power, ended their existence in 1933. Through the work of the league, national and international congresses, and lectures in many countries including the United States, Helene Stoecker strove to raise relationships between the sexes to a higher level where they would be freed from the hampering bonds of archaic custom and law. She believed that love and motherhood and intellectual companionship between men and women were more sacred than narrow moralistic codes of sex conduct. For years she pleaded for the removal of the stigma from illegitimate children and from the mothers who had borne them. Supporters of the rigid code of morals that she decried attacked her furiously. They saw her only as an advocate of wantonness. They never knew her as the great respecter of the dignity of human life.

Because she believed so ardently in the worth of every human being, the First World War was a shattering experience for her. The insanity of war must cease, she declared. People in every country—and mothers first of all—must be organized to end its awful menace. Thus she embarked on the second half of her life's work. "To Love or to Hate," "Psychology of Sex and War," "Humanity, Woman, and the Sanctity of Life" were among her books against war. She became an active member of societies founded for the promotion of peace—The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the League of Human Rights, the International Peace Bureau in Geneva, on whose governing board she sat, and the German League for Peace, of which she was vice-president.

Immediately upon the accession of Herr Hitler and his cohorts, she left Germany for Switzerland. Her work could no longer be done in her native country, even if the Nazis tolerated her. Thus began the ten years' exile that took her around the world. From Switzerland she went to England to await a visa for the United States. While on a professional trip to Sweden, England's declaration of war closed the door to a westward passage. Finally, however, she got to Russia, across the Soviet Union to Japan, and across a still peaceful Pacific to San Francisco.

She had reached the United States—seven years after leaving Germany. She was ready to begin her work again, in spite of her more than seventy years and a surgical operation that had succeeded only in prolonging her life briefly. Once more, for a short while, she was a speaker at conventions, a leader in the long fight. Her books, papers, and the correspondence of many decades had been burned during a German raid on the London docks. She would write an autobiography, she told herself, which would recount the struggle for the emancipation of women and the emancipation of mankind from war. In a room overlooking the Hudson River, which she said was more beautiful than the Rhine, the autobiography grew chapter by chapter. But death overtook her. Some one else must finish the record.

PHILIPINE HANNAK

New York, March 25

Precedent

Dear Sirs: Aha! "It sometimes seems to me as if he didn't marry on purpose to make me feel badly," said Lady Agatha Chasemore, a well-educated and correct young American lady, the heroine of a story called "The Modern Warning," by Henry James.

FRANK JONES

New Haven, Conn., April 23

Brito Foucher

Dear Sirs: In the March 27 issue of The Nation, in your column entitled In the Wind, is a statement concerning the New England Institute of Inter-American Affairs which was recently held at Boston University. Two things in that statement warrant reply: In the first place, Brito Foucher was by no means the only representative from Mexico at our institute. We had five distinguished Mexicans in addition to the rector of the National University. In the second place, let me submit the following statements concerning the invitation extended to Rodolfo Brito Foucher:

1. In preparing the program we desired a number of Mexicans and South Americans. The reason for this desire is inherent in the purpose of the institute.

2. I asked the Pan-American Union in Washington to recommend a distinguished university president ("rector," as they call a university head in Latin America). Brito Foucher was recommended as the best one for us to get.

3. We invited Brito Foucher because he is the distinguished head of the National University of Mexico, the oldest university on the North American continent.

4. The first protest was received two days before he was due to arrive in Boston, presumably after he had already left Mexico City. However, I called on the telephone both the director general of the Pan-American Union and the ambassador from Mexico to the United States and made known to them the nature of the protests. They both advised us to keep Brito Foucher on our program.

CONTRIBUTORS

5. All the protests that reach me make the same charges in almost identical language. I know that they all stem from the same source—and I do not regard that source as authoritative.

6. When the invitation was extended we knew nothing about Brito Foucher's political or economic theories. After his arrival in Boston I talked with him frankly about his alleged sympathy with Nazism and fascism. He assured me that there was not a word of truth in the charges; that the allegation was a contemptible political "knifing" by certain "leftists" in Mexico who are politically ambitious and who think that Brito Foucher might expose their selfishness. Hence they seek to belittle him in the United States by calling him anti-democratic and pro-fascist, and they seek to belittle him in Mexico by calling him pro-United States. Incidentally, it should interest anybody of intelligence to note that Brito Foucher was a guest of the United States government during his visit here. I saw the letter, duly stamped and signed, written him on behalf of the State Department by Mr. Messersmith, the United States ambassador to Mexico, inviting him to be the guest of our government during his stay in this country.

7. Although I do not know that Brito Foucher has ever spoken approvingly of Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco, I cannot refrain asking: What if he did? We all know that there was a time when many Americans—even Americans in prominent positions—spoke enthusiastically of Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco, and of their works in their respective countries. But we do not now question the loyalty of such Americans. Why not exercise the same tolerance toward a Mexican?

8. I think that the spirit that would prevent the presence of the duly constituted rector of a great university on such a program as this because of dislike of his religious, political, or economic theories is more menacing to true democracy than Brito Foucher can possibly be.

DANIEL L. MARSH,

President Boston University

Boston, Mass., March 29

[We are glad to know that Brito Foucher was not the only representative from Mexico at the New England Institute of Inter-American Affairs.

We are astounded to learn that it would make no difference to the president of Boston University even if he were sure that Mr. Foucher had spoken approvingly of Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco.

We are puzzled, in view of Mr. Marsh's attitude, to find him entering so violent a protest against our statement that Mr. Foucher had given evidence of pro-fascist sympathies.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Not So Many

Dear Sirs: May I correct an erroneous impression given by Mr. Frank Jones in his review "Skilled Workers" in your issue of April 17? "Of a recent group, Masfield recurs annually, sometimes oftener; Eberhart and Flanner every two or three years." The erroneous impression is that I have published many books. That is not true, nor are the specified intervals correct. I have up to this date published three books. The London and New York dates are, respectively: 1929, 1930; 1936, 1937; 1940, 1942.

Opinions are to be respected, in some degree, as such. Misrepresentations of fact, when possible, should be jettisoned.

RICHARD EBERHART, Lieut. U. S. N. R.
Hollywood, Fla., April 24

* INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

WILLIAM H. JORDY is a young freelance writer living in New York. He has written for The Nation before.

CLAUDE McKAY, the well-known Negro poet, lived in North Africa for several years during the 1930's. His books include "Spring in New Hampshire," "Harlem Ballads," "A Long Way from Home," and "Harlem: Negro Metropolis."

KARL J. SHAPIRO was studying medicine in Baltimore when the draft call came. He is now a sergeant, somewhere in the Pacific area. He has contributed to Poetry, Harper's, and other magazines, and has published a book, "Person, Place and Thing."

M. W. FODOR is the author of "Plot and Counter-Plot in Central Europe."

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is the author of "Preface to Chaos," "The Deadly Parallel," "Australia and New Zealand Today," and "The Three Jameses—A Family of Minds."

ELIOT JANEWAY has written on economic and political subjects for Harper's, Asia, and The Nation. He is on the staff of Time, Inc.

Contemporary

JEWISH RECORD

"A MAGAZINE OF REAL DIGNITY AND WORTH"

—WALDO FRANK

- Significant Articles by such writers as Salo W. Baron, Waldo Frank, Louis Golding, Thomas Mann.
- "The Cedars of Lebanon," a series of timely interpretations of Judaism.
- March of Events, the news in concise form—country by country.
- Magazine Digest.
- Book Reviews.

In the Current Issue

The Story Behind Giraud's Abrogation of the Crémieux Decree

Hannah Arendt

Palestine: Commonwealth or Bi-National State?.....Erich Kahler

New Forces in American Art. Illustrated.....William Schack

Writing American Jewish History.....Harold J. Jonas

The Cedars of Lebanon: 2. Jewish Ideals.....Joseph Jacobs

Please start my subscription with the issue described above. I enclose ☐ for 1 year (6 issues).

Name City

Address State

CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD, 386 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

N583

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 12

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Name of two U. S. Presidents
- 6 Snake which inspires its anagram
- 9 Something put by for a rainy day, perhaps
- 10 One of the lower classes
- 11 If you can't increase income try to reduce this
- 12 Signified? It is not in deed
- 16 A Texan naturally displays temper if you knock his block off
- 19 Contracts
- 22 Awkwardness due to an unsuitable cape?
- 23 Shakespearean king
- 24 Pro-American British statesman (1708-1778)
- 25 A "brain truster" of Plato's day
- 26 The pursuit of pale pills by purple people
- 27 A sly look backward
- 28 Mathematical result produced by a Scot in R. A. F.
- 31 Montaigne thought it sometimes more triumphant than victory
- 33 This is always wanted
- 36 A vendetta started this writer going
- 39 A round in two senses
- 40 Wine after tea? This ought to tie you up
- 41 He prefers his own company
- 42 He managed to push them along in the old coaching days
- 43 Leads in confusion

DOWN

- 1 Change this
- 2 An outside lie
- 3 The turf in front of the lair is wet
- 4 Mackintoshes perhaps?
- 5 Lidden in: Would you risk it if you were me?

- 6 An article on poetry has electrifying results
- 7 "Our feelings we with difficulty smother, When constabulary ----- to be done" (Pirates of Penzance)
- 8 Castles in the air
- 13 A tied race (anag.)
- 14 What the virtues of consumers' goods need no longer be? (hyphen, 3 and 6)
- 15 Fisher Ames felt that biennial ones gave the people an opportunity for second thoughts
- 17 One name for a flower
- 18 Highest form of animal life?
- 20 Slander
- 21 "Virtuous and vicious every man must be, Few in the -----, but all in the degree" (Pope)
- 29 This may be over your head
- 30 Captured
- 31 Detachment with the medical officer behind
- 32 Where the fighting is thickest.
- 34 Suitable material for soldiers in training?
- 35 Pistols-for-two-coffee-for-one affairs
- 37 You can make sure of this
- 38 Seen in the eye, the sky and the garden

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 11

ACROSS: 1 SHIP OF THE LINE; 10 NAN-KEEN; 11 OCULIST; 12 INDIANA; 13 ICE COOL; 14 PEGASUS; 15 ROSSINI; 16 SKIPTIC; 20 GOERING; 23 TISSUES; 24 SAP-SAGO; 25 ORLANDO; 26 LEADERS; 27 AN EYE FOR AN EYE.

DOWN: 2 HANGDOG; 3 PECANS; 4 PENLANS; 5 HOOSIER; 6 LAURELS; 7 NAIROBI; 8 INDISPOSITION; 9 STALKING HORSE; 17 EX-SOLON; 18 TRUANCY; 19 CAST-OFF; 20 GESSLER; 21 EXPLAIN; 22 IMAGERY.

40% off

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

to the Men in the Armed Forces

Your Kind of Customers!

There are more than 33,500 readers of The Nation doing what you are doing—reading this advertisement. If you have something of interest to offer them—call The Nation Advertising Department for particulars as to space, cost and closing date of the next issue.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES:

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

The Nation

55 Fifth Ave. New York

OPENING MAY 23th

Decoration Day Weekend

- Special June rates include free-use of golf course.
- Log-Cabin Clubhouse, each room with private bath.
- Theatre, lounge, cocktail-bar, sun-deck.
- Lake, 13 championship tennis-courts, all on premises.

Make reservations now!

LENA BARNES • PAUL CAGLIN
Directors

N. Y. Office: 11 West 43 St.
Telephone: BRyant 9-1738
Write for Booklet

GREEN MANSIONS

In the Adirondacks
WARRENSBURG, New York

Whatever the Season
—and particularly when it's Spring—Forest House presents your perfect vacation. Beautiful country, excellent food and accommodations, every sport, 2 lakes. For rest or play—Come to Forest House.
Only 50 Miles from N. Y. C.
Phone MAhopa 688
FOREST HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, New York

45 MILES FROM N. Y. C.

Zindorest

Park

Monroe N. Y.
Telephone 7755

Exclusive location. 150 acres of unusual beauty. ALL SEASONAL SPORTS. Recorded concert music and many other activities for your pleasure. Last word in accommodations and hospitality.
DIXIE TERMINAL BUSES
STOP AT OUR ENTRANCE ★

JOIN the VICTORY HEALTH PARADE to

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
33 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recreations. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N. Y. C. to America, N. Y. Open all year. Write or phone your reservations Stanfordville 4108
EVA BERG, Director

ADDITIONAL
RESORT ADVERTISING
on page 675

Real Country
ONLY 51 MILES AWAY...
WITHIN EASY REACH of your business and war-time emergencies...
A 1600 acre resort of distinction with private golf course, large lake, tennis, saddle horses, fishing and sun terraces. Tempting French cuisine... Delightful entertainment.
By train or bus
Glenmere
high in the Ramapos
CHESTER, N. Y.
Chester 200 — (N. Y.) RE. 5-0547

SPRING DROPS
Buds begin popping, flowers begin to bloom, and you'll also find welcome comfort and relaxation. Tennis bicycling and other invigorating sports only 45 miles from N. Y.
IN AT FREE BOOKLET.
plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N. Y. Tel: Newburgh 4279

Birdland

A VACATION HAVEN 40 MILES FROM N. Y.
CENTRAL VALLEY N. Y.

Formerly Lewisohn's Estate OPEN ALL YEAR
225-acre estate of fascinating hiking country. Tennis, Golf, Handball, Bicycles, Ping-pong, Games, recordings, library, dancing, Open Breunles. Excellent cuisine. Every comfort. Incomparable surroundings. Tel.: Highland Hills, 7805. Your Hostess: FANNIE GOLDBERG

- The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
- A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
- All Sports — Open All Year
- MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7985

REEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N. Y.
A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County
If you choose your hotel with the same care and taste as you would your home, visit this nearby resort. Exclusive. Dignified. Luxuriously furnished. All sport facilities. Excellent cuisine. Less than one hour from New York City.
Phone: Armonk Village 955 Open All Year

MAMANASCO LAKE LODGE
RIDGEFIELD, CONN. Phone 820
Spring beckons again to the most wonderful little resort for your vacation or for a week-end. Ultra modern accommodations. All outdoor activities on our 1 1/2 mile long lake. Varied outdoor recreations. Informal, congenial surroundings. Famous cuisine. Only 60 miles from city via excellent transportation facilities. Moderate rates.

OPEN ALL YEAR
OAKWOOD NEW WINDSOR.
Tel. NEWBURGH 4177
Only 58 miles from N. Y. C.
You are invited to enjoy Springtime at this Charming Colonial Estate. Private Lake. All seasonal sports. Unexcelled food. Attractive rates.

HATHAWAY LODGE
Formerly the palatial 528 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool, Horseshoe, Skating, also Golf nearby. Marvellous food. Open all year. Specially low pre-Summer rates.
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Maline Falls, N. Y.
Tel. Tannersville

Camp CLEWAN-DA
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS
ULSTER PARK, N. Y.
On the Mountain Lake Esopus overlooking the Beautiful Hudson River
Modern, cultural environment for your children. All cabins with latest improvements, all activities, reasonable rates. For full information, write or call for booklet.
JACOB I. DOROSHCHIN, Director
545 - FIFTH AVENUE
MU. 2-4217 — DI. 2-4745 — DI. 6-3849

ECHO LAKE LODGE
BOYS & GIRLS
ADIRONDACKS
Warrensburg
Echo Lake Lodge
Goes Juvenile
Boys & Girls 6 to 16
100 acres of Woodland... Fronting Beautiful Lake... Graded Sandy Beach... Modern Comfortable Quarters... Wholesome Food... Experienced Supervision... Creative Activities.
505 FIFTH AVE., N.Y.C. • MU 2-4622

ALISSUM
"Day Camp for Boys and Girls"
SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW IN ACCOMMODATION FOR PARENTS AND CHILDREN
A luxurious hotel combined with a modern camp for boys & girls, 8-12. Cultural-Occupational work. Write for particulars: Box 127, Armonk, New York

RESORTS

Timberland
MONTICELLO, N. Y.
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS LIMITED 50 MILES FROM ALBANY
Opens May 15th for the Season
MUSIC • LECTURES • CONCERTS
ALL SPORTS — PRIVATE LAKE
N. Y. OFFICE: 15 W. 42 St. LONGOR 5-8476
Directors: Harry N. Boardman • Louis A. Rothblatt
"The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group"

CAMP GEORGE
MONROE NEW YORK
Only 45 miles from New York City
1100 feet elevation. 1, 2, 3-room furnished bungalows for rent by the season.
All athletic facilities.
Brooklyn Office: Glenmere 5-1160

SUMMER RENTALS

BROOKRIDGE COTTAGES. Delightful 3-4-room cottages. Screened porches, fireplaces, fishing, bathing, tennis. All conveniences, commuting. Phone Peekskill 3151M2 or evenings between 5-8, WA 9-0270.

HOUSE TO SHARE

PROFESSIONAL WOMAN with charming home in Croton wishes congenial woman to share house, victory garden, Summer months. Terms reasonable. References. Box 1416, c/o The Nation.

LANGUAGES

Bargain Phonograph Courses. All makes. Mail Orders. Booklet N. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 18 East 41st St., N. Y. C.

ORANGES FOR SALE

NATURAL, tree-ripened oranges. Tangerines. Grapefruit. Delivered Express prepaid. Bushel $4.00. Half-Bushel $2.35. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

Letters from Nation Associates

[We present here a second selection of the many letters from subscribers all over the country who have responded to The Nation's appeal for funds. A report of the results of the campaign appears on page 649 of this issue.]

Mr. Mencken's Conscience

Unhappily, I am forbidden by my conscience, always very tender, to put my millions behind a magazine so implacably opposed to free speech as The Nation is. But there are ways of hocus-ing even conscience, and my confessor, a very smart casuist, suggests one. Within is a modest check. If you will hand it over to your circulation manager, and instruct him to send The Nation for as long as you think fit to as many archbishops as it will cover, then I can plead Not Guilty post mortem. You are free to choose your own archbishops. If it turns out that all of them in the New Deal nations are already subscribers, then substitute bishops.

H. L. MENCKEN

Baltimore, Md.

Happy to Help

I am happy to help as much as I can to keep such a paper as The Nation alive. Yes, indeed, I take my hat off to The Nation for its vigorous stand toward preserving our liberties and fighting the monster fascism that is trying to get the whole world into its clutches.

I am sorry I can't do any better at this time, but perhaps will be able to do more later. I am only a poor farmer trying my best to get out of debt before I have to leave this hypocritical world.

JOE PINTAR

Ralph, S. D.

To the Fourth Generation

Your letter came to me this noon and I am inclosing my check.

Yes, it would be a calamity to have The Nation go out and a special loss to me who have read it sixty-three years—since I went as a newly married girl to live in Cleveland from my home in Detroit. My husband had started taking The Nation as a boy, having first seen and read it at a news counter, and though at that time pocket money was scarce, it became one of the necessities.

After his death in 1908 I of course kept on with The Nation and have never been without it since. Even during a period of four years when I lived in Europe it was sent to me from home.

My daughter and granddaughters read it, and I hope my great-grandson will, when he is a little older. I shall be most interested as well as anxious to know the outcome of your present undertaking.

MRS. A. L. WITHERINGTON

Medford, Ore.

Out of Italy

I am a political refugee from Italy, and here I am employed as shipping clerk and quite lucky to have this job that allows me to make a modest living. Long before I came to this country in 1939 I used to read The Nation, and I smuggled it into Italy every time I bought it during my frequent visits in France or Switzerland, or other free European countries.

We all know only too well how much easier it would be for a philo-fascist publication to find generous, or rather royal support, and we know also how sad this is. It would be so useful if the circulation of The Nation could be boosted, as the need for progressive thinking is great even in the free U. S. A.

I inclose a money order for $2 and I will be glad if you can accept my modest contribution. With my best wishes for the future of The Nation, and for the success of your activity.

FRED M. SACCO

Los Angeles, Cal.

Bible

I cannot resist writing you a note to wish you success in your campaign for The Nation. I have read it for years. In fact, I couldn't get along without it. My father says I remind him of a lady in Louisville, Kentucky, during the Civil War who said she read only the Bible and the Courier-Journal and recently had given up the Bible! In our household The Nation is referred to as my Bible.

The inclosed check comes from my roommate and me. We both read every issue and have felt for a long while that you hit the nail squarely on the head.

DOROTHY ATKINS

Cincinnati, Ohio

From an Individual

I do not remember a time when there wasn't The Nation, and if I have read it fitfully during the past ten years, that has been owing more to circumstances than lack of interest. It seems to me, as I hope it will seem to everyone to whom you have appealed for help, that, on balance, The Nation has been consistently right in its philosophy of government even though it has often misjudged specific events and particular people. Jefferson—who is currently being quoted and misquoted by everybody—would, I believe, have found much to quarrel with in the pages of The Nation, and yet he would have read it straight through every week, and he would have found the time to put you straight occasionally. And he certainly would not have had you fail!

If The Nation in the past five or six years, has become alternately cold and querulous, hot and scolding (cacothese carpiendi), if it has lost its spiritual touch, if it has tended to forget what America has been like and is like by over-emphasis on what it thinks America should be like, this is after all, as Robert Frost might have said, hardly more than a lovers' quarrel that you have had with America. Or, to quote another poet, Whitman, because "America's compact is eternally with the individual," and because I believe, in the final analysis, so is The Nation's, it pleases this individual very much to subscribe as a Foundation member.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

Washington, D. C.

Half a Century

I certainly hope that The Nation will keep on. I would be lost without it, having been a reader of the magazine for over half a century and, come next spring, a subscriber for forty years—except for the year 1915 when I felt that The Nation was entirely too anti-German. Not that I was pro-German, but I was against the whole war and wanted fair play for all.

Sometime early in 1904 you will find a note about George Hartwig, the Halle librarian. That was my first contribution to The Nation, and with the check received I started my first subscription. AKSEL G. S. JOSEPHSON Mobile, Ala.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 156

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MAY 15, 1943

NUMBER 20

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

Tunisia and After	687
John L.'s Show	688
Chinese Claustrophobia	689
Bolivia—the Facts	690

ARTICLES

Capital Notes by I. F. Stone	691
Why China Is Worried	693
How Our Enemies Fight. I. Styles in Strategy by Gordon Cooper	696
Fifty Years Ago in The Nation	698
The Farmers Can Take It by Richard E. Stockwell	699
In the Wind	700

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

Undermining the Underground by A. del V.	701
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	702
Europe Against Hitler. III. The Passive Resisters by John W. Gerber and Alfred Kantorowicz	704

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Unknown Army A Poem by Mark van Doren	707
Life on the "Obit" Page by Irwin Edman	707
Wrapped in Mystery by Albert Guérard	708
"Non-Combatants" by Marcus Duffield	710
Citizen of the World by Hermann Kesten	711
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	712
In Brief	714
Art by Jean Connolly	714
Drama: Over Most of These Stations by Joseph Wood Krutch	714
Music by B. H. Haggin	716

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 13 by Jack Barrett	720
---	-----

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Music Critic

Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

THE ROLLBACK OF VEGETABLE, COFFEE, AND meat prices announced last week by Price Administrator Prentiss Brown may be taken as the Administration's answer to labor's demand that prices and wages be placed on a comparable level. Unfortunately, the answer is not good enough. A 15 to 25 per cent reduction in the price of fresh vegetables at the moment when the summer crop is coming on the market is not a genuine "rollback" at all, since the seasonal decline is usually much greater. The same applies to the proposed cut in butter prices. The rollback in coffee prices is almost meaningless in view of the drastic rationing restrictions. Of greater significance is the promise to reduce meat prices by approximately 10 per cent, but even here skeptics may point to the fact that hog prices have been easing recently because of the reduced demand resulting from rationing. The sincerity of the whole rollback program is further brought into question by the publication of the new flat community-wide ceiling prices for 300 food items. While the new ceilings have the advantage of uniformity and are thus helpful in enforcement, they tend to raise the existing ceilings of all small stores to the highest level in any of them. No effort was made to take advantage of this opportunity to reduce prices even to the extent of adopting the level of the more efficient, moderate-price stores. *

THE OPA'S PROPOSAL TO USE SUBSIDIES TO protect the processor against losses in the rolling back of food prices is sound under the circumstances. Britain's success in stabilizing prices and wages is almost wholly due to the judicious use of subsidies. The government is already paying subsidies to help hold down the price of a long list of articles. These include canned tomatoes, peas, corn, and snap beans, cheddar cheese, coffee, cocoa, sugar, tea, oil seeds, petroleum products, and coal. Despite this extensive, and on the whole successful, use of subsidies, Congress is reported to be up in arms against the OPA's latest proposal. Opposition is strongest among the members of the farm bloc, which has gone whole hog for inflation. But there are others who fear that by perpetuating the illusion of low living costs the subsidies will conceal the continuing peril of inflation.

This is a well-founded objection. The payment of subsidies does not provide a new and magic way for controlling the inflationary spiral. That can be achieved only by tackling the reservoir of the excess purchasing power created by the war. But our choice at the moment, in terms of political realities, is not between taxation and subsidies but between subsidies and the chaos of an uncontrolled inflation. *

ONE OF THE STANDARD DEFENSES OF THE Darlan deal, we recall, was the asserted belief that half of North Africa had never heard of De Gaulle and the other half would have none of him. However much we might regret the unpopularity of the Free French, ran the argument, we must be "realistic" and turn the widespread Pétainist sympathy to our own ends. Events have been dealing harshly with this particular rationalization. No sooner was the Giraud regime induced to end the political persecution of the De Gaullists than the Cross of Lorraine mushroomed from Casablanca to Bizerte, and shouts of "Vive De Gaulle!" were raised at embarrassingly inappropriate occasions. It has taken the Allied entrance into Tunis, however, to give the myth the coup de grâce. It was not General Giraud who won the cheers of the French in the liberated city, but De Gaulle. In fact, according to Drew Middleton, who entered the capital with the victorious troops, Giraud is almost unknown in Tunis, while the Fighting French leader is everywhere hailed as the symbol of resistance. "In one coastal town," writes the New York Times correspondent, "recruiting centers for General Giraud and General de Gaulle opened side by side. The first day General de Gaulle got 412 recruits, General Giraud got 4." "When the people of Tunis asked about the French army," they meant General Leclerc's Fighting French force, not the French Nineteenth Corps under General Giraud." All of which lends point to Giraud's refusal to receive De Gaulle at Algiers, presumably for fear of the enthusiastic public demonstrations that would mark his arrival. Point or no point, however, we hope De Gaulle will not make an issue of the meeting place. The question hardly merits so much emphasis, and continued bickering over it only serves to give both principals an air of the prima donna. *

INTERPRETERS OF SOVIET POLICY HAVE NOT had an easy task during the past few weeks. The oracles of the Kremlin have given them plenty of material to work on, but one day's utterance has often seemed to be contradicted by that of the next. For instance, Stalin's letter to the New York Times correspondent, Ralph Parker, on May 5 emphasized the desire of the Soviet government for "a strong and friendly Poland" and spoke of its willingness to base relations with that country after the war either "upon the fundament of solid goodneighborly relations" or upon an alliance of mutual assistance against Germany. Even though this statement carefully avoided the prickly boundary question, it was taken as an assurance that Russia was not seeking to reduce Poland to the status of a client state. A step seemed to have been taken toward healing the deplorable breach in relations which followed the Polish government's swallowing of Goebbels's baited hook. Two days later, however, Vice Foreign Commissar Vishinsky came out with a blasting bill of indictment against the Polish government, charging it with failure to keep agreements regarding the Polish army and with espionage under cover of relief activities. In spite of a comparatively mild Polish reply, the rift between the two governments remains as deep as ever; nor is it likely to be shrunk by the organization of a Polish legion under Russian auspices. But if the Kremlin's mood toward the Sikorski government remains unrelenting, it has been at pains to improve its relations with America and Britain. It realizes, perhaps, that its rather brutal retort to Polish blundering has produced unfavorable reactions and is anxious to mend its diplomatic fences. *

HOUSE ACTION ON THE HULL TRADE PACTS is expected to cleave closely to party lines following the filing of a vigorous Republican minority report in the Ways and Means Committee. Recognizing that the Hull trade program has general public support among most groups interested in trade policy, the Republicans have dug up several rather ingenious arguments to explain their opposition to the pacts. They contend (1) that the reciprocal program is wholly inadequate to deal with post-war trade problems; (2) that it is not truly reciprocal because of the most-favored-nation clause; and (3) that the subject of tariffs and trade policy is properly a matter for Congress. The first of these arguments is unquestionably valid. If we are to restore a sound international economy after the war, we shall need something more effective than reciprocal trade pacts to break down the elaborate restrictive devices created by economic nationalism in the past fifteen years. No one would deny this, least of all Secretary Hull. But all experience in trade policy proves beyond question the necessity for maintaining an unconditional most-favored-nation policy. Otherwise reciprocity rapidly deteriorates into haggling, and tariff negotiations become an ill-concealed form of economic warfare. The proposal to subject the agreements to Congressional review has, of course, but one object: the prevention of any reduction in tariffs by the reintroduction of log-rolling tactics. Our years of experience with Congressional tariff-making constitute the most powerful argument for keeping the details of tariff negotiation wholly in the hands of a non-political administrative body.

THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE HAS added to the incredible tax muddle by rejecting the House-approved Forand bill and adopting a "modified" Ruml plan. The "modifications" consist chiefly of a series of changes designed to lighten the burden of the well-to-do income-tax payer. The new bill is expected to be passed by the Senate, and hope for salvaging some revenue from last year's war-inflated incomes appears to rest almost entirely with the House leadership—backed by the prospect of a Presidential veto. The utter inconsistency of forgiving a year's taxes—and thus releasing a huge reserve of spending power—at a time when the Administration is struggling to "hold the line" on prices and wages appears not to have dawned on the average Senator. But we can be certain that organized labor and the farm bloc will be quick to seize upon the Senate's remarkable generosity to the higher income groups—the only ones benefiting from the Finance Committee's action—to demand reconsideration of the President's wage- and price-freezing orders. It will be extraordinarily difficult to say to the miners, for example, that they are not entitled to a $2-a-day wage boost when the government is making a gift of some $9,500,000,000 to that part of the population that is well enough off to pay income taxes.

✱

THE ODYSSEY OF ARCHBISHOP SPELLMAN IS a dopest's gold mine, yielding rumor at every seam. The latest story is that the Archbishop is soon to go to Moscow, where he will negotiate a concordat between the Kremlin and the Vatican, and that the project has the advance blessing of the governments of Eire and Spain. The report comes from a sober source, and several recent developments serve to give it more plausibility than it would ever have had in the past. Chief of these events is the crisis precipitated in Spanish exile circles in Mexico a few months ago by the following injunction which the Communists among them, according to the London New Leader, received from Moscow: "The Spanish Communist Party must envisage the suppression of Article 26 of the Spanish Republican Constitution [the separation of church and state] and consider the Catholic church as the state church in Spain." Following this same line, the Communists of Mexico have been urging an extension of the "National Front" to embrace Francoists and clerical politicians of—shall we say?—an extremely illiberal persuasion. The result is that the party in that country has suffered dissension, expulsions, and resignations. Other straws in the wind are the effort of the Axis radio to block any possible understanding by alleging that the Soviet Union is conducting a "campaign against the Pope" and the vigorous denial by the Moscow radio of these "mendacious reports . . . fabricated from beginning to end." So far the Vatican hasn't made any open overtures—unless, of course, you count the Legion of Decency's indorsement of "Mission to Moscow" as "unobjectionable for adults." Come to think of it, that's going pretty far.

✱

MAYOR LAGUARDIA HAS LET DOWN THE citizens of New York once again by failing to reappoint Mrs. Johanna M. Lindlof as Queens representative on the Board of Education. While it is generally agreed that Dr. George H. Chatfield, who was appointed to replace Mrs. Lindlof, is a capable educator well qualified for the post, Mrs. Lindlof's excellent record during her seven years of unpaid service to the board should have assured her preferential treatment. The fact that Dr. Chatfield is only nominally a resident of Queens may not seem important, but it makes the Mayor's action even less defensible. And it was all the more bewildering because Mrs. Lindlof has just distinguished herself by her brilliant and courageous defense of Mark Starr during the long controversy over his appointment as director of adult education. Mayor LaGuardia had presumably favored Starr's appointment, but instead of taking advantage of the expiration of the term of Dr. Bonaschi—who opposed Starr—to bring more liberal blood into the board, he retained Bonaschi and discharged the board's ablest and most consistently liberal member. In the absence of any reasonable explanation of his capricious behavior, some weight must be given to Mrs. Lindlof's charge that the Mayor acted "for purposes of his personal political strategy." There was a time when the Mayor's personal strategy coincided with that of all groups interested in good government in New York City. But that time seems to have passed beyond recall.

Tunisia and After

IN OUR issue of May 1 we wrote: "The days of the Axis in Tunisia are numbered, but will the number be high or low?" The question has now been answered more favorably than we then dared to hope. Fighting with marvelous élan, the Allied army—the heat of battle has welded it into one grand offensive machine—burst through the mountain wall which guarded the last Axis stronghold in Africa and inflicted a total defeat on a demoralized enemy. The anticipated German stand at Bizerte, with its much-vaunted defenses, was never made, and the veterans who were to die in the last ditch are surrendering in droves. As we write, an estimated half of the Axis troops in Tunisia are prisoners, while the remnants are being driven into the Cape Bon peninsula—a bottleneck from which not many thousands are likely to escape.

After Stalingrad, "Tunisgrad." The myth of the invincibility of the Wehrmacht is no more. Nor can the extent of its defeat be minimized by the explanation that it was overwhelmed by vast Allied superiority in numbers and matériel. True, there was such superiority, but in addition to being outnumbered the Axis was outfought and outgeneraled. Its soldiers fought well as long as they held their strong positions in the mountains, but once this advantage was lost they proved unable to rally. Moreover, the Axis command was fooled into believing that its biggest danger was in the south and southeast, and there its best troops and its armor were concentrated when the Allies broke through in the north and center.

It is a famous victory, for which all concerned deserve the praise that is pouring in from every quarter. But its historical significance depends on how it is followed up. The loop around Festung Europa has been closed, and nearly eight months of 1943 remain for the task of drawing it tighter. Hitler must now guard a vast perimeter, and he cannot be strong in all places at once. The initiative is in the hands of the United Nations, and it is they who will choose the coming battlefields. How grim the situation looks to fascist eyes is suggested by Franco's discovery that continued fighting is senseless.

At present Hitler's Europe is threatened from four major directions. In the east the Red Army remains intact and formidable. Perhaps Hitler will attempt once more to destroy it, and a German offensive in Europe starting within the next few weeks is still in the cards. But at the moment the only activity on the eastern front is in the Kuban, where it looks as if the German defenders of Novorossisk might be trapped in much the same manner as were the defenders of Tunisia. Significant, too, is the new Russian air offensive, which is taking a heavy toll of German planes. This may indicate an effort to keep the Luftwaffe occupied in the east pending some new stroke in the west.

Where might such a stroke fall? The invasion of France or the Low Countries remains the most direct route to the heart of the enemy, and it offers the fewest difficulties in communications and the greatest opportunities of aerial protection in establishing bridgeheads. But this is also the most strongly fortified coastline in Europe, as well as the region in which the Germans can concentrate most rapidly to repel attack.

Meanwhile the Nazis are indicating concern about the southeastern corner of Europe, and they are reported to be reinforcing the Balkans and the Greek islands. This activity may be a blind, but it is to be noted that a strong British army has been built up in the Near East. Its original purpose was to protect Syria, Palestine, and Egypt against a thrust from the north, but with the new situation in the Mediterranean it may be given a new role.

The victory in Tunisia, however, concentrates attention on the possibilities of an attack on Italy, for the momentum which the Allied army has gathered in Africa may well carry it across the Mediterranean. Sicily is but ninety miles distant, and the conquest of that island is a necessary preliminary to the invasion of the Italian mainland. Besides, control of the Mediterranean, which is worth millions of tons of shipping to our side, cannot be complete while Sicily remains in Axis hands.

The morale of the Allied army in Tunisia is at zenith; its losses, while considerable, have probably been less heavy than anticipated; it is backed by tremendous air power and supported by strong reserves in Morocco and Algeria. Under the circumstances it seems probable that it will be given the chance to win fresh laurels even though the main attack on the fortress may come elsewhere. But strike somewhere we must and that quickly. For the real test of generalship is the exploitation of success.

John L.'s Show

AFTER months of oblivion and frustration, John Llewellyn Lewis is staging his long-planned war-time show. His campaign in the coal fields has already intensified unrest within the A. F. of L. and C. I. O.; his fight has been cheered at a conference of the C. I. O.'s Automobile Workers' Union; and most of his foes within the labor movement have maintained an unhappy silence. As this is written, the decisive episodes in the coal case are still ahead; the fifteen-day truce is on, and the "war of nerves" between Lewis and Franklin D. Roosevelt continues. But whatever happens, some things are abundantly clear. Lewis's performance has dramatized the irresponsibility of his war-time role. It has also revealed the incipient chaos in the nation's war-time labor program.

So far Lewis has played his hand ruthlessly, without apparent regard for the nation's production needs or the comments of the Axis radio. His timing has been astute, and his talent for creating a crisis atmosphere was never better revealed than in the past few weeks. Yet the fundamental sources of his strength in this conflict are neither his imagination nor his rhetoric. Those are supplementary tools. His real weapons are his repudiation of any responsibility for the war effort and the breakdown of the government's price-control program.

Lewis is operating free of the inhibitions which restrain other labor leaders. He has bluntly stated that he does not regard the fight against inflation as his fight, just as he had hinted in the past that he did not view the war against Hitlerism as his war. He is not a partner in the war program, and he delights in mocking those labor chiefs who have assumed the obligations he scorns. To Lewis the no-strike pledge was a momentary bargain, to be discarded when he chose, rather than a voluntary commitment for the duration. Other union leaders have clung to the pledge because they do not share his frivolous attitude toward the war. Lewis has not hesitated to exploit their feelings.

This is one-half of his strength. Yet he would not appear so formidable a threat, either to the country or to rival union leaders, if his bid for a comeback had not occurred in a time of virtual collapse of the price-control system. To the men who shut the mines on April 30 the issue was the high cost of living. The same issue has been agitating thousands of other workers in other areas. And now, belatedly, and as a result of Lewis's drastic forms of pressure, the Administration has begun to acknowledge what C. I. O. and A. F. of L. leaders were saying in less bellicose tones many months ago. After a survey of prices in mining towns ordered by President Roosevelt a few days before the mine strike began, the Office of Price Administration admits that failure to enforce its own price ceilings has added 5 per cent to the cost of food. Correlating this report with earlier investigations of other commodities, the OPA sadly confesses: "The opinion was unanimous that food costs in mining communities are approximately the same as those in comparable communities." Thus in the face of Lewis's indictment, the government's only defense is that price control has been as ineffective generally as it has been in mine communities.

Simultaneously, while Lewis has been leveling his sharpest attack against the National War Labor Board, the board itself is in a state of demoralization as a result of the removal of its power to adjust "inequities." Under the terms of the executive order of April 8 it has been reduced to the role of statistician, determining whether proposed wage increases are within the 15 per cent provision of the "Little Steel" formula. Its freedom of judgment has been virtually eliminated. A. F. of L. and C. I. O. members of the board are talking of resignations at a moment when the board is engaged in a life-and-death battle with Lewis.

It is true that Lewis's United Mine Workers' Journal has in the past scoffed at the whole price-control idea; that the U. M. W. has done little within the mining towns to police prices; that Lewis was waging his crusade against the War Labor Board long before its powers were curbed. But Lewis makes no fetish of consistency, and the workers to whom he is appealing—in the mines and elsewhere—are not concerned about such details either. They discover that the first major Administration action to roll back prices is taken as an immediate consequence of the May 1 strike in the mines. They find that President Roosevelt orders a probe of violations of price ceilings when the U. M. W. begins to press its fight. We do not say that such actions should have been delayed longer to prevent the appearance of conceding to Lewis. We say that they should have been taken many weeks ago, before the Lewis-made crisis developed.

If Lewis persists in his defiance of the War Labor

Board and permits a strike again next week, the government will probably have no choice except to seek to break the strike, by appeals if possible, by uglier methods if necessary. In any circumstances Lewis cannot lose; he either snatches a victory or poses as martyr. There is no decent, clear-cut solution now because the situation was allowed to deteriorate so long; because so little was done by the OPA to alleviate the roots of the miners' discontent; because the "housewives' revolt" was allowed to spread until Lewis suddenly crystallized the issue; because the formulation of government labor policy is diffused through so many agencies and so many competing officials that no coherent plan to meet this situation was framed; and finally because the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O., unwilling to raise hell in the terms which Lewis employed, were ignored or turned aside when they sought undemonstratively to lay these problems before the Administration.

This country needs coal, and no labor leader has the right to stand in the way. But the editorial writers who now piously defend the War Labor Board need to recall some of their own efforts to undermine that agency; the columnists who decry Lewis's tactics should divert some of their anger to the need for drastic enforcement of price ceilings. The miners follow Lewis because he articulates their own dissatisfaction and resentment. Others will follow Lewis unless the Administration fulfils its price pledges, grants authentic recognition to the labor leaders who have remained loyal to the war effort, and establishes some centralized machinery for the handling of war-time labor problems.

Chinese Claustrophobia

IT WAS good to learn last week that Liberator bombers had reached China and had successfully attacked the major Japanese base on Hainan Island. We are sure that every additional plane sent to China is warmly welcomed as a token of unity with America, as well as for its military value. But effective aid to China must remain meager until some land corridor is opened, and early prospects for such a development are unpromising. The small-scale campaign in Burma undertaken by General Wavell last winter bogged down before achieving its first important objective—the port of Akyab—and now the rainy season precludes any further move in that theater until next fall.

Meanwhile, the sense of frustration in China grows. The military threat offered to the Chungking regime by Japan is not very acute, according to the distinguished Chinese scholar whose letters we publish on page 693. But the economic situation goes from bad to worse, fostering the growth of political tensions, domestic and foreign. All but isolated physically from its allies, China feels more and more isolated psychologically. It is, in fact, suffering from political claustrophobia.

In China the decision to "beat Hitler first" is not fully understood and is bitterly resented. The Nation has always defended that decision, believing that from the point of view of global strategy it is entirely justified, but we deplore the fact that more has not been done to make it palatable to the Chinese, for whom it means postponement of the day of liberation. Little attempt has been made—particularly in London—to remove the fears and suspicions which our contributor reports. The agreement reached last year for the abandonment of extra-territorial privileges was a step in the right direction, but its effects have been offset by indications that Britain was not prepared to surrender its claims to Hongkong.

The imperialist pronouncements of Winston Churchill and other British ministers have also disturbed China, which contemplates with dismay the prospect of a return, after the war, to the status quo ante in the Far East. As our Chinese friend emphasizes, China has a large interest in the future of the European colonies in southeastern Asia. Millions of Chinese settled in these territories have suffered from discriminations which will seem even less tolerable in the future. Moreover, any attempt to revive unchanged the imperialist regimes of the past, which so lamentably failed to protect their subjects from invasion, must create political disaffection and offer a standing threat to the peace of Asia.

The Chinese, wrongly but understandably, tend to regard the Anglo-American program of beating Hitler first as symbolic of unwillingness to grant China equality. No responsible person suggests that this program should be modified, but it should not be beyond the resources of statesmanship to remove Chinese suspicions. A British offer to relinquish its sovereignty over Hongkong would prove as great a tonic to Chinese morale as a major victory over the Japanese. It would be a token of true partnership, a disavowal of any intention of treating China as a second-class state, now or at the peace table.

Bolivia—the Facts

THE blood of Bolivian miners is on the hands of General Enrique Penaranda, president of that country, now visiting the United States. The labor movement could make no greater contribution to genuine hemispheric solidarity than by showing its displeasure during the President's visit and demanding the release of the union leaders still held on his orders in jail and in concentration camps in remote jungles. The workers of Latin America must be made to feel by concrete measures that we are determined to make our country the Good Neighbor of the common people in their countries rather than the collaborator of tin kings and other exploiters.

For the actual facts of the Catavi massacre of last December 21 the labor movement is indebted to the courageous and outspoken report filed by Martin C. Kyne, vice-president of the United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America, the C. I. O.'s representative on the recent commission to Bolivia. Kyne's separate report fills the gaping omissions in the official one, which skirted around the tin strike, though the strike was the actual reason for sending a commission to Bolivia at all. Workers in the rich Patino mines, averaging 70 cents a day and suffering from inflated food costs in the company stores, asked for a 100 per cent raise in wages last September. Management refused to reply, and the Ministry of Labor waited forty-five days before it even acknowledged receipt of the union's demands. The government lined up immediately with the mine owners. Under the conditions revealed by Kyne this was to be expected, for the tin kings of Bolivia are so powerful that they take it upon themselves to declare the law. "They interpret labor laws," Kyne reports, "and declare them unconstitutional when it suits their interest."

Patino officers in La Paz wired the manager of the mines at Catavi, ". . . the President of the Republic assures us that preventive measures have been taken and suggests vigilance in order to report these agitators." In December a state of siege was declared, union leaders were arrested, company stores closed. Soldiers precipitated a demonstration when they refused to let women go in search of food. At 10 a.m. on December 21 soldiers opened fire on the demonstrators, and firing continued until 3 p.m. The government admits that nineteen workers were killed and forty wounded. "How many Bolivian miners and their wives and children died . . . may never be known," Kyne writes. "One official who was on the spot declared that at least 400 dead were buried that day." This affair was represented by press dispatches from Bolivia as an uprising inspired by the Nazis.

The parallel between the arguments used against better wages in Bolivia and the instructions cabled by Hull on December 2 to our ambassador in Bolivia is striking. The argument was that wages could not be raised without interfering with Bolivia's international obligations to the United States. Exactly the opposite is true. Efficient production is impossible on the basis of the terrorism and miserable conditions revealed in the Kyne report. We assure the workers of Bolivia that the attitude taken by the State Department does not reflect the feelings of the American people, of the President, or of the Vice-President, and we call on the labor movement to unite, as Kyne suggests, in a joint council on Latin American relations to show workers below the Rio Grande that we mean what we say when we speak of the Four Freedoms.

Capital Notes

BY I. F. STONE

I SUSPECT that we shall be able to learn a good deal about the actual course of our policy as regards the shape of the post-war world by watching the foreign property holders' protective committee, organized by the National Foreign Trade Council. The head of the committee is the influential James A. Moffett, chairman of the board of the California Texas Oil Company, which has large interests in the Near East. One of his former subordinate executives in that area, Max W. Thornburg, is head of the Office of the Petroleum Adviser in the State Department. The purpose of the new committee is to recover American property in Axis-occupied countries and "to maintain close contact with the proper authorities to procure speedy protection of property rights and interests in territories occupied or reoccupied by the Allied nations." The committee is unlikely to encourage friendliness toward underground movements with leftist connections not over-sympathetic to property rights. "We are already at work," said the committee's first statement. One might have gathered as much from our coolness to De Gaulle, who is rightist enough to please the State Department but unwilling to jimmie the left in his fight for the rebirth of France.

Two basic forces are molding our policy on the future of Europe. One is the desire of American corporations to get their property back and to create the most favorable conditions possible for profitable operations. This dictates hostility not merely to communism but to more moderate socialist programs. The other is the desire to reconstitute in Axis and occupied countries those powerful opposite numbers so necessary if the cartel system is to be revived—I. G. Farben, the Comité des Forges, Mitsui, etc. Of these two motives, the second is the stronger, for "cooperation to maintain stable prices and markets" is more important financially than the property holdings. Let no one think the cartel system is dead. Powerfully and persistently the case for reviewing cartels is being pressed on every agency of government, from Justice to State, which has any authority in the matter. A principal argument put forward is that the British and Dutch intend to revive their cartels.

There must be a new crisis approaching in the War Production Board, for it is again being hinted that Chairman Donald M. Nelson is about to appoint two labor vice-chairmen. Whenever Nelson finds himself in serious conflict with the army and navy, or otherwise in danger of losing his job, there are (1) coy reports that he is on the verge of giving labor full representation at top WPB levels, and (2) dark whispers that the country is in danger of being taken over by the military unless Nelson's hand is upheld. Once labor and liberal support has been rallied, and the danger averted, Nelson shelves both the boggy and the promises until the next crisis. He first promised to appoint two labor vice-chairmen last summer when Philip Murray of the C. I. O. and William Green of the A. F. of L. stepped in and saved him from being swallowed by the Army-Navy Munitions Board.

Nelson has been dropping the handkerchief to the labor movement for a long time. Sidney Hillman's support helped make it possible for Nelson to supersede Knudsen when the OPM became the WPB after Pearl Harbor, but Nelson did nothing to keep Hillman from being eased out of the picture shortly afterward. Labor, from a theoretical equality with capital in the OPM (Knudsen and Hillman), has been pushed steadily downward under Nelson in the WPB. The innocuous Labor Production Division was even denied jurisdiction over the drive for labor-management committees, lest it provide labor with a voice in management's problems at a level higher than the suggestion box.

"It was known," says a new story on the imminent appointment of two labor vice-chairmen, "that WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson would insist that any labor appointee must drop his union connection completely for the period of government employment, just as management officials have been required to sever their business connections before being brought into WPB policy-making posts." They must have chuckled over that one in the privacy of the special dining-room for WPB executives on the fifth floor of the Social Security building. Many of the dollar-a-year men continue to draw salaries from their companies while serving in Washington, and some of them manage to spend a day or so a week back at the home office, handling their private business affairs.

In this connection I might report that while I know nothing of that House on R Street, I am not impressed by the recurrent hullabaloo—from Congressmen silent about more serious matters—over brokers in war-contract business. No doubt many of these brokers cut some sharp corners and a few of them may be crooks, but they have a useful function for the friendless small business man who must otherwise wear out the seat of his pants in WPB and army waiting-rooms. Big business men have their dollar-a-year representatives in the WPB and barred, oak-leaved, or starred ones in the army: their lawyers and bankers turn up conveniently as WPB or War Department officials for the duration. A small business man is lucky if he has enough influence to get a room in a hotel. The broker is worth his fee to both the business man and the country. His job is no more reprehensible than that of any other middleman, and has the same economic justification. If the extra charge makes it possible for the business man to stay in his factory, where he is useful, instead of running around Washington, where he is a menace to his own morale, it is well paid.

Treat a man like a bootlegger, and he will oblige by being furtive; recognize his function, and he will grow more respectable in his habits. The way to curb the abuses of brokerage—I find it hard to conceal a yawn when I hear people talk of them—is to end the pretense about it. I note that the Federal Trade Commission has cited Willys-Overland for advertisements claiming credit for the jeep. The FTC says the jeep was developed by the American Bantam Car Company of Butler, Pennsylvania, "in collaboration with certain officers of the United States army." The FTC complaint fully confirms my inside story on the jeep published in The Nation of December 14, 1940. Ford and Willys, thanks to the strategic positions occupied by friends and dollar-a-year employees in Washington, were able to take the jeep away from the company which helped develop it, though the latter was and for all I know may still be badly in need of war work. Bantam's Washington representative, a former army officer, served a doubly useful purpose in this case. He not only obtained at least one contract for Bantam but helped G-4 sell the idea of the jeep to reluctant War Department higher-ups. Yet the RFC, which will complacently sign blank checks for Alcoa and Standard Oil, declined to recognize his salary and expenses as legitimate items on a bill presented by the Bantam Company.

Edwin W. Pauley, secretary of the Democratic National Committee, has been in Mexico trying to obtain a concession to build an aviation-gas plant. This, while improper, is not surprising, for the Democratic National Committee is quite an organization for the grinding of private axes. (Another of its notables is Oscar R. Ewing, who serves both the National Committee and the Aluminum Company of America.) Up here Pauley calls himself an "independent" oil man, but below the border Mexicans say he represents himself as a spokesman for Standard of California. In California, Pauley's home state, he is regarded with dislike by progressives, and there is a tendency to snort when his "independent" status as an oil man is mentioned. He is felt to have been a decidedly non-progressive influence at Sacramento on Governor Olson, and he is a close friend of Ralph K. Davies, the Deputy Petroleum Administrator for War, a Standard of California man. Pauley was one of the men who sponsored Davies for the job in the Petroleum Administration.

Davies is now going to bat for Pauley behind the scenes on the ground that Pauley represents "independents" in the Mexican field while the State Department is trying to sneak the old Standard Oil companies back into Mexico. This is not too plausible, since Davies has not shown too tender a concern in the past for independents and the Mexican oil dispute is one of the few cases in which the State Department has followed a democratic policy. Davies is striking some noble attitudes. He declares that the State Department is hostile to Pauley and his "independents" and is backing the Universal Oil Products Company to build an aviation-gas plant in Mexico, and that this will enable the Standard Oil crowd to make a comeback below the border. An effort was made to plant a distorted story on this correspondent, who is known not to be fond of either the State Department or Standard Oil, in the hope that he would inadvertently do a little ax-grinding for Pauley. A State Department source I have found trustworthy in the past tells me that while the new Mexican aviation-gas plant will be financed by an Export-Import Bank loan and engineered by Universal Oil Products, it will be wholly owned by the Mexican government. I am handing in a verdict in favor of the State Department.

Though the Truman committee ducked the question in its report on the aviation-gas controversy, I am inclined to think Under Secretary of War Patterson and Secretary of the Interior Ickes right and Rubber Director William M. Jeffers wrong. From my little cubby-hole it looks as if present rubber-expansion plans call for an over-all production much in excess of essential needs while the program itself is lopsidedly given over almost entirely to Buna S. But it seems to me, from the testimony before the Truman committee, that the need for more aviation gas is overwhelming and undeniable. We could also use more ingenuity in breaking the bottlenecks in production of the components needed for both programs, though I understand that WPB Vice-Chairman C. E. Wilson is making determined and praiseworthy efforts in this crucial sector of the war program.

Coming in The Nation

Ely Culbertson maintains that what Louis Fischer analyzed in The Nation of April 24 was not his plan for world peace but rather "The Culbertson Plan à la Fischer." In next week's issue he promises to "take apart that plan, put it together again, and throw it at Mr. Fischer."

Why China Is Worried

[The letters that follow were written by a Chinese observer whose identity cannot be revealed but for whose reliability we can vouch. Despite the date of the first letter, we believe its intrinsic interest and the continued importance of its contents justify its publication.]

Kunming, China, December 6, 1942

THE war situation seems definitely to be turning in our favor. Hitler and Japan may yet have some great surprise in store for the United Nations, but whether it is an attack on Turkey or one on India or a renewed general offensive against us, phenomenal success is very unlikely. This being so, we are perhaps not being too sanguine in hoping for a United Nations general offensive next summer and a final victory by the following winter.

We are fully aware that in order to maintain our self-respect we must not rely on our allies to win the war for us, however handicapped we may be by the lack of planes and heavy artillery. Lately the Generalissimo has been hammering hard on this idea, and I have no doubt that he means it. But to be realistic, I doubt if unaided we can succeed in pushing a million Japanese into the sea, let alone carrying the war to their homeland. I feel that in order to enable the Chinese to maintain their self-respect and not feel inferior, supply of the things we lack is necessary.

In view of the approaching victory the Chinese are discussing the peace in earnest. Willkie's visit and the speeches he has made, both here and after his return, have heightened our interest in post-war reconstruction. The Fortune memorandum on peace in the Far East has been eagerly read in Chungking, and a translation of it gained wide publicity. Personally I like best the utterances of Vice-President Wallace, whose vision seems to transcend every other statesman's.

In China there have been some wild suggestions in regard to the disposal of what may be called our border areas. If they were seriously considered by responsible persons, imperialism would be a just accusation. For some months I was rather bothered by the reported existence of that sort of atmosphere in the capital. I was therefore very much relieved when I went to Chungking and found that those who hold such views are either persons of no consequence or talking only flippantly. Since considerable harm seems already to have been done—reports are coming back from both America and England that we are suspected of being imperialistic and extremely nationalistic—the government is now doing its best to discourage any loose discussion. In fact, the Generalissimo took advantage of the meeting of the People's Political Council to declare openly against assuming hegemony in Asia.

The preparation of the peace is in the hands of sane people. As far as I can learn, the stand China is likely to take will arouse little objection in any quarter except on the question of colonies and the future of Japan. Concerning colonies, the consensus is that the old system must go. The idealistically inclined planners want to see it go for obvious reasons; the realistically inclined fear it. The indebtedness of the Kuomintang to the Chinese overseas and the ill-treatment, or at least discriminatory treatment, meted out by the colonial powers to these Chinese strengthen the passion for a change. For the sake of maintaining the United Nations front, responsible Chinese are now suppressing any outcry for a change; but if the colonial powers, especially the British, should remain diehard, as has been indicated by the recent speeches of Churchill and by the London Times editorials in reply to Willkie's demand for an elucidation of British policy, then I believe that trouble between the Chinese and the British is inevitable when the war is over. In responsible Chinese circles there is not the slightest ambition to acquire any of the former colonies of the British, French, and Dutch empires in the Far East, with the sole exception of Hongkong. But the Chinese do want to see these colonies placed under international control, with the former colonial powers and also China itself, which has an interest in these areas because of the enormous number of Chinese emigrants settled in them, acting as dominant administrators.

Concerning the future of Japan there is a great deal of controversy here. The reasoning of one school is not very different from that of the French after the last war with respect to the Germans. The Chinese are afraid of Japan and want to prevent it from remaining a military and industrial power. The other view, to which I subscribe, is that such a repressive policy is unworkable. After disarming Japan we should let it continue as an industrial and seafaring power so that it can maintain its prosperity and live at peace with its neighbors. It would be wishful thinking to claim that this view is in the ascendancy. Nevertheless, I am confident that it will prevail if China is convinced that the Anglo-Saxon powers will not play the game of maintaining a strong Japan to serve as a check on a possible Chinese Yellow Peril.

It can readily be seen that this sort of mutual suspicion breeds all kinds of dangers. Our suspicion of the West may make us insist on bleeding Japan white, which of course smacks a good deal of imperialism and justifies you in being on your guard. Our suspicion that you want to check us naturally leads us to insist on crippling Japan beyond a measure of recovery. That is why I think irresponsible talk in the West about our tendency to be imperialistic and equally irresponsible talk in China wildly condemning the British Empire both serve to poison the minds of the people.

As far as I can see, the first task of Chinese statesmen after the war is over will be to perfect a political system that will satisfy a major part of the Chinese people and to accelerate the industrialization of the country so as to give it in time an equality with the United States and Russia. Both democratization and industrialization are impossible unless we have stability and also unstinted help from America and Great Britain. The wild talk current in some circles of the West that after the war China will relapse into civil war is too newswise to be true. By newswise I mean imbued with the quality possessed by certain clever newspapermen in China who see so many trees here but fail to see the woods. I myself am disturbed by some recent developments, but I would be a man without any sense of balance or proportion if I permitted myself to think that the ruling class after the war will be devoid of serious intention to achieve both economic and political reforms, or that it will indulge in the suppression of all criticism at home and in caviling at other nations.

Neither the Kuomintang nor the Chinese people as a whole has had too good an opinion of Britain. In their antagonism toward that nation as an imperial power they have failed to appreciate the many admirable traits of the British in Britain. The lukewarmness of the Chamberlain government toward us in the early years of our war and the closing of the Burma Road by Churchill, accompanied by an announcement which failed to make any distinction between right and wrong, left an extremely sour taste. With this as a background you can easily imagine the fury of the Chinese when Hongkong and Singapore were so easily lost, especially in view of the rejection of an offer by the Chinese in those cities to arm themselves for civilian defense. The offer was accepted only when it was too late to be of any effective use. Making matters worse was the discrimination practiced against the natives and the Chinese in the process of evacuation.

The fury was heightened if possible by the Burma disaster, which the Chinese attributed in no small measure to British unwillingness to admit Chinese reinforcements in the beginning and to a complete lack of cooperation throughout the campaign. I used to think that these accusations were largely an attempt at Chinese face-saving. But in Chungking I had a chance to learn more details, and these squared with my earlier information.

While the disaster of the Burma campaign was still being hotly resented, the arrest of the Indian Congress leaders and the subsequent rough talk between London and Chungking made matters worse. It can now be said that Generalissimo Chiang's trip to India was not all honey. He went at the invitation of London, and London also agreed to his seeing the Indian leaders. But after his arrival the British government in India tried first to dissuade him from seeing the Congress leaders and then to insist on summoning Gandhi to New Delhi. The visitor finally won his point, but the unpleasantness remained. At the time of the Cripps mission the Chinese government made clear its support of the proposals and its disapproval of the Congress's stand. But when the arrests came, the Chinese government voiced the wish that the door for negotiations might be left open and repression discontinued. They had hoped that Washington also would do something. Instead Washington remained meticulously correct and silent, and London reacted bitterly.

The Chinese are now worried on three counts concerning British ambitions after the war. The first is that the British will want to restore their old colonial regime to the detriment of the Chinese overseas; the second, that they will insist on preserving a special status for our Manchurian provinces; the third, that they will favor letting Japan keep a large part of its military power to offset us. The third fear is largely disappearing as a result of the assurances given us by the visiting mission of the British Parliament. But the other two suspicions remain.

No doubt Chinese behavior during the war is also a factor in British-Chinese misunderstanding. In the first place it has had a tendency to be haughty and to lack a sense of reality in view of the fact that we cannot win the war without help from the Americans and British. In the early months of this year, as a result of our successes around Changsha, the press of both America and England over-praised us, and the results were harmful.

The whispering campaign recently going on in the United States that China is likely to go imperialistic and unruly has compelled the government to exert itself to counteract that impression by forbidding any open criticism of the British and by disavowing any ambitions concerning other nations' colonies or hegemony in Asia. The visiting mission from the British Parliament was given a welcome that was not equaled even by the one given to Willkie, for whom there was much genuine popular enthusiasm. I hope in return the British will do us justice, lest pent-up feelings again burst out and disrupt the healing process now going on largely on our initiative. I also hope that you in America will do your best to bring us together instead of taking sides in our past quarrel. After all, I am too sincere an admirer of things British to wish anything else.

The economic situation is as grave as ever. There has been little improvement in the administration of domestic affairs. It is a headache with us. We raise a row over these things periodically, but somehow improvement is slow and negligible. If I had no sense of proportion I should agree with some of the foreign correspondents in our midst that we are going to the dogs. But I feel we will yet muddle through, provided there is no famine in the rice-producing provinces of Hunan and Szechuan.

Improvement in the political field is also slow. The Generalissimo as chief executive and also head of the Kuomintang is devoting a large part of his energy to laying a solid foundation for local government. But in the direction of affairs he has introduced insufficient new blood. The more he tries to shoulder all the responsibilities, the more personal becomes his government.

Just now the Communists are lying low. I have no great fear of communism here, since I think post-war Moscow will not be very anxious to embroil itself in foreign quarrels merely for the sake of a few professional Communists in other countries. This, I think, applies to America as well.

March 21, 1943

I was in Chungking a few days ago. As I surveyed the whole war situation from that vantage point I got the impression that our economic position is even more serious than it appears to be on the surface. Increasingly large numbers of people in all parts of the country are being subjected to extremes of hardship. Their misery has by now reached such a state that determination alone is not sufficient to keep up a fighting morale. The government shows casual visitors from abroad nothing but the best and tries to impress upon them the determination of our people to win the war. But a more objective inquiry will disclose that the breaking-point is near. I think it will be a tragic mistake on the part of our allies if they stick to their original plan of doing nothing or little in eastern Asia during the coming months.

There are many people among us who think that if Hitler can be finished in a year's time, Japan's defeat may be accomplished before the fall of 1944. If that were the case we might well afford to wait, but with our economic life going so rapidly downhill, I doubt if we can last much longer unaided.

Aside from the possibility of an economic breakdown, there is of course the military danger. If Japan can press us from three directions at once, squeezing us at the same time from the lower Yangtze, from Sian, and from Burma and Indo-China, it can indeed crush us. But we are not quite afraid of that, for such an all-out effort would require so great a concentration of forces that Japanese strength elsewhere would have to be greatly depleted. I think Japan is far too cautious to do that. Short of an all-out effort, we are not afraid. On the whole, the military danger is decidedly small compared with the economic one.

As far as I can judge, Japan seems to be intent, first, on perfecting the defense of Japan proper, Korea, Manchuria, and North China, and, second, on exploiting the conquered areas. Just now it is not looking for fresh gains. A year from now the United Nations will unquestionably be stronger, but Japan on the other hand will then be in a more secure position. While it is hard to say which will gain more by waiting, China will be the loser in any case, since it will be that much nearer the breaking-point in another year's time.

During the past few months there has been considerable improvement in our relations with Great Britain. The desire to be friendly is mutual. The result is naturally reassuring to both. It goes without saying that Sino-American relations remain warm and close. The departure of Mr. Gauss is leading Chungking to expect that a more active ambassador may be sent. At least I hope so.

Chiang Kai-Shek

March 27

It is very distressing to report that the Churchill speech has almost washed away the recent improvement in our relations with the British. The Chinese government considers Churchill's emphasis on finishing Hitler first—and that not earlier than 1944—to be harmful. When Dill and Arnold were in Chungking, the Generalissimo told them that Churchill's statement after Casablanca, that within the next nine months the Anglo-American powers would try to execute their plans against Hitler, had the effect of informing Japan that it need not worry about an Anglo-Saxon offensive within that period. Hence that statement was injurious to us. And now Churchill, without apparent need, is doing it all over again! It is not unnatural that the more sensitive Chinese feel now that Churchill really does not intend to concern himself with the Japanese until China is on the verge of succumbing. Then perhaps he can appear as the savior of China, thus precluding any possibility of the Chinese raising the cry of equality at the peace conference. I earnestly hope that Mr. Roosevelt can do something to dispel this dismaying picture.

How Our Enemies Fight

I. STYLES IN STRATEGY

BY GORDON COOPER

FEW Americans are not secretly convinced that with some knowledge of "basic training" they would be able to step into the shoes of the general staff and whip the tar out of the Nazis. They see themselves as fearless, cool, and resolute, and believe that with a little training and their native common sense it would be simple to solve military problems wisely and promptly at critical moments. This is what an American writer once called the "valor of ignorance." With the prevalence of this feeling that war is a matter of brute force redeemed by courage and discipline, it is not strange that only an insignificant number among us have troubled to become soundly grounded in military science. A survey conducted by the New York Times in the summer of 1942 showed that 82 per cent of our institutions of higher learning do not require candidates for a degree to study even history, the very gateway to an understanding of war. As for the science of strategy, it is practically unknown in the United States outside military and naval circles. In the preface to his great book on Stonewall Jackson, Colonel G. F. R. Henderson, the English authority, wrote:

Strategy is a science which repays a student, even if he has no direct concern with military affairs; for not only does a comprehension of its inimitable principles add a new interest to the records of stirring times and great achievements, but it makes him a more useful citizen. In free countries like Great Britain, her colonies, and the United States, the weight of intelligent opinion, in all matters of moment, generally turns the scales; and if it were generally understood that, in regular warfare, success depends on something more than the capacity for handling troops in battle, many far-reaching mistakes might be avoided. The campaigns of the Civil War show how much may be achieved, even with relatively feeble means, by men who have both studied strategy and have the character necessary for its successful practice; and they also show, not a whit less forcibly, what awful sacrifices may be expected from a nation ignorant that such a science exists.

Strategy is a science—the science of applying military means. In projecting and directing great military movements a commander seldom decides the extent of the means placed at his disposal, but he endeavors to employ the resources made available to him so that the objectives of his country's grand strategy will be accomplished in the most efficient manner, or, to use the military term, with economy of force. The supreme and perfect achievement of true strategy would be an operation in which such a disposition by itself caused an opponent to realize the futility of resistance and to surrender without a fight.

Until twenty years ago a commander of armed forces was generally hard put to determine his procedure in planning. The science of strategy was mostly a collection of aphorisms handed down by the artists who had preceded him, and their adoption was a matter of personal preference. Some favored the "Maxims of Napoleon" while others preferred the writings of Frederick, Clausewitz, Jomini, Moltke, Sun Tsu, or one of an endless number of practitioners of the second oldest profession. In a sense, it was mere chance whether the favored maxim of a commander happened to be suited to the job at hand. But in the last twenty years studies in various countries have attempted to distill from these collected works and from military history the principles of strategy. Substantially the same conclusions were reached in each case. While these are stated as principles, they should not be taken as scientific formulas for victory but rather as norms which as a matter of practical sense should be observed in intelligent planning. They may perhaps best be summarized by citing the seven principles laid down by the Command and General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, in a monograph published in 1936: (1) offensive action, (2) concentration of combat power, (3) economy of force, (4) mobility, (5) surprise, (6) security, (7) cooperation.

Of these the prime factor has been found to be economy of force, which has been characterized by one theoretician as the "law of war." Economy of force means simply that the ends to be achieved must be determined by the means at the disposal of a general, and that the forces used in each successive step of the campaign to reach these ends must be proportioned to the value of the intermediate objective. Never send a boy to do a man's work and never send a man to do a boy's. If an intermediate objective is too costly, pass it up and try another approach. Perfection in economy of force, as in anything else, is unattainable, but any operation should be judged by the degree to which it is achieved.

The corollaries of this "law of war" are mobility and surprise. Mobility, the movement of forces over the face of the earth, can contribute markedly to the surprise of the enemy. Its problems are entirely physical and were best exemplified by the master of this principle, Stonewall Jackson, when he said, "I am forced to sweat them

[his troops] tonight that I may save their blood tomorrow." This has been shortened to the phrase dinned endlessly into the ears of Nazi troops in training: "Sweat saves blood." The sweat can be the mental, or figurative, as well as the physical variety.

The effect of surprise, which can work havoc by upsetting the psychological balance of an opposing commander as well as that of his troops, was so recently and poignantly illustrated at Pearl Harbor that it needs no further explanation. And it would be hard indeed to find a better example of both movement and surprise, for only a short time before that dreadful event a high official had stated that "unlike Singapore" our Hawaiian outpost was not menaced by sudden air attack.

To sum up, economy of force is the first principle of strategy; movement and surprise are corollaries. The other four strategic principles—offensive action, concentration of combat power, security, and cooperation—are almost self-explanatory. They are employed as their use contributes to the more important principles.

At this moment in history there are five world powers: Britain, the Soviet Union, Japan, Germany, and the United States. All five are now locked in a struggle whose outcome will decide not only their fate but that of mankind. Each of them forms a cultural unit and may be said to have a traditional style in the employment of its armed forces which is the result of many factors—the geographic make-up of the power, density of population, historical experience, and so forth. The British Empire does not arrive at the conclusions concerning concentration of combat force that Germany does; and Russia does not put the same value as Japan on the external offensive.

This, at first blush, may sound a great deal like Geopolitik, but it is not. Geopolitik is concerned with the "laws" of political geography. It attempts to set up objectives for the grand strategy of a country, but, as Moltke has pointed out, military and political objectives do not necessarily coincide. True strategy is concerned with accomplishing the military objectives of grand strategy. What might be called the "military psyche" of a country, however, puts definite limits on its military strategy. For instance, it would have been militarily advantageous to Britain and France to occupy Belgium and Holland, but Britain's long-term foreign policy called for a balance of power and the consequent fostering of nationalism on the Continent. And in planning their strategy the Allied general staffs had to accept this fact as basic.

The Germans, just as they took political geography and used it for their own ends, investigated somewhat this question of style in a pseudo-science they called geopolosophy, which concerned itself, among other things, with the effects of geography on morale. As a result of their studies they attempted to correct some of the deficiencies in German style—for instance, by conditioning troops in a simulated North African environment in order to compensate for lack of experience in desert warfare. The abandonment of the Hohenzollern policy of a large navy may also have been due in part to these investigations, for German military writings are shot through with the conclusion that Germany lacks an understanding of the sea and sea power.

The degree to which a commander represents the sum total of these attributes of style and their application to his era is the degree of his strategic success. The field-service regulations of a modern military force are an attempt to dovetail this "military psyche" with the tactical developments of the age and the fundamental principles of war. Every artist in the practice of military and naval science epitomizes the "military psyche" of his country. Napoleon's knife-like thrust at the capital of the enemy, the methodical militarism of Frederick II and the elder Moltke, Kutuzov's counter to Napoleon's Russian campaign—all are illustrations of that fact. Clive, Alexander, Belisarius, Genghis Khan, Nelson, Rodney, Farragut, Washington, Gustavus Adolphus—the list of successful strategists seems endless, but it is far shorter than the list of those often equally brilliant minds that failed to win because they lacked comprehension of style.

Falkenhayn's utter misconception in the 1914-18 war and Nivelles's misapplication of the French dictum "toujours l'attaque" afford two modern examples of failure to understand and correctly apply this knowledge. Falkenhayn's belief that a decision could not be reached in either the east or the west, and his consequent plan of committing Germany to a war of attrition, showed a complete lack of understanding of his country's geographical position and its proper use. Nivelles, on the other hand, failed to realize the serious obstacles which massed artillery and machine-guns had placed in the path of the attacker and attempted to apply d'Alençon's theory of the headlong attack under disastrous circumstances. Under the conditions of 1914-18 it was as impossible for France to lose a war of position as it was for Germany to win one of this type, and this was realized after the close of the war. Unfortunately, in the years between 1918 and 1939 France failed to see in the caterpillar vehicle the mobile gun platform which was to restore movement to the battlefield, and the old expression "France is always magnificently prepared—for the last war" could be applied again.

There were never better examples of the application of strategy and style as the cause of success or failure than in the present war. The effort involved in searching for the use of the seven "principles of strategy" in a nation's strategic style is amply rewarded in any study of today's campaigns.

The problems of Germany and Japan are in many respects similar. Energetic, inventive, and ambitious peoples living under stimulating climatic conditions, subject to great population pressure, they have sought to extend their Lebensraum by the ruthless application of force. Both have tried to enslave their neighbors, and both have operated militarily on what the Napoleonic chronicler, Jomini, called "interior lines"—that is, from a central position striking out at those around them. Furthermore, both are now striving to complete conquests at which they have aimed more than once in the past. German strategic plans under Frederick II, Bismarck, and William II were essentially the same as those of the Hitler Reich. The Japan of the Empress Jingo (200 A.D.) and of Hideyosha (1598) projected operations which varied only in the difference of means to be employed from those of contemporary Japan.

John Chamberlain, reviewing Mr. Willkie's new book in the New York Times, has said that it gives one of the most revealing comments on the war when it quotes General Montgomery as saying that Rommel's fatal weakness was a penchant to repeat his tactics. This penchant is not peculiar to the German marshal: it is, indeed, one of the phenomena of military history.

The continental location of Germany and the island make-up of Japan have led each nation to adopt certain characteristic methods. In the two articles that follow, an attempt will be made to show how far the operations of our two chief enemies, while conforming to their national style, have satisfied the requirements of the "principles of strategy" set forth above. In this way we may discover some of the reasons for their victories to date, their points of weakness, and the requisites for their defeat.

[This is the first article of a series of three. In our next issue Mr. Cooper will analyze the strategic style of Japan.]

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE PHILADELPHIA Public Ledger . . . has within a few days joined the pictorial army, and now helps its readers to get at the meaning of its more abstruse passages by "cuts" of various sizes.—May 4, 1893.

THE HON. William McKinley, Jr., was again nominated for the Presidency at a banquet of the Boston Home Market Club on Wednesday week. His name was proposed for this office by the Hon'ble Elijah Morse, the greatest authority on Rising Sun Stove Polish in the known world.—May 11, 1893.

MATTHEW ARNOLD in the Nineteenth Century: "The Nation—a newspaper which I read regularly and with profit, a newspaper which is the best, so far as my experience goes, of all American newspapers, and one of the best newspapers anywhere." (ADVT.)—May 11, 1893.

WE HOPE it is true, as reported, that it is the intention of Mr. Croker to start a daily Tammany organ. . . . We need some authoritative voice to expound to us the theories of Tammany government. It is true that the Sun is a devoted organ, but it avoids detail too much to be really useful.—May 11, 1893.

YOUR REPUTATION as a person of taste may depend upon the exterior of your house. Comparatively few people ever see the interior. Cabot's Creosote Shingle Stains add more to the beauty of a house than any other article of exterior adornment. (ADVT.)—May 11, 1893.

"LIBERTY AND A LIVING," by Hubert (P. G., Jr.). How to get bread and butter, sunshine and health, leisure and books, without slaving away one's life. (ADVT.)—May 11, 1893.

THE MAY DAY demonstrations of the Anarchists this year were mostly made on the principle that the pen is mightier than the sword. . . . [In] the Paris Plume of May 1 the most famous of the Anarchists, Kropotkin, Elisée Reclus, and others, set forth . . . their doctrines.—May 18, 1893.

THE JAPANESE, who are beginning to note the flight of time according to Western standards, are this year celebrating the completion of a quarter of a century of their fertilizing contact with the thought of the Western world.—May 18, 1893.

SEVERAL Presbyterian missionaries to China, now in this country, have given their views of the Chinese Exclusion Act, which the Supreme Court has finally decided to be constitutional. They denounce it as not only bad in itself, un-Christian, and even inhuman, but as destined to have an almost fatal effect upon Christian missions in China.—May 25, 1893.

THE MOST NOTABLE feature in connection with the Royal Academy this year is the unanimity with which the critics have condemned it. . . . The actual fact is that the failure of the Academy to represent contemporary art, or, for that matter, British art, adequately has never before been so universally admitted. . . . Mr. Dicksee's large "Funeral of a Viking" is, by rights, the picture of the year, because of the size of the canvas and the obviousness of the story.—May 25, 1893.

SIX YEARS AGO we characterized the Grand Army as a machine for getting pensions, and time is making clear the accuracy of the description.—May 25, 1893.

FUNK & WAGNALLS have issued a prospectus, with sample pages, of their "Standard Dictionary of the English Language," in which we remark many interesting and some useful innovations.—May 25, 1893.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK: Harte, Bret, "Sally Dows and Other Stories."—May 25, 1893.

The Farmers Can Take It

BY RICHARD E. STOCKWELL

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, May 3

IF WE are to believe the Washington spokesmen of the farm bloc, agriculture in this country has reached a pretty pass. They picture the farmer on the very brink of revolt, disgusted with the Administration, furious about price ceilings, crippled by labor shortages. He is, they suggest, about ready to throw in his hand—prepared either to sell out or to reduce production far below the level required by our national food budget.

Out here in Iowa, one of the richest farm states in the union, that picture seems laughably distorted. Despite all talk of a great slump in output, farmers in these parts expect to break new records. County agricultural-war-board chairmen in the Midwest report that farmers are signing up for more production this year than last, despite the problems involved. They will admit to plenty of headaches, but for the most part they do not consider their difficulties worse than those facing other sectors of our war economy.

If the opinions of Iowa farmers are indicative of national feeling, our present farm policies are less unpopular than Congressional speeches would suggest. And Iowa, it is worth noting, has one of the largest Farm Bureau memberships of any state in the union. A survey just completed by one of our leading farm magazines found that 67 per cent of Iowa's farmers favored the AAA—which the Farm Bloc is seeking to abolish—and 54 per cent of those questioned thought they were actually better off if told what to produce in war time. Included in the survey was a question asking the farmer whether he approved or disapproved of the way President Roosevelt is handling his job. Fifty-seven per cent approved, 15 per cent disapproved, 28 per cent weren't sure.

Recent Gallup polls have shown that most farmers are well satisfied with the prices they are currently receiving. Dozens of farmers I have talked to have agreed, with unparalleled unanimity, that "prices are good." Here in Iowa, where farmers are planning to plant 10 per cent more corn this year, one veteran remarked: "Hog prices are good; in fact, with corn prices kept down where they are, hog prices have never been better. If the government puts ceilings on hogs at thirteen or fourteen dollars, we can still make good money." Others echoed this sentiment but added that they would need more help, especially at corn-picking time.

National cash farm income in 1942 was the highest on record. In 1939, not considered a "bad" year by most farmers, total farm income was $8.7 billion. In 1940 it was $9.1 billion; in 1941, $11.8 billion; and last year, $15.5 billion. The increase has been not only in money but in "real income," for the prices which farmers pay have not risen in the same degree as those of the commodities they sell. Since the outbreak of the war in Europe, according to the OWI, the farm-price average has risen about 92 per cent, farm income about 79 per cent, and the average of prices paid by farmers (including interest and taxes) only about 25 per cent.

In other words, the comparatively mild degree of inflation which we have experienced so far during the war has operated to improve the farmer's position. His income has more than kept pace with his expenses, and he has been left with a cash surplus which is helping him to solve his greatest problem, debt. Farming requires a heavy investment for a normally meager return, with the result that most farmers are always burdened with debts. War prosperity has made possible a lightening of this load, and the federal land banks report that millions of dollars are being lopped off farm mortgages every month.

In other respects, of course, the war has brought new troubles to the farmer. He is concerned with the shortage of man-power, machinery, and other necessities, but on the whole he accepts this as a part of his contribution to the war effort, the farm bloc notwithstanding. Farm families are large, and it is hard to find one now that does not have a son, brother, or other near relative in the armed services. At present many farm boys from Iowa are fighting in North Africa. Talking with their folks one cannot fail to be impressed by their conviction that the war is just as much their battle as anyone's and by their willingness to undergo the hardships necessary to achieve victory. Of course grumbling is the age-old prerogative of the farmer, and with his tradition of independence, his normal dislike of regulation and red tape, it is hardly surprising that he has been less than enthusiastic about many OPA orders and Selective Service announcements. But the underlying spirit is very far from unpatriotic.

According to the Department of Agriculture, the number of family workers on the farms is virtually unchanged from the corresponding period a year ago, but the number of hired workers has declined by about 8 per cent. The question of farm man-power, however, is not immediately acute, for there is enough labor to get the crops planted. The problem will become intensified with the approach of the harvesting season in late summer and early fall, when three to four million additional workers will be needed. Available statistics indicate a prospective shortage of men to handle fruit and truck crops, cotton, tobacco, and sugar beets. In order to facilitate the harvesting of such crops, the War Manpower Commission and the Department of Agriculture are working together on the organization of a mobile land army to be concentrated in areas of labor shortage.

Plans are also being laid to make use of imported Mexican labor, particularly in the West Coast orchards, and to permit increasing numbers of interned Japanese Americans, now involuntarily idle in relocation centers, to work on the farms. Many of them are well trained in specialized forms of agriculture. On dairy and poultry farms year-round workers are needed to keep output from sagging, but even here the shortage is apparently not so great as is commonly supposed. Production of milk in January surpassed that of a year ago, and egg production is substantially higher than in 1942.

Recently representatives from twelve Midwestern states met at Des Moines for a conference called by Governor Hickenlooper of Iowa to consider the farmer's plight, especially his labor difficulties. Reports of this meeting in the national press devoted nearly all their space to a gloomy speech by ex-President Hoover, and a forthright statement by Nebraska's Governor Griswold, which drew a heavy round of applause, was overlooked. "We plan to solve our own problems in Nebraska," he said. "There is certainly a man-power problem on our farms, but I am just as interested in the shortage of man-power in our shell-loading plants, in the great war industries of Michigan, and in the front lines in Tunisia." As for the draft, the Nebraska Governor said he was opposed to blanket deferment for any group because "that would be unfair to the boys already in the service, to those who would be deferred, and to the whole war effort."

There is no need to stress the difference in tone between these words and the jeremiads of the farm-bloc representatives in Congress. But there is no doubt that Governor Griswold reflects the sentiments of the average Midwestern farmer far better than the organizations which claim to be the Voice of Agriculture. Actually the phrase "farm bloc" means a lot less to the ordinary farmer than the city-dwelling newspaper reader might suppose. It comprises about 150 Senators and Representatives who take their cues from the four farm lobbies—the Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, and the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation. These organizations represent a comparatively small number of well-to-do commercial farmers and absentee owners—the upper 10 per cent who produce something like half the marketed farm produce in the country. The National Farmers' Union, which is usually at odds with the big lobbies, speaks for the other 90 per cent. The important fact, however, is that barely one farmer in ten belongs to any national pressure group at all.

Thus, while the battle rages in Washington, most farmers are too busy getting on with the job to pay much attention. The recently completed survey of the Federal Crop Reporting Service shows that ten million more acres of food and feed crops will be planted in 1943 than in 1942—an increase of 3.5 per cent over the all-time record. That is the program the farmers have set themselves. They have undertaken to hold the food front, and with reasonable cooperation from nature they will do it.

In the Wind

A LETTER by Professor Oscar Lange of the University of Chicago, blaming anti-Soviet elements in the Sikorski government for the Soviet-Polish rift, was denied publication by the New York Times. It was then submitted to the New York Herald Tribune, which published it in full. . . . Wilbur Forrest, assistant editor of the Herald Tribune, was recently called to the White House to confer informally with President Roosevelt, Cordell Hull, and Sumner Welles on his paper's critical attitude toward the State Department. The Herald Tribune has indicated no change of policy.

THE DENVER Post makes this editorial contribution to the defeat of fascism: "Why can't the council put a twenty-four-hours-a-day curfew on Japs and bar them from Denver streets?"

CORRECTION: On April 17 it was reported that a federal housing project for war workers at Farrell, Pennsylvania, was moved to a slum section when it was learned that Negroes as well as whites would live in it. Further investigation reveals that the whole project was suspended because changes in contracts eliminated the need of new workers. It was originally planned to locate the Negro dwellings in a less desirable section than the white dwellings, not because of discrimination by the government, but because Negroes are usually given low-pay jobs and cannot afford to pay as much rent as whites.

FESTUNG EUROPA: In 1939 a Dutchman named Kovens killed his wife and cut her body into several pieces in an effort to hide his crime. He was detected and sentenced to life imprisonment. Recently he was made director of a Nazi concentration camp at Ommen, Holland. . . . Nazi papers in Prague warn the people against talking in barber shops. . . . Last year Dr. Goebbels designated May as "Politeness Month." There is thus far no word from Germany as to whether the experiment is being repeated this year.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

POLITICAL WAR

EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Undermining the Underground

IN DEALING with the assistance which Allied armies may expect from occupied countries when the assault on Fortress Europe begins, Messrs. Gerber and Kantorowicz, whose last article we publish today, have avoided exaggeration. From their store of material in the Columbia Broadcasting System's files they could easily have concocted an adventurous tale in the genre of "Hangmen Also Die," "Edge of Darkness," and similar films that have been passing across the American screen. That they have refrained from doing so speaks well for their sense of responsibility.

The underground, guerrillas—in a word, the forces of resistance—are more than a subject of entertainment. They are more than propaganda. They are an essential part of a struggle whose eminently political character makes everything concerned with mass movements and popular reactions a matter of strategic importance. Only on the assumption that in this war, and in the peace to follow, the people have a greater role to play than ever before is the strengthening or weakening of the popular forces of resistance seen in perspective. Only then is it seen that the problem parallels the production of tanks or planes and the action of Allied navies against U-boats.

Perhaps all this talk about the underground and its contribution to the winning of the war sounds a bit superfluous at a moment when the splendid victories in Africa have lifted all our hearts. Perhaps the latest developments in Tunisia are considered such conclusive evidence of the military superiority of the Allies that people think there is nothing more to do than tranquilly await the hour when invading armies make their way toward the center of Hitler's Fortress.

It is true that for the first time the German High Command has shown itself incapable of handling a situation whose final outcome was not difficult to foresee. It is true that German morale has proved, at the last moment, much lower than was generally expected. But the collapse of German strategy in North Africa, encouraging as it is, does not authorize us to take it as a pattern of future developments in Europe. We must not forget that it took six months to drown General von Arnim's armies in the Mediterranean. And we must not forget that the entire problem of communications and supplies will change the moment the Allies make a landing in Europe. Even more important, enemy aims will have changed. When the fight for Fortress Europe begins, Hitler will be defending home ground. The great question is whether Nazi Germany will enter that decisive battle with its fighting spirit broken. Nothing that has occurred so far justifies such a hope, and though it would be pleasant to think that the Nazi determination to keep up the fight to the very end has been overestimated, we stubbornly adhere to the argument constantly expressed in this section that this is a war to the death.

It is just that determination to fight to the end that gives importance to the underground as the hour of invasion approaches. The success of our first effort to force our way on to European soil can well depend upon the cooperation tendered by anti-fascist forces of resistance. And until the moment when the German armies are obliged to fall back behind their original frontiers, the contribution of the underground and the guerrillas may prove invaluable.

During its three years of existence the underground has passed through alternate periods of intense activity and transitory apparent repose. From the beginning it has lacked the support it could and should have received from abroad. Not that we harbor any childish illusion that the underground could have been directed from an office in New York or London. But the record of the pro-Nazi fifth column and what it accomplished in France, Norway, and other places reveals what Hitler might have done with the underground had the majority of European peoples been for him rather than for the United Nations.

There are many European political and labor leaders now in England and the United States who have spent the past three years asserting the importance of the political aspect of the war. They have pointed to the day when Allied armies would land on the Continent. Each has had his story to tell. But all their efforts to have a clearly defined plan of action put into effect, to eliminate dilettante experimentation, and to give a serious political tone to Allied broadcasts to Europe have been useless. The lack of understanding and even of interest in the problems of the underground is still sadly evident.

As we pointed out in one of the first editorials in this section, this disinterest is due, in part, to the absence of adequate machinery for the conduct of political war. Neither Propaganda nor Intelligence has turned its attention to one of the greatest tasks of this war—the proper canalization of the huge reservoir of hate against fascism in Europe. At times one agency or another has indirectly dealt with the underground because it touched some of its own problems. But even in those rare cases the agency has usually had to fight some other official organization which, jealous of its prerogatives, was more eager to create difficulties than to help. If an agency found an urgent need to bring someone to this country, or to send someone to Europe, the first necessity was to obtain authorization from the Visa Division of the State Department. But weeks would pass before the Visa Division acted, and in the meantime the need would have tragically disappeared.

If that was the attitude in the capitals of the United Nations in regard to more elementary problems of political warfare, one can imagine what was the approach to the underground on the part of consuls and diplomats. On his return from Europe, where he acted as representative of the Emergency Rescue Committee, Varian Fry wrote, in The Nation, about his experiences with American consular officials. Most of them sympathized with Vichy and with Franco. Most of them were ready to stamp any anti-fascist fighter as an outlaw on the pay roll of Moscow.

The absence of an organization or agency duly empowered to handle the kind of problem posed by the underground is a consequence of the general political attitude in regard to the war. The mechanism has not been created because the policy pursued by the United Nations has been exactly the opposite of that pursued by the underground. Some people call the underground leftist. Others call it patriotic. Call it any name you wish. The indubitable fact is that the underground is anti-fascist, anti-Munich, anti-appeaser, anti-everything that reminds the peoples of Europe of the treason by which they have been victimized. To address the underground over the radio, as major leaders of the United Nations have done, to ask it to exercise all its strength and enthusiasm in the fight against Hitler, and then to offer it as a reward a Europe with a Giraud in France, a Grandi in Italy, a Franco in Spain, a Hapsburg in Austria, is to laugh at the underground, to make it absolutely useless.

Dr. Goebbels would only have to distribute General Giraud's May 1 address in France to show the Frenchmen who are fighting in the underground that the social views of the man chosen in preference to General de Gaulle are barely distinguishable from those of Vichy. It has been suggested that in a few days the two generals will have met and agreed upon a formula of unification to end their controversy. Perhaps. Under the continuous pressure exerted upon him, it would not be surprising if General de Gaulle accepted a kind of compromise. Washington and London would breathe more easily. But the French underground will continue to see De Gaulle as the leader who has taken an underground representative on his national committee, and in Giraud they will see the man who blames not the old Marshal and his clique but the French worker for the fall of France.

All this is of extraordinary importance. The underground is not merely a temporary ally of today. The underground contains the seed for the Europe of tomorrow. In the underground are gathered the strongest and most active members of the nation. It is absurd to think that the underground fighters will render their maximum contribution to the fight that approaches and afterward calmly watch the United Nations intrust power to all the Girauds and the Grandis whom the little Metternichs are engaged in rescuing from the ruins of old Europe. The first thing required to strengthen the underground is a change in the policy of the United Nations, the implementation of President Roosevelt's promise of February 13: "The world can rest assured that this total war—this sacrifice of lives all over the globe—is not being carried on with the remotest idea of keeping Quislings or Lavals in power anywhere on this earth."

A. DEL V.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE Essener Nationalzeitung, property and mouthpiece of Herr Göring, is published at the center of the much-bombed district of the Ruhr. On April 18 it exploded. It pounded on the table with its fist and shouted, "What the people of this hard-hit region can endure from air attacks has a limit, and that limit has been reached."

It did not demand that the war be brought to an end, but it said that life must be made more bearable for the people of the bombed areas. Covertly it reproached the Berlin government for not sufficiently bestirring itself; openly it reproached the neighboring provincial governments for not being more helpful.

The Ruhr has felt the war more than any other German district, and it would be only fair for more favored districts to help it with its burden. They must do this by sending skilled workmen to repair the houses in the Ruhr. It may even be necessary for trucks, buses, and street cars to be placed at the disposal of Ruhr cities. The most capable officials must be sent into the Ruhr, and the region must be given wide powers of self-government. The "paper war" must stop, and all red tape must be got rid of.

This enumeration of things to be done provides a hint of what is lacking. The call for "the most capable officials" implies that those on the spot are not capable. The rebuke to the "more favored districts" which, instead of helping, carry on a "paper war," gives us the familiar picture of a bureaucracy in which the higher-ups are reluctant to hand over any powers to those beneath them. And that all this was publicly spread on the pages of the local newspaper—in a dictatorship—shows a degree of irritation that had to be reckoned with.

The Essener Nationalzeitung had no sooner printed this explosion than Herr Goebbels himself rushed to the Ruhr to assay the prevailing Stimmung. He must have received a strong impression that the limit has indeed been reached, for on his return he immediately poured a thick stream of syrupy ethics over the excitement. In his weekly article of April 24 he admitted that the situation in the air-raid regions was a really serious problem. And in the name of the Nazi government and the German people he proclaimed that many things must be changed. "There is no getting around it—in these matters we must all learn new ways." "The people who have to suffer most from the air raids" must not feel that they have been left in the lurch. "They must get a sense of security from the consciousness of sharing a great common fate. The war which is so fraught with pain for them is not only theirs but ours."

From the few lines in which he was more concrete we obtain some details about actual conditions. "In the western part of the Reich some families have been bombed out two or three times, until finally they have had to be evacuated. They have a claim to be received with kindness in the region to which they are moved." The frequent air-raid alarms are accompanied by "abnormal feelings of hunger, a complaint for which there are suitable remedies." So far, however, no satisfactory cure seems to have been found for these "feelings of hunger" in the bombed areas, whether they are normal or abnormal.

The general picture thus gained agrees remarkably well with a bit of direct information recently received in America. A man who was living in Germany only four months ago designates as the darkest spot in the Reich at present the amazing incapacity of officials to deal with the effects of the bombings. The famed "German organization," he reports, has broken down in this instance to an extent that can hardly be imagined. The work of clearing away the ruins, providing the needed dwellings, making the most pressing repairs, and bringing order into the disorder arising from the emergency has been done, he says, with fantastic slowness, inefficiency, and lack of sympathy. The Göring-Goebbels episode seems to confirm this.

The crass psychological diletantism of which Hitler personally was guilty when he made his grotesque predictions of victory in Russia was completely eliminated from the Tunisian news reports. Not once during the last months has the possibility of a future victory in North Africa been mentioned. No prospect has been held out even that the front there might be maintained. And for some weeks the prospect that the opposite might happen has been discussed. On April 15 various newspapers dealt expressly with the possibility that "we may be forced to evacuate North Africa" or that "North Africa may be lost." Of course they all emphasized that that would not "be decisive for the outcome of the war." In fact, the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung discovered that "it would be actually advantageous, since the Axis would no longer have an overseas transportation problem." At any rate, declared the Leipziger Neueste Nachrichten, "Rommel will have won for us much valuable time." That is pertinent and enlightening. And the consistently sober and cautious psychological handling of this campaign leads one to conclude that Hitler personally no longer has a hand in military publicity.

THE LAST BULLETS

Europe Against Hitler

III. THE PASSIVE RESISTERS

BY JOHN W. GERBER AND ALFRED KANTOROWICZ

BULGARIA and Rumania are in a state of deep and relatively uncontrolled unrest. But their respective governments have not yet let matters get so far out of hand that there is imminent danger of revolution.

Bulgaria is at war with the United States but not with Russia, largely because King Boris dare not flout the heavily pro-Russian sentiments of the Bulgarian people. German influence in the Bulgarian army is strong, dating back to World War I, and until now it has served King Boris's purposes to play the Nazi game. Bulgaria got parts of Greece and Yugoslavia after the Nazi conquest. The Bulgarians have suppressed the populations in the territories they occupy by the same ruthless methods as the Nazis. Boris and his government can therefore expect little consideration in the event of a United Nations victory. Meanwhile, the Germans have occupied large areas of the country—especially the coastal cities and the region along the Turkish border. There is no indication that German troops thus far have participated in quelling restive elements on any considerable scale, but there are sufficient numbers of them on the spot to discourage any current planning for revolution.

Resistance in Bulgaria takes the form of well-coordinated and widespread mass demonstrations, effective underground work, and a little guerrilla warfare. Fifty per cent of Bulgaria's industrial workers are said to be members of the Communist Party (but remember that Bulgaria is largely an agrarian country), and resistance is to a great extent Communist-led. During widespread mass demonstrations early this year, apparently in protest against raids by the pro-Nazi police force on Soviet consulates, 25,000 persons are said to have been arrested. Bulgaria will be ready to overthrow Boris's government and join the United Nations the moment our armies engage the Bulgarian army, part of which will revolt too, and the Nazi occupying forces.

Rumania is the sucker nation of Europe. The Antonescu regime did not have majority support when it was first installed, and most Rumanians thought that the war against Russia would be limited to the securing of Bessarabia. There are fairly reliable indications that the Rumanian army was surprised when ordered to advance beyond the Bessarabian border, and a number of Rumanian officers were reported executed for refusing to lead their troops. More than thirty divisions were largely destroyed in the subsequent fighting. Casualties were particularly heavy at Odessa, Sevastopol, and Stalingrad, where the Nazis forced the Rumanians to spearhead the heaviest assaults.

Another Rumanian grievance is the Nazi award of Transylvania to Hungary. Sporadic border fighting is still going on between these two Axis puppets, and at this moment Rumanian revisionists would rather be fighting Hungary than Russia. Disillusionment with the Nazis and with the Antonescu regime is complete. Open political warfare against Antonescu is being carried on by Dr. Iuliu Maniu, the peasant leader, and George Bratianu, leader of the Liberal Party, who, however, is strongly anti-Soviet. Underground work, particularly sabotage, is well developed. A victorious advance of the United Nations in the Balkans probably would quickly result in the overthrow of Antonescu.

Italy is a tired, discouraged, hungry country, but the Italian people are between the devil Hitler and the deep blue Mediterranean. Presumably, as Germany's number one ally, Italy shares responsibility for the war and must share whatever punishment is decided upon in the post-war period. Actually, Italy has become completely a prisoner of the Nazis. The Italian patriot has his choice between a Nazi victory, which would reduce his country forever to the position of a powerless satellite, and a United Nations victory, which must appear to the average Italian as national defeat.

Casualties in the Italian army amount to about one million men. More than 500,000 have been lost in the African campaigns, and the ten picked Fascist divisions sent to the Russian front were either taken prisoner or cut to pieces. In addition, the Nazis have taken something like 300,000 Italian workers for slave labor in Germany.

Italy as a whole is sadly undernourished; food consumption varies from one part of the country to another because distribution of supplies is so poorly organized. Rations are among the lowest in Europe, and even the small amounts allowed are not always available. The cost of food has risen by more than 20 per cent since the beginning of the war, and the incomparably higher prices on the flourishing black market are far beyond the reach of the Italian working class. Imports from other European countries, on which the people used to depend to a large extent, have been cut, and at the same time Italy has been obliged to increase its exports to Germany—particularly of fruits, vegetables, and nuts.

The Fascists' pre-war policy of self-sufficiency was necessarily a failure. A modern war can't be run without coal and steel, and Italy has neither. It is largely dependent upon Germany for both, and Germany was able to deliver only a fraction of the twelve million tons of coal promised for last year. Italy actually needed twenty million tons, and hundreds of Italian war plants have been closed down because of the coal and steel shortages.

The revolutionary anti-fascist forces in Italy recognize that these conditions were brought about by Fascist government policy, and that the first condition for the rebuilding of Italy and the freedom of the Italian people is the overthrow of Mussolini and his supporters. It is not possible to make an accurate estimate of the numerical strength of the revolutionists, or to determine whether they are only a vanguard of the most intelligent and courageous or are more deeply rooted among the masses. That they have influence and effect is indicated by the number of sentences for political offenses.

The recent political amnesty proclaimed by Mussolini is a sign of weakness, not of strength. By innumerable death sentences early in its career, and by the slaughter of civilians in Abyssinia and Spain, the Fascist regime showed that it was not moved by sentiment. If recent sentences against anti-Fascists have been comparatively mild, it is because the regime feels that the sympathies of an increasing number of Italians are with the accused.

One of the outstanding phenomena of the war has been the miserable fighting spirit of Italian soldiers. Anyone who saw the Italian Garibaldi battalion of the International Brigade fighting at Las Rozas in defense of Madrid in December, 1936, or massacring an entire regular Fascist division at Guadalajara in March, 1937, knows that an Italian soldier is as brave as any other when he is fighting for a cause in which he believes. The liberal anti-Fascist Italian leader Count Carlo Sforza recently complained, quite justifiably, that the Italian army "should have been the object of respect throughout the world when it refused to fight and called a military strike" against the invasion of Greece. Even the regular Italian army probably would put up no more than token resistance against invading armies. The majority of the Italian people would welcome them as liberators from war and Nazi supervision, and a not inconsiderable minority would even offer active assistance.

The situation in Austria, the first nation to fall to Germany, might well be considered similar to that in Germany proper, but there are several distinguishing factors. World War I left Austria very badly off. A small nation, without access to the sea, far from self-sufficient, Austria could flourish only within a federation of Central European states or—for better or for worse—as a part of Germany. Immediately after the war there was a strong feeling among the middle and working classes in favor of Anschluss with the German republic, but when Nazism came to power the workers reversed their position and worked for an independent Austria. Some of the reactionary groups, who had held aloof from the republic, wanted Anschluss with Hitler, and influential clerical circles hoped for protection by Mussolini's Fascisti.

After the Nazi occupation of Austria in 1938, resistance took the dual form of semi-revolutionary activity and a movement for national independence. It is not yet possible to see which predominates. The tendencies toward national independence differentiate the Austrian opposition movement from the German, but on the whole they may be considered together.

Germany itself will be the United Nations' toughest nut. The Nazis have had three years to construct their vaunted "Fortress Europe." They have had ten years to make Germany impregnable, and they have promised that they will, if necessary, fight all the way through the occupied countries to the heart of Berlin.

The Nazis have visited inhuman cruelties upon the peoples they have conquered, but they brought their methods to perfection by long practice upon the German people. Between 1933 and the outbreak of the war, 12,000 Germans were executed, 225,000 (exclusive of ordinary criminals) were sentenced in the ordinary courts of law, and almost two million were sent to concentration camps or mistreated in S. A. cellars, Gestapo centers, and police stations because of anti-Nazi activities.

The Nazis fear the German people as much as any other people they have conquered. To crush opposition from within, Gestapo chief Heinrich Himmler has held a whole army in reserve. This is made up of 300,000 picked S. S. men, badly needed at the fighting fronts, and more than 150,000 well-equipped policemen, in addition to the ubiquitous plainclothesmen of the Gestapo. The size of that force is a measure of the Nazis' fear of their own people.

There are eight to ten million men in the German army now, and their equipment is sufficient, if no longer abundant. They are the best-fed men in Europe—better fed than the rest of the German people, who are the best-fed nation in Europe. The German army (prepared, remember, to continue the war within Germany) has been trained for total warfare by the best methods of Prussian militarists, is led by experienced nationalist officers, and is interspersed with fanatical Nazis. The main body of the German army is still morally intact. The remainder is held together by formidable discipline and fear of both the enemy in front of it and the Gestapo behind it. The soldiers have been warned that if they are captured their families will be punished.

Casualties in the German army, conservatively estimated, run to about four million dead, permanently disabled, and prisoners of war. This, plus the tremendous number of able-bodied men in the army, plus the fact that mechanized warfare requires an ever greater number of skilled and unskilled workers, has resulted in Germany's most crucial problem: man-power.

The recent Sauckel decrees mobilizing all men between sixteen and sixty-five and all women between seventeen and forty-five for labor service has led to a serious deterioration in working conditions, and consequently a deterioration in the ability of workers to take part in active resistance. Goebbels emphasized in his speech on February 18 that everyone must put in twelve, fourteen, or even sixteen hours' work a day in German war factories. Anyone who tries to "get out of it by delivering to his draft board an inconsequential doctor's certificate, instead of delivering his working power," Goebbels warned, will be treated as "a deserter from our national community." In an article in Das Reich he elaborated; "If there is anybody among us who does not understand that, we will act irrespective of him." Three articles in Das Reich in January and February and his speech in Berlin's Sportpalast were filled with vituperation against "deserters in all classes," "parasites," "shirkers," "profiteers," "traitors," "egotists," "defeatists," "the scum of society." Obviously, passive resistance is becoming a serious problem.

The total mobilization brought other headaches for the Nazis. They had no choice but to eliminate the German middle class, the class that had supported them most ardently. All bars, many restaurants, most department stores, and the majority of retail stores were closed by decree. The Schwarze Korps, official paper of the S. S. guards and one of the most influential party mouthpieces, commented: "The German middle class is dead and should not rise again after the war. The ghost of the middle class should be put into the chimney corner."

The problem created by the seven to ten million foreign workers and war prisoners in Germany has probably given Nazi leaders some very anxious moments. Necessarily these people are in daily contact with German workers. The seriousness of the situation is emphasized by the daily decrees and warnings issued to German workers that there should be no contact with foreigners other than that required on the job. Reports of sentences for violations of those decrees are becoming more numerous. It is, by the way, one of the paradoxes of the Nazi race theories that never before have there been men of so many races and nations on German soil. Nothing can prevent their meeting young German women whose husbands or fiancés have been absent for years or have already been killed. The foreign workers are unarmed and closely guarded, but the conditions are present for their alliance with dissatisfied German workers in a genuine anti-fascist "International," in the heart of the fortress, at the moment the United Nations reach its outer bastions.

Opposition within Germany nearly collapsed after Munich. It revived when it became clear that England would not capitulate, and it gathered strength when the Soviet Union and the United States entered the war. It is still growing, as witness the numerous publicly announced arrests, sentences, executions, and even mass executions; as witness the denunciations by Göring, Himmler, Goebbels, and even Hitler, of "enemies" of the fatherland" and "bolshevik sub-humans." It is no coincidence that after the bombings of Essen, Cologne, Munich, and Berlin, inscriptions appeared on the walls of ruined houses reading: "Das haben wir dem Führer zu verdanken" ("We have the Führer to thank for this"). Open revolution will not break out, however, until we have engaged a substantial part of the forces held in reserve to keep resistance underground.

Europe's fight is not merely a negative one—against Hitler. The Nazis have taken away the opportunities for individual security inherent in every democracy. The immediate fight against Hitler is for the restoration of those opportunities; in the long run, it is for economic and political security, for the assurance that no man and no group will ever again be permitted to deprive millions of their sustenance. Every statement that has come out of the European underground has called for a post-war world in which there will be jobs for all workers; land for all peasants, and a vote for everyone.

Two hundred million Europeans—with the exception of a small clique of Quislings, traitors, and congenital scoundrels—are united in the fight. Oppression, visited equally upon everyone, has put everyone on an equal plane—spiritually, economically, and politically. Everyone to some extent has felt the deleterious effects of hunger. Everyone has seen, or has been subjected to, the ruthless, well-organized methods of the Gestapo.

Hunger, oppression, the presence of enemy forces—all are contributing to a day-by-day decline in the amount of assistance we shall receive when we land. Leadership inside Europe, among the people now engaged in comparatively passive resistance, will be of major importance. Much of the leadership has already been wiped out, and there is no way of telling whether it has been replaced by equally effective men. The Catholic church, which maintains a strong grip on the minds of millions of people, has not yet shown its hand, though many individual priests have been active anti-fascists.

We cannot expect the victims of Hitler to win the war for us. We must do that with our own equipment and with the blood of our own men. But their help will save the lives of hundreds of thousands of Allied soldiers, and will hasten the fall of Hitler's European fortress.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE UNKNOWN ARMY

We are the civil fathers, the poor necessary
Clerks of a fair world great death besieges.
Close and far the danger; ships and houses
Equally expect ambush; the foe's line
Is not one thread, is fabric: a bone cap
That tightens. And the young ones have departed.
In companies destructive, daring fate
To find them, they are deepest in the mold
To crack it; and they will, and the free skull,
Warm again, should praise their blood forever.
We have not gone, nor may we; except darkly
In dreams—oh, then we bitterly deploy,
We venture; and arrive at the most difficult
Crossways, where the frost is quickest formed
On heroes. Which anonymous we are,
In nightmares—oh, the cursing in those thickets
When with no moon we come; only with heated Hatred, searching midnight for a nerve
To sever in the arm that weaves this skeleton Cloth, this whited silence, this green country's Shroud that in our sleep we shear away.

MARK VAN DOREN

LIFE ON THE "OBIT" PAGE

BY IRWIN EDMAN

I DON'T know at just what age I began to read the obituary page with interest and care, and even to turn to it with a morbid flutter of anticipation. I suspect that like most other people I began to explore this hall of prompt and definitive fame when to find a contemporary there was no longer a novelty. It is only during the tragic ironies of war that it becomes normal to associate death with youth.

But it was not morbidity (nor is it now, I think) that made me turn to the obituary page, heading for it directly after the front-page headlines and skipping past the columns about books, or beauty, or now even food. My curiosity in reading the accounts of the only just deceased is not about the dead but about the living. For these obituary accounts, much livelier than they used to be—if one may so put it—are excellent thumb-nail biographies of persons with whose virtues and qualities, as well as their names, one perhaps becomes acquainted for the first time only when they are dead. It is not the records of the most famous that are the most interesting, nor is it always the longest accounts that provoke the largest reflection. A paragraph about an obscurity who for fifty years had tended a lonely lighthouse, a few lines about a janitor who left a fortune, a squatter who had been a bank president—this is the sort of stuff out of which one may mold a philosophy of human aspiration and the mortal storm.

I like best, I think, the obituary notices of what may be called minor-league celebrities. These are persons who until their reported death I had not known existed, though it is clear from the biographical data that they cut quite a figure, one in the bedspring business or the civic life of a Midwestern town, another in the building up of an agricultural college in Texas.

Thus, I am told, John Soaper first came to the Beeswax Company as a shipping clerk; he dies the head of the company. His son is a lieutenant in the army, and his daughter is married—I recognize the name—to the scion of an old New York family, and his stamp collection has come to be esteemed by philatelists. I can read between the lines, anybody could, an eighteen-hundred-page novel. It would be an industrial saga. It would have touches of Babbitt, and of Edith Wharton—the part about the daughter would. And the stamp collection? What might that not portend to a psychological novelist? Escape, perhaps, from domesticity, from the boredom of wealth, or it might be simply a larval stage of the connoisseur impulse. In another age John Soaper would have been an art-collecting cardinal. In eighteen hundred pages one would have room to speculate on these matters. But the half-column history provides plenty of material for speculation or for art.

